

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the late Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister. Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, Dr. DEEMS, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1882.

16th Year. No. 1.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF MR. ROBERT GRAHAM the Organizing Secretary of the American Church Temperance Society.

LAUGHTER. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Cuffe" (Continued).

A LETTER THAT SAVED SIX SOULS (with Illustration).

PICTURE OF MARTIN LUTHER NAILING HIS THESES TO THE CHURCH-DOOR AT WITTEMBERG, and Narrative of the Event.

CURRENT EVENTS: The Mormon Difficulty—The Star-Route Cases—Guiteau in the Dock—The Socialist-Labor Convention—Death of Dr. Leonard Bacon—A Fatal Explosion in Virginia—Attempted Substitution of a Criminal—A Ghastly Spectacle in Jersey City—Curious Discoveries in Russia, etc.

FOUR CHOICE SENTENCES. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter.

OOBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).

Christ's Power to Heal. S. S. Lesson. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD SCRIPTURE ALMANAC FOR 1882.

Mr. ROBERT GRAHAM, Special Organizing Secretary of the American Church Temperance Society.

MR. ROBERT GRAHAM,
Special Organizing Secretary of the American Church Temperance Society.

WHEN our fathers were fighting, more than a century ago, for liberty and independence, a cordial and hearty welcome was accorded to Lafayette and his brave friends. They came to render aid in a fierce struggle against foreign domination, and they risked their lives and shed their blood that the weaker side, the side of right against wrong, of freedom against oppression, might have the benefit of their European education, and experience in its contest with trained troops and veteran generals. That struggle was fought out to the end, and to this day in our celebrations of the victory which culminated in the birth of a nation, the services of those gallant allies are held in grateful remembrance; their statues ornament our public places, and their memory is perpetuated in the thoroughfares called by their names.

As we honor the men who crossed the Atlantic to help our fathers in their fight for civil liberty, so we may honor a man who, having fought gallantly and successfully in his own country against an enemy who is also ravaging our land, comes hither to aid us in winning moral victory. This foe, too, is more formidable than British squadrons. Were the acts of oppression that goaded our ancestors to take up arms, multiplied tenfold, and the grievances charged against the British increased in bitterness a hundredfold, they would not approximate the gigantic tyranny we charge against king Alcohol. His yoke is heavy, his rule is absolute, his service is soul-destroying, his rewards are ruin, madness, death, and perdition.

As we see one and another of our friends and acquaintances falling under his power, and bending their necks to his yoke, we hate him with a holy hatred, and long for the day when his dominion shall be overthrown and his existence within our borders be a thing of the past. But that consummation will not be achieved without a long and bitter struggle; and those who know most of the enemy appreciate most accurately the number and extent of the difficulties to be overcome. It is therefore gratifying to the true patriot to know that in the fierce conflict before us here there has been enrolled on the side of reform a volunteer who has won renown in his own country as a leader in

THE BRITISH TEMPERANCE ARMY.

Mr. Robert Graham, who is now the special organizing secretary of the American Church Temperance Society, is already a veteran in this world-wide struggle. He has done a noble work in England. His name is an honored one in temperance circles there; for there are thousands of men who, grieving over the desolation and havoc worked by vice, yet seeing no way to remedy it, have been guided and directed by Mr. Graham, and have had the gratification of seeing through his energy such time and talent as they had, utilized in the great cause, and their limited efforts made productive of good to their fellow men. We have a motto that union is strength, and there is no doubt that it is true; but according as the union is wisely organized or is left unorganized it is the strength of stability or of a powerful aggressive force. Mr. Graham does not appear to have neglected active personal work among the victims of intoxicating liquors. But the object which he has made the chief aim of his life has been that of setting every total abstainer to work, and of making every temperance society a centre of influence for good. Thus a few friends of temperance in a village became a society, and that society was so managed and directed as to operate on outsiders, drawing waverers into its ranks, and rescuing the drunkard from his thralldom.

In a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we gave a brief account of another active worker in the temperance cause, Governor St. John, of Kansas.* The Governor chose the political field of operations, and has fought his battle with the weapons of the Constitution. Mr. Graham has chosen a different field, and one that, while independent of the other, tends to the same object, and is its active and efficient ally. He rightly believes that religion and temperance should be inseparable co-workers. The pious God-fearing man should be the uncompromising foe of everything that tends to the degradation of his fellows, and therefore ought to labor unceasingly by example and teaching to overcome the power which has worked, and is still working, such dire evil throughout the world. Numbers of godly men do not recognize this as their duty; Mr. Graham believes that they should be informed of the evil, and their responsibility explained to them.

Others, who are abstainers, need to be reminded that valuable as is the example they set, something more is needed than mere silent influence, and that enthusiastic effort may accomplish much good. He believes that the influence which prompts and controls the life of the Christian also fits him to be an efficient temperance worker, and that every church should become an active temperance organization, laboring to overcome within the circle of its influence the power of the liquor which is the foe of religion as well as of good morals. Thus the success of Mr. Graham's scheme would render that of Governor St. John and his friends possible, and would make those who reluctantly bow to the decision of the majority in a vote on a prohibition amendment voluntary and zealous supporters of it. Such is the object Mr. Graham aims to effect, and such are the methods by which he hopes to attain it.

Mr. Graham has been engaged in this work for many years. Of his early life little is known. He was born at Haltwhistle, England, on May 12th, 1829. His family had furnished many excellent teachers renowned for their literary attainments and for the faculty of communicating their knowledge to their pupils and for training them to think for themselves. Mr. Graham also devoted himself to the scholastic profession, and during some years was actively and successfully engaged in several important spheres of labor.

About this period Mr. Graham listened to a vivid description of the evils of drunkenness from the lips of the late Dr. Guthrie, of the Scottish Church. In a recent address in the parlors of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, Mr. Graham thus related his recollection of Dr. Guthrie's speech. He said: "Dr. Guthrie drew a vivid picture of the emotions that came over him as he went through the old town of Edinburgh, and saw the poverty and want to be found in the dark wynds and alleys of the city. 'I saw,' he said, 'bairns, without a smile on their wan faces, living in homes into which God's sunlight never penetrated,' and on inquiry found that all this poverty and want was caused, directly or indirectly, by the indulgence of parents and guardians in strong drink. Then he said he felt the one work God had given him to do was to fight this evil. Then and there," said Mr. Graham, "I resolved as a boy, to do as much as I could for the great cause, and I owe my inspiration for the work to Dr. Guthrie."

FIRST EFFORTS.

Mr. Graham then began, as opportunity offered, and whenever his scholastic duties would permit, to deliver lectures on temperance. He at once made his mark as a platform orator. Especially among working men he became popular. He had and still retains a remarkably clear and simple way of expressing his ideas. There is nothing ornate or apparently rhetorical in his style, but a telling, practical, business-like manner of pointing out the evils of intemperance and showing the advantages of abstinence. This suited the taste of the working men, and they flocked to hear him whenever he was announced to lecture.

In 1872 Mr. Graham settled in Manchester, where he took charge of an important school. In that year a new movement was inaugurated in the temperance campaign, which from the outset enlisted Mr. Graham's warm sympathy. This was

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

He took a lively interest in its organization because he saw that to a certain extent it identified with the cause of temperance the Episcopal Church in England with all its wealth and influence. The movement was well received and soon took practical shape. It was deemed wise at the commencement to have two branches, corresponding with the two ecclesiastical provinces of York and Canterbury. The northern province, which included many large cities, such as Manchester and Bradford, in which large numbers of working men were employed, was an immense sphere of work, and that branch of the Society feeling the importance of having for secretary a man of superior ability and energy urged Mr. Graham to accept the responsible and onerous position. It was an arduous undertaking but the work was congenial, for an increasing sense of the need of such a movement had pressed Mr. Graham's mind. He therefore accepted the offer of the society, and henceforth devoted all his time and energies to its service.

The Church of England Temperance Society was established with a twofold object: First, to form the temperate, and, secondly, to remove the causes which lead to intemperance. Under the latter branch of the programme were comprised efforts to limit the sale of intoxicating beverages, houses which were bona fide hotels, and to close such drinking places as were mere bars; to diminish the hours during which liquor might be sold, and to prohibit its sale on Sundays; and to separate workmen's clubs from the saloons. It was intended with this programme to thoroughly permeate every part of the country, and, using the organization of the Church of England as a basis, establish a society in every parish. It was believed that the evils of intemperance in England were palpable that moderate drinkers would indorse the programme of the society, and would willingly labor in such a cause. A cordial welcome was therefore extended to them, and large numbers joined the society who have subsequently become total abstainers. "There has been," says Mr. Graham, "a constant exodus from the non-abstinence to the total abstinence ranks, and I have record of a single pervert from the severer faith."

It was in 1873 that Mr. Graham commenced his work, and the next seven years were years of incessant toil. Not only in school-houses and church buildings did he lecture, but in factories and workshops whenever he could obtain the permission of employers; and he succeeded in organizing large numbers of societies in towns and rural districts. Writing of those years of labor and their results, an eminent member of the society says: "The manner in which Mr. Graham's duties were performed, often under the most difficult and discouraging circumstances, has been such as to command the admiration of all acquainted with the history of the movement. The prominent position now occupied by the society is a standing testimony to the earnestness, ability, and remarkable powers of organization Mr. Graham has displayed."

In December, 1880, Mr. Graham found the seven years' continuous strain of office work and platform advocacy necessitated a brief period of relaxation, and leave of absence for a few months was cordially granted by the society in order that Mr. Graham might pay a VISIT TO AMERICA.

It was also resolved that some mark of appreciation should be tendered to Mr. Graham in recognition of his valuable services. A subscription list was opened and contributions rapidly flowed in from all ranks of the people, from the Duke of Westminster down to the factory operative, and before he sailed for America, at a large and enthusiastic meeting Mr. Graham received the testimonial, which consisted of a gold watch and chain and a sum of money equivalent to a thousand dollars.

Mr. Graham crossed the Atlantic for rest and relaxation, but during his visit he addressed almost as many meetings as he would have done had he remained in England. His position in England had given him abundant opportunities for studying the drinking customs of the country, and his success in temperance organization made his suggestions exceptionally valuable to temperance workers here. He was invited to speak in the principal cities in the United States and in Canada, and complied. The result was the organization of THE AMERICAN CHURCH TEMPERANCE SOCIETY. The history of that movement has been ably described by Dr. McKim as follows: "The first formal step toward the organization of the Church temperance Society was taken at a conference of clergy and laity held in Grace Hall, March 14th, 1881. But the genesis of the movement goes further back—we find parochial societies here and there through the Church since three years ago.

"It was the visit of Mr. R. Graham to this country which crystallized the interest and effort of the friends of this cause, and produced the formation of 'The Church Temperance Society,' on the same liberal, scriptural basis adopted by the English society eight years before.

"The clergymen had encouraged the circulation of the English society's constitution, and had themselves ably enforced the principle, while in some parishes societies had been formed and been in operation for some years on that basis. But there was wanting some one who could speak from wide experience and the observation of a large field on which this liberal idea of temperance reform had been at work—one, moreover, who had studied his particular phase of the question in its various aspects as it could only be studied in England. Such a witness was found in Mr. Graham; and as we heard his clear explanation of the methods and aims of the society in the mother Church, and his demonstration of the vast results accomplished here in the space of eight years, many of us asked ourselves why could not the daughter take a hint from the mother, and, emulating her great example, do a similar work in our own land?

"Accordingly, the society was formed. It rests upon three principles: 1. Recognizing temperance as the great Christian law, binding universally, and total abstinence as a rule of expediency, or of necessity, or of prudence, or of charity in certain cases, it endeavors to combine under one banner of temperance reform both abstainers and non-abstainers—all who are willing to give their influence to a movement having for its objects the promotion of temperance, the removal of the causes which lead to intemperance, and the reformation of the intemperate.

"2. In the prosecution of these objects the society relies ultimately and supremely upon the grace of God through Christ. It is distinctly a religious and a Christian movement.

"3. It seeks to do its work through the established organism of the Church. Its first great end must be to inform the mind of the Church upon the appalling prevalence of drunkenness, and the terrible fruit it bears in the social and moral condition of the people of our country, and to enlist the pulpit and the press in the endeavor to bring to bear upon these great evils the social, moral, influence of the Church.

"The executive of the Church Temperance Society, encouraged by the sympathy of a large body of Churchmen, and by the co-operation of thirty-four of the bishops, who have become vice-presidents of the society, and by the formation of several diocesan societies in affiliation with it, have resolved to push forward the work vigorously."

Mr. Graham's visit had been a pleasant one to himself; he had expressed his delight with the country and with the people, and that regard was reciprocated by the clergymen and temperance advocates with whom he came in contact. More than one friend expressed the wish at the farewell meeting held in his honor in Brooklyn on April 20th, 1881, that Mr. Graham might soon return. When therefore the American society was established it was felt that no more suitable man could be found for the position of Secretary than Mr. Graham, and he was cordially invited to undertake the work of organization, for which his experience and abilities so thoroughly fitted him. The offer was accepted, and on October 11th the pleasant duty of welcoming Mr. Graham to New York was performed by a distinguished assembly of clergymen and laymen. Mr. Graham has now fairly commenced his work here, and many prayers are being offered that his labors and those of his coadjutors may be blessed of God to the rescue of many souls from the curse of intemperance.

LAUGHTER.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"Then was our mouth filled with laughter."—PSALM 126:2.

"He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh."—PSALM 2:4.

Bible References to Laughter—I. Sarah's Laugh—The Laugh Sceptical—Natural Laws, God's Habits—Changeable at His Pleasure—Professors on the Fence—Biblical Expurgation—What is Left when Sceptics are Through—A Fascinating Laughter—A Gigantic Burglary—II. David's Laugh—The Laugh Exultant—The Christian has the Best Right to Laugh—Theodosius on the Rack—Always Report Victories—III. The Fool's Laugh—The Laugh Idiotic—Laughing at Indecent Stories—At Other People's Afflictions—A Brooklyn Hospital Incident—Patient Sermons—IV. God's Laugh—The Laugh Condemnatory—Dishonest Ruined Speculators—Tweed's Scheme—Rome's Power in Derision—His Smile of Blessing—V. Heaven's Laugh—The Laugh Triumphant—Congratulatory on Eternal Recovery—The Initial on the Gate.

THIRTY-EIGHT times does the Bible make reference to this configuration of the features and quick expulsion of breath which we call laughter. Sometimes it is born of the sunshine, and sometimes of the midnight. Sometimes it stirs the sympathy of angels, and sometimes the cackling of devils. All healthy people laugh; whether it pleases the Lord or displeases Him, that depends upon when we laugh and at what we laugh. My theme this morning is the laughter of the Bible, namely, or that of scepticism; David's laugh, or that of spiritual exultation; the fool's laugh, or that of sinful merriment; God's laugh, or that of infinite condemnation; Heaven's laugh, or that of eternal triumph.

SARAH'S LAUGH,

I. Scene: an Oriental tent; the occupants, old Abraham and Sarah, perhaps wrinkled and decrepid. Their three guests are three angels, the Lord Almighty one of them. In return for the hospitality shown by the old people, God promises Sarah that she shall become the ancestress of the Lord Jesus Christ. Sarah laughs in the face of God; she does not believe it. She is affrighted at what she has done. She denies it. She says, "I didn't laugh." Then God retorted, with an emphasis that silenced all disputation, "But thou didst laugh." My friends, the laugh of scepticism in all the ages is only the echo of Sarah's laughter.

God says He will accomplish a thing, and men say it cannot be done. A great multitude laugh at the miracles. They say they are contrary to the laws of nature. What is a law of nature? It is God's way of doing a thing. You ordinarily cross the river at Fulton Ferry; to-morrow you change for one day, and you go across Wall Street Ferry. You made the rule; have you not a right to change it? I ordinarily come in at that door (pointing to a side entrance) of the church. Suppose next Sabbath I should come in at the other door? It is a habit I have. Have not I a right to change my habit? A law of nature is God's habit—His way of doing things.

If He makes the law, has He not a right to change it at any time He wants to change it? Alas for the folly of those who laugh at God when He says, "I will do a thing," they responding, "You can't do it." God says that the Bible is true—it is all true. Bishop Colenso laughs. Herbert Spencer laughs. Stuart Mill laughs. All the German universities laugh. Harvard laughs—softly! A great many of the learned institutions of this country, with long rows of professors seated on the fence between Christianity and infidelity, laugh softly. They say, "We didn't laugh." That was Sarah's trick. God thunders from the heavens, "But thou didst laugh!"

The Garden of Eden was only a fable. There never was any ark built; or if it was built it was too small to hold two of every kind. The pillar of fire by night is only the northern lights. The ten plagues of Egypt only a brilliant specimen of jugglery.

* Dr. Talmage informed us last week that he would not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle on New Year's day; we therefore publish a deeply impressive sermon by him, which has not before appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The sea parted because the wind blew violently a great while from one direction. The sun and moon did not put themselves out of the way for Joshua. Jacob's ladder was only horizontal and picturesque clouds. The destroying angel smiting the first-born in Egypt was only cholera infantum become epidemic. The gullet of the whale, by positive measurement, is too small to swallow a prophet.

The story of the immaculate conception is a shock to all decency. The lame, the dumb, the blind, the halt cured by mere human surgery. The resurrection of Christ's friend only a beautiful tableau. Christ and Lazarus and Mary and Martha acting their parts well. My friends, there is not a doctrine or statement of God's holy word that has not been derided by the scepticism of this day. I take up this book of King James' translation. I consider it a perfect Bible, but here are sceptics who want it torn to pieces, and now with this Bible in my hand, let me tear out all those portions which the scepticism of this day demands shall be torn out.

WHAT SHALL GO FIRST?

"Well," says some one in the audience, "take out all that about the creation, and about the first settlement of the world." Away goes Genesis. "Now," says some one, "take out all that about the miraculous guidance of the children of Israel in the wilderness." Away goes Exodus. "Now," says some one else in the audience, "there are things in Deuteronomy and Kings that are not fit to be read." Away go Deuteronomy and the Kings. "Now," says some one, "the Book of Job is a fable; that ought to come out." Away goes the Book of Job. "Now," says some one, "those passages in the New Testament which imply the divinity of Jesus Christ ought to come out." Away go the evangelists.

"Now," says some one, "the book of Revelation—how preposterous: it represents a man with the moon under his feet and a sharp sword in his hand." Away goes the Book of Revelation. Now there are a few pieces left. What shall we do with them? "Oh," says some man in the audience, "I don't believe a word of the Bible from one end to the other." Well, it is all gone. Now, you have put out

THE LAST LIGHT FOR THE NATIONS.

Now it is the pitch darkness of eternal midnight. How do you like it?

But I think, my friends, we had better keep the Bible a little longer intact. It has done pretty well for a good many years. There are old people who find it a comfort to have it on their laps, and children like the stories in it. Let us keep it for a curiosity anyhow. If the Bible is to be thrown out of the school, and out of the court room, so men no more swear by it, and it is to be put in a dark corridor of the city library, the Koran on one side, and the writings of Confucius on the other, then let us each one keep a copy for himself; for we might have trouble, and we would want to be under the delusions of its consolation; and we might die, and we would want the delusion of the exalted residence at God's right hand which it mentions.

Oh, what an awful thing it is to laugh in God's face, and hurl His revelation back at Him! After a while, the day will come when they will say they did not laugh. Then all the hypercriticisms, all the caricatures, and all the learned sneers in the Quarterly Review will be brought to judgment, and amid the flaming of everything above, God will thunder, "But thou didst laugh!"

I think

THE MOST FASCINATING LAUGHTER

at Christianity I ever remember was Theodore Parker. He made the Word of God seem ridiculous, and he laughed on at our holy religion until he came to die, and then he said, "My life has been a failure; a failure domestically, I have no children; a failure socially, for I am treated in the streets like a pirate; a failure professionally, because I know but one minister that has adopted my sentiment." For a quarter of a century he laughed at Christianity, and ever since Christianity has been laughing at him. Now, it is a mean thing to go into a man's house and steal his goods; but I tell you the most gigantic burglary ever enacted is the proposition to steal these treasures of our holy religion. The meanest laughter ever uttered is the laughter of the sceptic.

The Date Printed on the Label of a Wrapper of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shows the time up to which the subscription has been paid.

II. The next laughter mentioned in this Bible is or the expression of spiritual exultation. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter." He got very much down sometimes, but there are other chapters where for four or five times he calls up the people to praise and exult. It was not a mere twitch of the lips; it was a demonstration that took hold of his whole physical nature. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter."

DAVID'S LAUGHTER,

My friends, this world will never be converted to God until Christians cry less and laugh and sing more. The horrors are a poor bait. If people are to be persuaded to adopt our holy religion, it will be because they have made up their mind it is a happy religion and they do not like an ultra-bilious Christianity. I know there are morbid people who enjoy a funeral. They come early to see the friends take leave of the corpse, and they steal a ride to the cemetery; but all healthy people enjoy a wedding better than they do a burial. Now, you make the religion of Christ sepulchral and hearse-like, and you make it repulsive.

I say plant the rose of Sharon along the church walks, and columbine to clamber over the church wall; and have a smile on the lip, and have the mouth filled with holy laughter. There is no man in the world except the Christian that has a right to feel an untrammelled glee. He is promised everything is to be for the best here, and he is on the way to a delight which will take all the procession with palm branches, and all the orchestra harped and cymbaled and trumpeted to express. "Oh!" you say, "I have so much trouble." Have you more trouble than Paul had? What does he say, "Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing. Poor, yet making man rich. Having nothing, yet possessing all things."

THE MERRIEST LAUGH I EVER HEARD

has been in the sick-room of God's dear children. When Theodosius was put upon the rack, he suffered very great torture at the first. Somebody asked him how he endured all that pain on the rack. He replied: "When I was first put upon the rack, I suffered a great deal; but very soon a young man in white stood by my side, and with a soft and comfortable handkerchief he wiped the sweat from my brow, and my pains were relieved; it was a punishment for me to get from the rack, because when the pain was all gone, the angel was gone." Oh! rejoice evermore.

You know how it is in the army—an army in encampment. If to-day news comes that our side has had a defeat, and to-morrow another portion of the tidings comes, saying, "We have had another defeat," it demoralizes all the host. But if the news come of victory to-day and victory to-morrow, the whole army is impassioned for the contest. Now, in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, report fewer defeats; tell us the victories; victory over sin and death and hell. Rejoice evermore, and again I say rejoice. I believe there is more religion in a laugh than in a groan. Anybody can groan, but to laugh in the midst of banishment and persecution and indescribable trial—that requires a David, a Daniel, a Paul, a modern heroine.

III. The next laughter mentioned in the Bible that I shall speak of is or the expression of sinful merriment. Solomon was very quick at simile; when he makes a comparison we all catch it. What is the laughter of a fool like? He says, "It is the crackling of thorns under a pot." The kettle is swung, a bunch of brambles is put under it, and the torch is applied to it, and there is a great noise and a big blaze, and a sputter, and a quick extinguishment. Then it is darker than it was before.

THE FOOL'S LAUGHTER,

Fool's laughter! The most miserable thing on earth is a bad man's fun. There they are, ten men in a bar-room. They have at home wives, mothers, daughters. The impure jest starts at one corner of the bar-room, and crackle, crackle, crackle it goes all around. In five hundred such guffaws there is not one item of happiness. They all feel bemused, if they have any conscience left.

Have nothing to do with men or women who tell immoral stories. I have no confidence either in their Christian character or their morality. So all merriment that springs out of the defects of others—caricature of a lame foot, or a curved spine, or a blind eye, or a deaf ear—will be met with the judgments of God, either upon you or your children. Twenty years ago, in this city of Brooklyn, I knew a man who was particularly skilful in imitating the lameness of a neighbor. Not long ago, a son of the skilful mimic had his leg amputated for the very defect which his father had mimicked years before. I do not say it was a judgment of God. I leave you to make your own inference.

So all merriment born of dissipation—that which starts at the counter of the drinking restaurant, or from the wine glass in the home circle—the maudlin simper, the meaningless joke, the saturnalian gibberish, the paroxysm of mirth about nothing that you sometimes see in the fashionable club-room or the exquisite parlor at twelve o'clock at night, are the crackling of thorns under a pot. Such laughter and such sin ends in death.

When I was a lad, a book came out entitled "Dowjor's Patent Sermons;" it made a great stir, a very wide laugh all over the country, that book did. It was a caricature of the Christian ministry, and of the Word of God, and of the day of judgment. Oh, we had a great laugh. The commentary on the whole thing is that, not long ago, the author of that book died in poverty, shame, debauchery, kicked out of society, and cursed of Almighty God. The laughter of such men is the echo of their own damnation.

IV. The next laughter that I shall mention as being in the Bible is the laughter of God's condemnation. "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh." Again, at him." Again, "I will laugh at his calamity." With such demonstration will God greet every kind of great sin and wickedness. Bad men build up villanies higher and higher. Good men almost pity God because He is so schemed against by men. Suddenly a pin drops out of the machinery of wickedness, or a secret is revealed, the foundation begins to rock; finally, the whole thing is demolished. What is the matter? I will tell you what is the matter. That crash of ruin is only the reverberation of God's laughter.

THE LORD WILL LAUGH

On Wall Street there are a great many good men and a great many fraudulent men. A fraudulent man says, "I mean to have my million." He goes to work reckless of honesty, and he gets his first $100,000. He gets after a while his $200,000. After a while he gets his $500,000. "Now," he says, "I have only one more move to make, and I shall have my million." He gathers up all his resources; he makes that last grand move, he fails and loses all, and he has not enough money of his own left to pay the cost of the car to his home. People cannot understand this spasmodic revolution. Some said it was a turn in Erie Railroad stock, or in Western Union, or in Illinois Central; some said it was Jay Gould; some said it was W. H. Vanderbilt. They all guessed wrong. I will tell you what it was, "He that sitteth in the heavens laughed."

A man in New York said he would be the richest man in the city. He left his honest work of chair making, and got into the city councils some way, and in ten years stole fifteen million dollars from the city government. Fifteen million dollars! He held the Legislature of the State of New York in the grip of his right hand. Suspicions were aroused. The Grand Jury presented indictments. The whole land stood aghast. The man who expected to put half the city in his vest pocket goes to Blackwell's Island; goes to Ludlow Street jail; breaks prison, and goes across the sea; is re-arrested and brought back, and again remanded to jail. Why? "He that sitteth in the heavens laughs."

Rome was a great empire; she had Horace and Virgil among her poets; she had Augustus and Constantine among her emperors. But what mean the defaced Pantheon, and the Forum turned in a cattle market, and the broken-walled Coliseum and the architectural skeleton of her great aqueducts? What was that thunder? "Oh," ye say, "that was the roar of the battering-ran against her walls." No. What was that quiver? "Oh," you say, "that was the tramp of hostile legions." No. The quiver and the roar were the outburst of omnipotent laughter from the defied and insulted heavens. Rome defied God and He laughed her down. Thebes defied God and He laughed her down. Nineveh defied God and He laughed her down. Babylon defied God and He laughed her down.

There is an immense difference between God laugh and His smile. His smile is eternal beauty. He smiled when David sang, and Miriam clapped the cymbals, and Hannah made garments for her son, and Paul preached, and John kindled with apocalyptic vision, and when any man has anything to do and does it well.

HIS SMILE!

Why it is the apple orchards in full bloom. It is morning breaking on a rippling sea. It is heaven at high noon, all the bells beating the marriage peal. But His laughter—may it never fall on us. It is a condemnation for our sin. It is a wasting away. We may let the satirist laugh at us, and all our companions laugh at us, and we be made the target for the merriment of earth and hell; but God forbid that we should ever come to the fulfilment of the prophecy against the rejectors of the truth: "I will laugh at your calamity." But, my friends, all of us who reject the pardon of the Gospel are to come under that tremendous bombardment.

God wants us all to repent; He counsels, He coaxes, He importunes, He begs us. He comes down out of heaven. He puts all the world's sorrow on one shoulder, He puts all the world's sorrow on the other shoulder, and then, with that Almighty hand on one side and that Himalaya on the other, He starts up the hill back of Jerusalem to achieve our salvation. He puts the palm of His right hand on one long spike, and He puts the palm of His left hand on another long spike, and then, with His hands spouted with His own blood, He gesticulates, saying, "Look! look! and live! With the crimson veil of my sacrifice I will cover all your sins. With my dying groan I will swallow up your groans. Look! live!"

But a thousand of you this morning turn your backs to that. And then this voice of invitation turns to a tone divinely ominous, that sobs like simoom or an equinox through the first chapter of Proverbs, "Because I have called and ye refused, I have stretched out my hand and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel and would none of my reproof, I also will laugh at your calamity." Oh! what a laugh that is. A deep laugh. A long reverberating laugh. An overwhelming laugh. God grant we may never hear it. But in this day of merciful visitation yield your heart to Christ, that you may spend all your life on earth under His smile and escape for ever the thunder of the laugh of God's indignation.

V. The other laughter mentioned in the Bible the only one I shall speak of, is or the expression of eternal triumph. Christ said to His disciples: "Blessed are ye that weep now for ye shall laugh." That makes me know positively that we are not to spend our days in Heavensinging long-metre songs. The formalistic and stiff notions of heaven that some people have would make me miserable. I am glad to know that the heaven of the Bible is not only a place of holy worship, but of magnificent social life. "What," say you, "will the ringing laugh be around the circles of the saved?" I say, ye pure laughter, cheering laughter, holy laughter. It will be a laugh of congratulation.

HEAVEN'S LAUGHTER,

When we meet a friend who has suddenly come to a fortune, or who has got over some dire sickness, do we not shake hands, do we not laugh with him? And when we get to Heaven and see our friends there, some of them having come up out of great tribulation, why, we will say to one of them "The last time I saw you, you had been suffering or six weeks under a low intermittent fever;" or another we will say: "You for ten years were pining with the rheumatism, and you were full of complaints when we saw you last. I congratulate you on your eternal recovery."

We shall laugh. Yes, we shall congratulate all those who have come up out of great financial embarrassments in this world, because they have become millionaires in heaven. Ye shall laugh, it will be a laugh of reassociation. It is as natural for us to laugh when we meet those we haven't seen for ten years, as anything is possible to be natural. And when we meet our friends, over whose departure we lamented ten, twenty, thirty years before, will it not be with infinite congratulation? Our perceptions quickened, our knowledge improved? We will know each other at a flash, and have to talk over all that happened since we have been separated, the one that has been ten years in heaven telling us of all that has happened in the ten years of his heavenly residence, and we telling him in return what has happened during the ten years of his absence from earth.

We shall laugh. I think George Whitefield and John Wesley will have a laugh of contempt for their earthly collisions, and that Toplady and Charles Wesley will have a laugh of contempt for their earthly misunderstandings, and the two farmers who were in a lawsuit all their days will have a laugh of contempt over their earthly disturbance about a line fence.

Exemption from all annoyance. Immersion in all gladness. Ye shall laugh. Christ says so. Ye shall laugh. Yes; it will be a laugh of triumph. Oh! what a blessed thing it will be to stand on the wall of heaven, and look down at Satan, and hurl at him defiance, and see him shake his chains, and we free from his clutches. Ah, ha! Ah, ha! Yes; it will be a laugh of royal greeting. You know how the Frenchmen cheered when Napoleon came back from Elba. You know how the English cheered when Wellington came back from Waterloo. You know how the Americans cheered when Kossuth arrived from Hungary. You remember how the Romans cheered when Pompey came back victor over nine hundred cities. Every cheer was a laugh.

A LAUGH OF ROYAL GREETING;

But oh the mightier greeting, the gladder greeting, when the snow-white cavalry troops of heaven shall go through the streets; according to Revelation, Christ, in the red, the crimson coat, seated on a white horse, and all the armies of heaven flying on white horses; but when we see and hear that galloping cavalcade, we shall cheer, we shall laugh. Does not your heart beat and cry this morning at the thought of that great jubilee upon which we are soon to enter? I pray God that when we get through with this world and are going out of it, we may have the same vision that a Christian had when he said he saw written all over the clouds of the sky and they asked him, standing by his side, what he thought that letter W meant. Oh, he says, that stands for Welcome. So may it be when we quit this world. W on the gate, W on the door of the mansion, W on the throne. Welcome, Welcome, Welcome.

THE LETTER W,

I have preached this sermon with five prayerful wishes: That you might see what a mean thing is the laughter of scepticism, what a bright thing is the laugh of spiritual exultation; what a hollow thing is the laugh of sinful merriment; what an awful thing is the laugh of condemnation; what a radiant, rubicund thing is the laughter of eternal triumph. Avoid the ill, choose the right; be comforted, be comforted. Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh—ye shall laugh!

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS OF THE STORY.

THE story relates to the events of a century ago. During a bull-baiting at a fair in Chester, England, an infuriated beast broke loose, and in rushing headlong through the streets injured a lady who with her little daughter was entering the city. The lady, though refined in manner and dress, was poor, and while on her journey to Chester had been found fainting on the road by a Welsh carrier, who had restored her to consciousness and helped her on the way. When she was injured by the bull she was taken to the house of Dr. Gilbert, a skilful surgeon, where she died. She could not pay for her treatment in money, but gave the doctor a valuable signet ring. Dr. Gilbert tried to discover the dead lady's family, but was unable. Part of an envelope he found in her pocket seemed to give a clue, as it was addressed to "Mrs. Somers, Ennis, Ireland. He inquired at Ennis for any one named Somers, but the name was unknown there. He therefore adopted the child of his deceased patient. She could not speak plainly and called herself "Silph." Dr. Gilbert supposed this to be a contraction of Sylph, and so she was called. A few years later, a young man who was preparing for the Roman Catholic priesthood was injured by an explosion and became a patient of Dr. Gilbert, and, while recovering, fell in love with Sylph. Dr. Gilbert was a free thinker, and presided over a meeting at which seditious speeches were delivered. As the chairman of the meeting he was imprisoned. In the prison he was attacked by jail-fever. Sylph, who had been converted under the preaching of John Wesley, visited Dr. Gilbert in prison and imparted religious consolation. John Wesley also visited Dr. Gilbert, and was present when he died. Sylph was aided in gaining access to Dr. Gilbert by a Christian military officer named Captain Vaughan. After Dr. Gilbert's death John Wesley escorted Sylph, to whom he left his fortune, to Ireland, where she went, by Dr. Gilbert's advice, to reside with his relatives, whose names were Denzille. They were Godless people, and were, beside, jealous of her because she had inherited Dr. Gilbert's fortune. Mr. Denzille plotted to get the money by trying to induce her to marry his son. Sylph, in order to hear evangelical teaching, attended service at a village some miles off, and was escorted to and fro by an Irishman named Corny Fagan, who was converted at one of the meetings, while lying concealed in a bag, into which he had crept, intending to disturb the meeting. Sylph had carefully preserved the ring her mother had given to Dr. Gilbert, from whom she received it when he was dying, and at the same time heard all the doctor could tell her about her mother.

(Continued from page 823.)

Sylph's Forgives Corney—Mr. Denzille's Notched Pistol—Egg Pistol Practice—Sylph Persecuted—She Obtains Permission to Quit the Denzille Home.

SYLPH said to the people who gathered in alarm around Corney as he struggled to release himself from the bag. "I perceive that this affair, apparently so full of alarm and mystery, is not serious. Some wretched man has had it in his purpose to grievously hurt and annoy us, and has been caught in his own toils—has, I hope, from his words, been doubly caught, and feels the good hand of the Lord upon him."

"Who are you?" said Sylph, addressing in a firm voice the grotesque object before her.

Corney, who at the sound of Sylph's voice had ceased his frantic struggles, answered in words, muffled and thick, from his close canvas covering. "Who am I, is it ye ask? Why, thin—savin' yer presence, inam—no wan more nor less than Corney Fagan, the frieze weaver of the town of Enniscorthy, and who this minnit is heart-shamed to tell it. Shure enough, I thought to do yees harm; but me bad intinshun has found me out. In me ignorance I thought I was right, and that yees were tee-totally wrong; but now I see that yees are saints of the Lord, and that I—God help me—am nothin' but the worst o' sinners. Oh, what'll I do—what'll I do? I'm nigh smothered—I'll die—I'll die—and the divil will have me. What ever will I do? Oh, what'll I do?"

Corney, full of dread and penitence, thus crying out, and passionately beseeching, put forth at his closing words one more tremendous effort to extricate himself. He stooped his head and raised and violently shook his shoulders, and moved his hampered arms up and down far as he could, and worked his fingers convulsively, and at last succeeded in his desperate endeavor. Drawing off the sack, now pushed up high as his neck, he flung it far aside, and stood before the group of neighbors, whom he had come "to shamefully molest," a convicted sinner, all pale and panting, from his terror-stricken conscience and exhausting struggles.

Singling out Sylph at a glance, he moved toward her, and, bathed in tears, flung himself at her feet.

"Forgive me, oh! forgive me," he vehemently cried. "I'll not rise from the spot until you say you forgive me. I'd have the dark curse of Heaven upon me without yer pardon—a curse that would blast and wither up me very sowl."

"What'll I do? Holy Vargin; mother o' God! What'll I do? I'm a sinner that bad that I hate meself. Bad enough—Heaven help me—for the ground beneath to open up this minnit and swalla me!" and he drew back as though he saw in awful reality the dread gulf he spoke of.

"Ask the Lord for forgiveness, and not me," said Sylph. "It is He, my friend, whom you have really offended; for He counts those His enemies who mean harm to His people."

But this statement only served to augment still more the terrors of Corney. He buried his face in his hands and visibly trembled.

"Oh, do you forgive me first," after a moment or two he passionately entreated. "Yes, do you forgive me first. P'rhaps it'll help to get fur me aftherward, you know, mam, the furgiveness o' the Lord whom I have so insinced agin me."

"Be it so," was the answer, in a soft and winning voice. "Yet be assured, my friend, no one so pardons as the Lord whom you have sinned against, for 'He delighteth in mercy.'"

In the name, however, of my brethren and sisters around me, and for them, I forgive you, my friend, and on this spot;" and then lowering her voice to a deep tone, she added, "and may the God whom we love and serve forgive you also; and as He did one of old, make you, Cornelius Fagan, from being a persecutor of His people, and a blasphemous of His name, a faithful servant of that truth which once you would have wickedly destroyed."

Corney at these words bent his head low, and touched, with his lips, the very feet of Sylph. Then looking up into her face he vowed, with streaming eyes, to be her faithful servant and staunch defender forever. Sylph, a few weeks afterward, was in a position to need his services, and to take him literally at his word. Corney became her serving-man, and as the sequel shows gave full proof of his devotedness.

* * * * *

Sylph did not pursue her religious work without constant and vexatious hindrance; and specially from the male members of the Denzille household. Her very presence was a protest against their godless lives and vicious conduct. To carouse was the fashion of the times, and the Denzilles, father and son, fell in with the swinish custom. Too often he was accounted "the best man," not the one who was pure, upright, and under self-control; but the man who most successfully gave the reins to his evil passions, and who, in the barbarous phrase of the time, "could best carry his 'drink.' " The hero of the festal board, in fact, was the brute who fell last beneath the table.

Duelling was also a practice that was fearfully prevalent; indeed, in some districts he was not deemed worthy of being accounted a gentleman who had not, in single combat, shot his man. Mr. Denzille had in his possession a pistol which he valued beyond all price, with certain nicks marked with a file upon the stock, and of grim significance.

Showing it to Sylph one day, with a look of pride upon his countenance, she asked him, in her simplicity, the meaning of those curious notches.

"Well, Sylph," he answered, with an oath, "what a question to put me; you should surely know. Why, each man I shoot, my dear girl. I just put a notch upon the handy weapon that has done the business; and you see there are six of them, no less. I am waiting for a chance to floor the seventh antagonist; and I believe seven, according to Bible authority, Sylph, is the number of perfection: is it not so?—So when that number is reached I'll put my pistol by, for it will then have finished its work, and so should rest from its labors."

With a shudder Sylph drew back from the instrument of murder. She was pained in the very depths of her heart, and horrified, at the deeds it brought up before her imagination, and giving a look of loathing and rebuke at the blood-stained man before her, she felt compelled to say, "In the book you have lightly mentioned, Mr. Denzille, the dreadfully wicked are they 'whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness, and whose feet are swift to shed blood;' and the description, sir, is followed by what they experience. 'Destruction and misery are in their ways, and the way of peace they know not.' You will know, sir, if these last words be true." Then, turning away, she went from the room, and left him to his own reflections.

Mr. Denzille's thoughts, however, were not of sorrow and remorse, because of his shooting through the heart, at twelve paces distance, his boon companion—his neighbor, or it may be, his friend—but of rage at Sylph for her bold remonstrance.

"Upon my word," he said, "but things are coming to a pretty pass. This Methodist devotee affects to scorn and condemn my prowess; and I'm a dreadful wicked man, forsooth, because I am firm and true to a gentleman's code of honor. This canting religion, I believe, would turn us all into cads and poltroons, and would fill the country with a mean set of cowards. But I'll take precious good care," he soliloquized, with an oath, "that it shall not get time or opportunity to do it in Ennisworthy or its neighborhood, for with the help of those who think with me I'll hunt this cursed Methodism to the death from out the whole district!" He felt the need, after this threat, of some occupation to allay his excitement.

"Ho, boy?" he cried to a lad in the next room who acted as page in the household. "Ho, boy! get the eggs quick, for I want my evening's amusement."

It was after dinner as he sat over his usual bowl that he and Sylph had the rencontre we have related. The room in which he "boozed" overlooked the lawn in front of the house; and the pistol practice he desired to begin was of a very effective but singular nature. The boy was required to place a hen's egg at a distance upon the close-shaven grass, and Mr. Denzille's pastime was to shoot a bullet through it.

So true was the aim of the duellist from constant practice that he never missed his diminutive target. Nay, not unfrequently the lad had not taken his finger and thumb from the egg before it was smashed by the well-aimed bullet. At first the lad—as was natural—trembled for his hand; but after a while he got quit of all nervousness, so perfect each day seemed the skill of his half-intoxicated master.*

Excited by his conversation with Sylph, and the strong rebuke she administered to him, Mr. Denzille upon the evening before us prolonged far beyond the usual limit his pistoling, and no less than two dozen eggs were "used up," "keeping his hand in" for his death-dealing accomplishment.

"I wish the eggs had been 'Swaddlers,'" he ejaculated in his rough style, as he closed his sport. "Twenty-four o' them 'ud be gone to kingdom come as sure as my name is Theophilus Denzille. By my word! wouldn't it have been a good 'riddance?' They'd never trouble us more with their religiousness, forcing upon us thoughts that come, in all conscience, time enough for us when we have to leave this world."

From that day forward the Denzille home became such a region of spiteful annoyance and petty persecution that, at last, after long patience and forbearance, Sylph felt herself obliged to inform the trustees appointed in Doctor Gilbert's will of her great unhappiness, and to ask their consent to a change of residence. They were men who did not sympathize with Sylph's religious views; indeed, considered them ignorant and fanatical; but they had a tender regard for one who had been dear to their deceased friend. They consequently wrote back at once, giving the desired permission, and counselled Sylph to return to England.

On many grounds she felt disposed to this step, but important considerations hindered it. She would leave behind her a weak and persecuted band of Christian men and women who sorely needed her counsel and encouragement, and to whom she was lovingly attached. Besides this, he had solemnly consecrated herself to the service of God in Ireland, a country which, as she often stated, she yearned to see, as in ancient days, "an island of saints."

She resolved, therefore, to remain firm at her post, at all events until, from the force of circumstances, she could with a clear conscience leave it. She would take up her abode, however, at a Mr. Somerville's, whose house was nearer the town than her present place of residence, and who was, together with his wife and daughter, in full harmony with Sylph in things religious, and who had been heart and soul with her in all her works of faith and labors of love in Ennisworthy and its neighborhood.

Here she found that peace and quietness after which she had long yearned, and that fellowship of heart which quickened her zeal whenever it flagged, and refreshed when weary her jaded spirit.

Sylph's departure from the house of Mr. Denzille was regarded by him as an insult. He fretted at the first intimation of such an intention on her part, and when the day came that would make her removal an accomplished fact, he by turns scolded and cajoled, threatened and entreated her.

Her going was, in fact, a twofold ground of vexation to the master of Jolly House; he would lose the handsome allowance which Dr. Gilbert had stipulated in his will for Sylph's maintenance. This was bad enough, but worse than this, in his estimation, was the conviction that now all likelihood of his son ever gaining the hand of Sylph, which he had secretly contemplated, had vanished.

"Dear me!" he said, as he stamped on the floor; "the jade is robbing me. In days gone by she got over my poor weak-minded brother, Dr. Gilbert with her sanctimonious look and oily tongue, so that instead of leaving his property to me, the husband of his sister, he made a beggarly foundling the heiress of his estate. And now the miserable pittance, which as a perquisite he reserved for me, she is managing to filch from me."

"Why, it's enough to drive a man mad. Who on earth can stand such bare-faced chicanery, and that too by one who claims to be a saint; but I'll checkmate my lady yet. She's ten times better yet than a bird in the bush; for I resolve that my son Neddy, after all—by hook or crook—shall marry her! Beat me, if you can, my lady!"

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

The Going Forth of the Three Unclean Spirits.
By Rev. M. Baxter.*

The Present Time on the Threshold of Important Events—Exalted Position of the Student of Prophecy—The Time of the End Revealed—The Literal-Day Fulfilment of the Prophecies at Hand—Wars and Warlike Agitation—Preliminary Signs—The Signal for the Final Tribulation—The Concluding Stage of the Second Advent—Wickedness to Increase—Perilous Times Coming.

AT no period in the history of the world have mankind ever stood on the threshold of more eventful changes and mightier revolutions than at present. Empires that have long stood unshaken are about to be dissolved; thrones that have been firmly consolidated for many years are on the point of being cast down; and institutions that have been regarded as of immovable stability are on the eve of their destruction.

Inexpressibly exalted is the position occupied by that individual who, taking these unfoldings of the divine mind as a lamp to his feet and a light to his path, is enabled to contemplate the impressive scene of which this earth will soon be the arena with hopefulness and undisturbed composure, seeing the end from the beginning. It resembles one of the venerable seers of former ages beholding, from the summit of some distant rock, the accomplishment of one of his own predictions. While with solemn awe he rivets his gaze upon the dismantled temples and the desolated habitations of those who once scorned his admonitory voice, but whose pride has been brought low by the retributive judgments of famine, pestilence, or the sword, it transcends the powers of conception to imagine the sublime elevation of his spirit as he witnesses the realization of what had beforehand been portrayed to his divinely illuminated mind, and marks the futility of human opposition to the onward-rolling chariot-wheels of Jehovah's purposes.

Most sublime is the attitude of those who can courageously overstep the limit of the present, and, passing into the unexplored regions of the distant future, can, with the torch of prophetic truth, discover the predestined arrangement of the startling changes that now await this earth. Soaring like eagles above the dense atmosphere of human ignorance, and inspired with the heaven-born gift of prophetic foresight, they pierce with steady gaze into the darkness of futurity, and recognize a systematic and intelligible order in the spectral forms and mystic characters which, to the carnal and gross perceptions of the unenlightened, appear indistinguishably chaotic and confused.

Many persons suppose that

THE TIME OF THE END

of this Dispensation and of the Second Coming of Christ is altogether hidden from human discovery, but "they err, not knowing the Scriptures," which distinctly intimate that the time of the end shall be revealed to watchful Christians by the prophecies.* The text in Mark 13:32, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father," was spoken in the present tense before the ascension and glorification of Christ, and before the Pentecostal descent of the Holy Spirit, and before the gift of the Book of Revelation sixty years afterward.

It is a text that cannot apply to the present time, because it cannot now be said that the Son does not know the day and hour of His own Advent. And in addition to the chronological dates and prophetic signs of the times which convergently indicate the end of this age to be probably about 1890, or within three or four years afterward, there is to be a seven years' covenant made between the Jews and a latter-day Napoleon, exactly seven years and two and a half months before the end, so that the epoch of the consummation will then become very precisely foreshown.

And within this prophetic period of seven years and two and a half months, the greater part of Daniel and Revelation will undergo its ultimate literal-day fulfilment, which has been hitherto foreshadowed by its typical year-day accomplishment by way of rehearsal on the larger scale. The wonderful events that will come to pass at the period of their final crisis may be suitably considered under the classified arrangement of "Forty Coming Wonders."

There is a visible approach of distress of nations with perplexity; the hearts of thoughtful and reflecting persons are failing them for fear of those things that are coming on the earth; and the inquiry instinctively arises, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" But no satisfactory reply can be obtained except from the prophetic predictions in Daniel and Revelation; which conclusively and irresistibly demonstrate that "there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known what shall be in the latter days."

* Amos 3:7; Matt. 24:32-43; John 15:15; 2 Pet. 1:19; 1 Thess. 5:4. The words, "It is not for you to know the times or seasons," were spoken only to the people of those days (Acts 1:7). The prophetic dates of the 6000, 2520, 2500, 2300, 1335, 1260, years (Dan. 4:16; 8:14; 12:7, 12; Rev. 11:3; 12:6, in their year-day fulfilment), all convergently point to the epoch of 1890, as the close of this dispensation. Moreover, the future literal-day fulfilment of Daniel's Sixty-nine Weeks (9:25) will distinctly show the week, if not the day, of Christ's Second Advent, for "from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince (His Second Coming) shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks," i. e., 69 weeks of days, which is just about one year and four months. So that after that decree goes forth, it will be impossible to avoid knowing the week of Christ's Second Advent, which will be 69 weeks after the date of that decree.

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders." By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, 5s.

Our Lord's great prophetic discourse delivered upon the Mount of Olives a few days before His crucifixion, in reply to His disciples' question, "What shall be the sign of Thy Coming and of the end of the world," and recorded in almost identical language in Matthew 24, Mark 13, and Luke 21, predicts, as of the end, "wars and rumors of wars, for nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places. These are the beginnings of sorrows. But the end is not yet."

PRELIMINARY SIGNS

And many false prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many. And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world as a witness unto all nations; then shall the end come." The term "End of the world" in this discourse signifies "End of the age or dispensation," and not of the material physical earth, for the Greek word here translated world is aiōn (age), and not gee or kosmos (earth).

This prophecy indicates that wars, rumors of wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes are to occur during the few years preceding the crisis of the end with unwonted frequency, and in so unusual a degree as to become a distinctly noticeable sign, attracting general attention. At the same time iniquity is to abound, and false doctrines to be widely propagated, although at that very period the true Gospel is to have its most extensive promulgation for a witness among all nations. So that, in fact, increased activity will be displayed both by the powers of darkness and of light. These events, however, will only be the "beginnings of sorrows; and the end is not yet."

For our Lord's prophetic discourse in Matthew 24 proceeds to state that the final great tribulation in its main intensity will not commence until the signal is given by the occurrence of a peculiar event, termed "the setting up of the abomination of desolation," or idol image of the final Personal Antichrist, in the rebuilt Jewish temple, which Daniel (12:11) foretells to take place about three and a half years before the end. The great tribulation, commencing with the setting up of the abomination, will last for three and a half years (Dan. 7:25; 12:7; Rev. 11:2, 3; 12:6, 14; 13:5), and immediately after that tribulation Christ's Advent in the clouds of the heavens takes place. The words in Matthew 24:15-31, are:

"When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place (let him that readeth understand); then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains. . . . For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened. . . . Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And He shall send His angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."*

* Nothing whatever of this passage in Matthew 24:15-31, was fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, or in fact has ever yet been accomplished. "The abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet" has never yet been set up, but is to be set up 1335 literal days before the end of this age and the time of full blessedness (see Daniel 11:31; 12:11, 12). The siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70 greatly resembled and vividly typified its future siege and desolation by the latter-day Franco-Ruman Emperor, whose image, the abomination

This is a description of the concluding stage of Christ's Second Advent after the three and a half years of great tribulation and the darkening of the constellations, when He will descend from the air upon the Mount of Olives, as depicted in Zech. 14:4. The ingathering of His elect to heaven will then be completed, and will be the "harvest" ingathering of the "great multitude who come out of the great tribulation" (Rev. 7:9, 14; 14:15), in contradistinction to the "firstfruits" ingathering to heaven of only 144,000 watchful Christians at the commencing stage of His Second Advent into "the air" before those three and a half years, as described in 1 Thess. 4:16, 17; Rev. 12:5; 14:4; 3:10. The 144,000 are those who obey the injunction, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (Luke 20:36).

The statement in this prophetic discourse, "This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled," is understood by many to signify that the Jewish race or nation (in Greek, genēa) shall not pass away, which is the fact, for notwithstanding their dispersion they still preserve their separate identity; or else it is understood to mean that the generation that witnesses the preliminary signs, "wars, rumors of wars, famines," etc., which are only the "beginnings of sorrows," shall not pass away till all the other events predicted in that Second Advent discourse in Matthew 24 shall be fulfilled.

This latter interpretation harmonizes with the conclusion derived from the chronological dates, that the end of this age will be about A.D. 1890, or within two or three years later, for if we take the estimated average of a generation to be about thirty or forty years, the epoch of 1890 will be reached by the generation that witnessed the Crimean war in 1855, which was the first serious interruption of the forty years' international peace in Europe, from 1815 to 1855,* and which was followed by the battles of Magenta and Solferino between France and Austria, in 1859, and the American Civil War of 1860 to 1864, and the war between Prussia and Austria in 1866, paving the way for subsequent greater wars and rumors of wars.†

We must expect that, as the end approaches, the state of society will more and more resemble what it was in the days of Noah and Lot, when extreme wickedness abounded, and "the earth was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence," and the testimony of Noah, the preacher of righteousness, was generally disbelieved. "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be: they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away." "Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man shall be revealed" (Matt. 24:37-39; Luke 17:26-30).

PERILOUS TIMES

are emphatically predicted by Paul in 2 Tim. 3:1-5, to come in the last days: "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, of desolation, will be set up in the rebuilt Jewish temple for 1290 literal days (Dan. 12:11). But when the Romans in A.D. 70 captured Jerusalem, they burnt down the temple instantly, and no idolatrous abomination stood in it for 1290 days.

* The political earthquake of 1848 internally convulsed France, Prussia, Austria, and Italy—but there was no international war between any of the Great Powers of Europe between 1815 and 1855.

† Since the first edition of this book in 1866, the marvellous Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71 took place, when the German army overthrew the French army at Sedan, September, 1870, and besieged Paris, which surrendered in 1871. Then followed the Communist rebellion in Paris. Spain was the scene of Communist outbreaks in 1872. A great war between Russia and Turkey in 1876-77 was followed by the Treaty of Berlin, and separation of Bulgaria from Turkey, and its formation into a kingdom. There have been also appalling and wide-spread famines in China and India during the last few years.—[Note to fourth edition in 1886.]

fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. From such turn away."

And in 2 Thess. 2: "The day of Christ shall not come, except there come a falling away first (a widespread apostasy from Christian faith), and that man of sin be revealed, sitting in the temple of God (at Jerusalem), showing himself that he is God . . . whom the Lord shall destroy with the brightness of His coming," i.e., His Second Advent. Peter similarly predicts there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, "Where is the promise of His Coming, for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation?" (2 Pet. 3:3).

Three unclean, frog-like, miracle-working demon spirits of Antichristian infidelity, revolutionary democracy, and Popish and Mohammedan crusading fanaticism are predicted under the year-day sixth vial in Rev. 16:12-14, to be the disturbing, intriguing agencies which shall go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the war of the great day of God Almighty, at the same period as the "drying up of the mystic Euphrates," or dissolution of the Turkish Empire, shall be progressing toward its final accomplishment.

12. "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared. 13. And I saw three unclean spirits, like frogs, come out of the mouth of the Dragon, and out of the mouth of the Wild Beast, and out of the mouth of the False Prophet. 14. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the war of that great day of God Almighty. 15. Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame. 16. And they gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon. 17. And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done. 18. And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth so mighty an earthquake, and so great," etc. (Rev. 16:12-18).

This period of the year-day sixth vial and drying up of the Euphrates is generally held to have commenced about the year 1820, and will continue until the dissolution of the Turco-Mohammedan Empire at some point of time between 1882 and 1890, because the predicted 1260 years of the duration of the Mohammedan Antichrist commenced between A.D. 622 and 630, and therefore end between 1882 and 1890.*

The going forth of these three frog-like spirits is announced in the middle of the sixth vial, and it is remarkable that in 1848, nearly midway between 1820 and 1882, they

ALL THREE WENT FORTH

in a very marked manner.

The three respective sources from which the three spirits issue forth are stated to be: 1. The Dragon, which is explained in Rev. 12:9, to be Satan; 2. The Wild Beast with seven heads and ten horns, representing Cæsar's political Roman Empire, which in 1848 was existing under its seventh Napoleonic headship "wounded to death" at Waterloo, but beginning to be healed in that year by Louis Napoleon's election over France as Republican President (Rev. 13:3); 3. The False Prophet or wild beast with two horns, representing the ecclesiastical Roman Empire.

(To be continued.)

* The Mohammedans date their calendar from A.D. 622, the begira or flight of Mahomet. It was not until A.D. 630, however, that they captured Mecca in Arabia, which is the Mohammedan metropolis for pilgrims, the same as Rome is the Roman Catholic metropolis. The Rev. W. Girdlestone, in his "Exposition of the Prophecies," published in 1820, maintained the 1260 years of the Mohammedan Antichrist to commence in A.D. 630, when Mahomet captured Mecca, and therefore to end in 1890. If dated from 626, when the Mohammedans captured Jerusalem, they would end in 1896.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and single copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

In Issuing the First Number of Another volume we tender to our readers one and all our hearty good wishes. During the past year THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been a regular visitor in many thousands of homes throughout the land. With humble thankfulness we are happy to learn that it has been, not only a welcome visitor, but a useful one too, and that God has blessed its pages to the comfort and encouragement of believers and to the conversion of sinners. Week by week during the past year the acquaintance of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers has been renewed; and as it is customary at this season, when friends meet, to exchange the greeting of "a happy new year," that greeting is tendered here, and that too in no mere conventional sense. In the highest and best sense of which the words are capable we desire that blessing for those who read these lines, and we ask in return that in reciprocating the greeting, our readers will pray that during the present year the blessing of God, without which usefulness is impossible, may be upon its pages, and that He will use them increasingly for His glory and for the public good.

The Bills Devised to Deal with the Mormon difficulty which have been presented in Congress, and the numerous articles by able statesmen and journalists which have recently appeared in the public prints, render it obvious that it is impossible to extirpate the evil by legislation and ordinary criminal procedure. To every suggestion made, there are serious objections, and laws specially designed to operate against the scandal in Utah would be prejudicial elsewhere. A conviction is now becoming general that the only efficient measure in the emergency is the application of force, and that the United States troops rather than United States judges and marshals are the proper agents to employ. One thing is certain, the vice and misery of that plague-spot must be cleared out, and it rests with Congress to decide how the work shall be performed.

The Prominent Event in the Guiteau Trial during the past week was the removal of the prisoner from the table where he had previously sat beside his counsel to the dock. The judge, in giving the order for his removal, made an explanation which removes a misapprehension respecting his own conduct, the leniency of which has been misunderstood. He stated that in allowing the prisoner to interrupt the proceedings and to entertain the audience with his miserable jokes he had an object in view, which was that the physicians in attendance might have an opportunity of satisfying themselves as to the sanity of the prisoner; and that in taking that course he had followed the suggestion of the prosecution. It would seem from the evidence, that the use Guiteau has made of his privilege has been prejudicial to himself, for the majority of the physicians who are experts on the malady of insanity have pronounced him sane and have pointed out circumstances and characteristics in his conduct which differ diametrically from the symptoms invariably noticed in an insane person's behavior. Guiteau has repeatedly asked the medical witnesses for their opinion on Abraham's conduct in preparing to offer up Isaac as a sacrifice, being apparently desirous of instituting a parallel between Abraham and himself. He is oblivious of the fact that the act of Abraham was that of a godly man in childlike obedience to the command of God, who talked with him as a man talketh with his friend (James 2:23); while Guiteau, on his own confession was living in sin and was influenced by newspaper representations of the political situation.

Proceedings in the Star-Route Cases are still in contemplation by the government, as we learn from a published letter written by Mr. George Bliss to Mr. James. Subpoenas are ready for issue for sixty witnesses in regard to one of the ring combinations, and cases are being prepared against others. It appears that civil suits for the recovery of the plunder will be instituted, with a fair prospect of success, and Mr. Bliss expresses his belief that the accused parties will obtain no protection from the Statute of Limitations.

At the Important Meetings of the Socialist-Labor Party in New York last week several significant facts were revealed. In the report of the Executive Committee it was admitted that the position of the party is by no means flourishing. A steady decline in numbers and in funds has been going on for five years, and there has been much dissension among the members and a general decrease of enthusiasm. Nearly $20,000 have been lost in the efforts to establish socialist newspapers, and the exchequer has been still further depleted by a remittance of $10,000 to Germany. These facts are rendered still more remarkable when we consider how large a proportion of the immigrants who have landed on our shores are Germans, who are supposed to be more favorably inclined toward socialism than those of other nationalities. One reason for the decline is probably that skilled artisans are better paid now than for some time past and are consequently less amenable to the wiles of professional agitators. But whatever may be the causes of the decline the result is very gratifying and augurs well for continued national prosperity.

A Fatal Explosion Occurred at West Point, Va., on December 26th, on board the steamer West Point while she was being unloaded at her dock. The steamer plies between that port and Baltimore, and arrived at West Point December 25th. The work of discharging her cargo was commenced at noon the next day, and after two hours' labor those on the dock heard a terrific explosion, and almost instantly the forward part of the vessel was a mass of flame. There were twelve colored men in the forward hold at the time, all of whom were either killed by the explosion or burned to death. Five other men were aft stowing cotton. These jumped overboard, and four of them were drowned. When it was found that there was no hope of saving the steamer, she was cut loose from the wharf, and the tide carried her two miles up the Pamunkey River, where she continued to burn until everything combustible was destroyed, and her iron hull was broken in two amidships. The cargo of the steamer comprised, among other merchandize, sixty barrels of gasoline and several hundred barrels of oil. These doubtless originated the disaster, but how it occurred is unknown, those who alone were in a position to know the circumstances having lost their lives in the explosion.

Rev. Leonard Bacon D.D., LL.D. Died Suddenly at his home in New Haven, on December 24th, at the advanced age of eighty years. He had suffered for some years from disease of the heart, which ultimately proved fatal. His long life had been one of ceaseless activity, and for more than half a century he had been on the platform, in the pulpit, and in the press one of the most conspicuous men of the day. He was born at Detroit, graduated at Yale and Andover, and in March, 1825, accepted the pastorate of the First Congregational Church at New Haven, a position he occupied for more than forty years. In 1866 he became Professor of Systematic Theology at Yale College, and in 1871 he exchanged that chair for that of Church Polity and American Church History in the same college. He was a regular contributor to several journals, and his articles were always read with interest and profit. Notwithstanding the multiplicity of his engagements he found time to write many important works, among which were, "The Select Practical Writings of Richard Baxter," "A Manual for Young Church Members," and "Christian Self-Culture." He was elected in 1878 to bear the greetings of the Congregational Council to the Reunited Assembly at Pittsburg, and his associations with the leaders in the great national struggle eminently fitted him for the purpose. His death is deeply mourned by all his fellow-laborers, who loved him more as they knew more of him.

A Movement to Promote the Emigration of women from Great Britain to Canada has been inaugurated in London. The Marquis of Lorne presided on December 14th at an influential meeting in Exeter Hall in aid of the movement. He said he thought that committees sending women to Canada should have affiliated committees in Canada, who should send reports to London monthly. He specially dwelt upon the capabilities of the Northwest of supporting a larger population and suggested that arrangements be made for the organization of committees in centres of population with the view of encouraging emigration of women. It is certain that thousands of females in England would hail with delight an opportunity to remove to Canada if they could be assured of protection and employment when they arrived.

Some Excitement has been Caused in Paris by a trial in which M. Rochefort, the noted Socialist journalist, was defendant. He was charged with libelling the French Minister at Tunis. The government undertook the prosecution of M. Rochefort, but the judges decided that the aggrieved minister must prosecute in person, and he came back from Tunis to perform that duty. The trial lasted several days and ended, to the surprise of the public, in a verdict of acquittal, with an order that the minister should pay the cost of the trial.

Among the Foreign Topics of the Week are the following items of intelligence: The British press is still criticising Mr. Blaine's despatch on the subject of the Panama Canal, and The Spectator, a journal usually disinclined to assume a hostile attitude toward the United States, says it hopes that Lord Granville, in replying, will notice the extraordinary discourtesy of Mr. Blaine's tone, and affirms that it is nearly impossible to do business with a government which admits and repudiates in the same breath treaty rights, and addresses vaunting paragraphs about its limitless, irresistible military strength to a Power whose rights on the American continent are older than the United States.—Mr. Gladstone, replying to a correspondent who had called attention to the fact that bands of Mormon missionaries visit Great Britain annually, decoying thousands of young persons to a life of immorality in Utah, and inquired if the government could not do something to prevent the practice, says he fears it is not a matter wherein he can interfere, as it is to be presumed that the young persons go voluntarily. He apparently forgets that the government is bound to prevent impostors inveigling its subjects out of property and liberty.—The Emperor of Austria has resolved to erect at his own cost a memorial chapel on the site of the burned Ring Theatre for the victims of the fire.—Emigration from Germany, large as it was last year, promises to be still larger in 1882. Fourteen thousand tickets have already been taken for transportation by vessels leaving Bremen for America in the spring. Almost an equal number of emigrants will go from Hamburg.—Much excitement has been caused at Gratz by a nun, detained against her will, leaping from a convent wall into a stream, from which, however, she was rescued.—More seizures of arms and Land League journals are reported from Ireland, and Dublin has been proclaimed afresh.

The First Chinese Lady of Rank who has ever visited the United States is the wife of the new Chinese Minister, Chang Tsao Ju, who arrived from his own country and took up his residence in Washington last week. In consequence of some objection or prejudice, the women of China are interdicted from going abroad, whence it happens that while Chinamen emigrate in large numbers to different parts of the world, a Chinese woman, even of the lower orders, is very rarely seen except by going to China. So the arrival of a lady of rank from the Celestial Empire is a remarkable event indeed, and speaks a great deal either for the intelligence of her husband or for the growth of enlightenment among the ruling powers of China. The new minister is said to be a noble of the most exalted rank in his own country, and his lady is "attractive, having a very fair complexion and black hair and eyes, small in stature and apparently about twenty-five years of age." Her only head-dress is a bunch of bright-colored flowers.

A Case of Attempted Substitution Failed in New York last week. On Wednesday, December 28th, a criminal was sent to the Island for selling policy slips, whose bondsmen had previously surrendered another man in his stead. It does not appear from the reports whether the trick was devised by the criminal to save his liberty, or by the bondsmen to save their money. But in any case it did not succeed, for our laws, unlike those of China, demand that the penalty shall be suffered by the man who committed the crime. Human justice could not be so satisfied, or wealthy criminals might escape every punishment by a mere fine. The sinner who is saved from eternal punishment through the merits of his Substitute is saved by the grace of God, who gave His only begotten Son to die that through Him the world might have life (John 3:16).

A Ghastly Spectacle was Witnessed in Jersey City on Monday, December 26th. Two drunken men were seen staggering toward the police station on Grove Street supporting between them a helpless figure. They dragged it as well as they were able along two blocks, and when they arrived at the station they rang the bell. It was then seen that what they were conducting was the corpse of a man recently dead of malignant small-pox, who in his delirium had left his bed and wandering in the streets had fallen dead on the pavement. The drunken men supposing the recumbent figure to be a man affected with a later stage of their own complaint, conceived the idea of escorting him to the police station, and being too drunk to understand what they were doing, carried out their purpose. When they were made to comprehend the risk they had incurred they were horrified; they lost no time in procuring disinfectants to try to obviate the consequences of their folly. If the sinner could see in the light of God's countenance what a loathsome burden is the sin he bears about with him day by day while he is unforgiven, his terror would be more intense even than that of these foolish men, and he would be still more eager to be delivered by the cleansing blood of the Saviour (Isa. 1:6).

Some Curious Discoveries have been Made by the Russian officials ordered by the Czar to prepare for his occupation the Winter Palace, in which the explosion occurred that destroyed the dining-room during the lifetime of the late Czar. The palace was crowded with people who in different ways had managed to secure free quarters there, and it resembled a hotel rather than a palace, the arrangements displaying a laxity of control which shows how corrupt is official life in Russia. "When the huge block of rooms was cleared, a number of people were found in them," says a newspaper correspondent, "whose existence appears to have been completely unknown to the police. Besides the imperial service of aides-de-camp, gentlemen and ladies-in-waiting, besides the men-servants, chambermaids, and porters, whose names are all registered in the steward's book, there were a number of other people who had come with favorites of former Czars, and who had forgotten to leave when their masters left. These people came and went, ate, drank and slept, were married, died, and were succeeded without attracting anybody's notice. It is thus that something or somebody was found on every floor, in every corner, under and even over the roof. They actually found a cow grazing on the top of the roof. The cow had a shed for the winter. Nobody knows how the animal got there, but it is supposed she was brought there quite young, and that her milk was sold by some enterprising speculator to the inhabitants of the palace."

How Christian Ministers may Aid their brethren who are laboring among many discouragements in the places where Mormonism is rampant, is pointed out in an appeal just issued by Bishop Tuttle, of Utah, and indorsed by ministers of all the evangelical denominations. The appeal is for prayer, sympathy, and practical effort. The bishop and his co-laborers urge that ministers exert on the Congressmen of their respective districts all the influence they command, in order that the evils of the present condition of things may be remedied at the coming session of Congress. They state that in Utah, out of a population of 143,000 about 110,000 are adherents of Mormonism. That in Idaho the balance of power is now in Mormon hands, and that in Wyoming, Arizona, and Southern Colorado the Mormons have established a strong footing. It is well that Christian citizens should realize what this rapid growth of Mormonism portends, and give a cordial and active response to the appeal made by the Utah clergymen.

Coffee Rooms do good in Heathen Countries as well as in Europe. A communication from Calcutta, the capital of British India, says: "Not far from the new Hastings coffee rooms is a liquor saloon which last year paid to Government Rs. 200 (i.e. $100) monthly, for its license. At the beginning of the present year the license was put up at auction in the usual way, but no bid could be secured at all. The liquor-selling fraternity were loud in their complaints against the coffee rooms, but Government accepted the damage to the revenue. Near the Lal Bazaar coffee rooms two prominent liquor saloons have recently been closed, and a revenue official said to me not long ago, not regretfully, 'You have simply ruined the street.' These saloons used to be frequented by Europeans and Eurasians. It remains now to hit upon some plan for counteracting the purely native drinking places. Ordinary natives will not drink tea or coffee, and it does not yet appear how a substitute for their liquor can be found, but a way will be discovered. The devil never built and never will be able to build, an impregnable fortress. His strongest and highest walls can be either breached or scaled. Would that all Christian soldiers knew this."

Two Young Heroines Saved the Lives of seven young men on December 16th on the Ottawa River, Canada. A special service was being held on that evening at the church on Gatineau Point, and a party of seven young men who live several miles down the Ottawa River, started to attend the meeting, and decided, the river being frozen, to skate to the place. When they arrived opposite Kettle Island they happened to reach a piece of bad ice and five of the party fell through. The other two did the best they could to rescue their comrades, but after they had got several of them out, the ice on which they were standing gave way, and they themselves got into the water. Two Misses O'Neil, daughters of Superintendent O'Neil, of the Dominion Police, witnessed the accident from their house on Kettle Island, and with great presence of mind these two young ladies ran for their father's boat, which they pushed across the ice until they came to the broken spot, when they launched it and succeeded in rescuing the young men who were in the water. They were not a moment too soon, for one of the young men was utterly exhausted and was taken out of the water senseless. An act of heroism such as that deserves public recognition. The rescue is remarkable because the young ladies succeeded where the young men failed. The reason was that they had a boat while the young men were unaided. We see the same effect in rescues from moral peril. Those who attempt to save others in their own strength fail, while those who rely on the Life Boat of the Gospel succeed (Acts 3:12, 16).

FOUR CHOICE SENTENCES.

A Short Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

I. Present Blessing—"I am With Thee"—A Blessing Inherited—The Heraldry of the Saints—No Hereditary Piety—Present when Needed—What the Blessing Meant—Infinite Love—Practical Help—II. Future Blessing—"I Will be With Thee"—A Venturesome Journey—Renewal of Promise—Jonah's Return by an Unexpected Route—III. Experienced Blessings—God "Hath been With Me"—Jacob a Rare Business Man—Child-like Faith Conquers—IV. Transmitted Blessing—"God Shall be With You"—A Father's Anxiety—A Bereaved Church in Dread—God Provides—A Question George Muller has Nothing to do with—How Apostolic Succession is Kept Up.

MY discourse this evening will scarcely be a sermon—it will be expository rather of the life and experience of Jacob upon one point. In order to bring it out I shall want four texts, but lest you should let any one of them slip, I will give them to you one at a time.

I. First, turn to the twenty-eighth chapter of Genesis, at the fifteenth verse, and read of present blessing. The Lord said to His servant Jacob,

"BEHOLD, I AM WITH THEE."

Jacob was the inheritor of a great blessing from his fathers, for this sentence was spoken in connection with the following words, "I am the Lord God of Abraham, thy father, and the God of Isaac." It is an inexpressible privilege, dear friends, to be able to look back to father and grandfather, and perhaps farther still, and to say, "We come of a house which has served the Lord as far back as history can inform us." Descended from Christians, we have a greater honor than being descended from princes. There is no heraldry like the heraldry of the saints. Jacob might be very thankful that, as God had blessed Abraham and had blessed Isaac, so He blessed him in the same way, speaking to him in the same terms as He had spoken to them, for He had expressly said to each of them, "I am with thee."

Are any of you the children of godly parents, and has the Lord called you by His grace? Then bless His name, and take heed that you do nothing to dishonor an estate so honorable. Try and maintain, as long as you live, the good repute which in infinite love God has put upon your household. Are you, however, a child of godly parents and not yet converted? I would warn you against putting the slightest reliance upon your birth; for, remember, if Isaac was the child of Abraham, so also was Ishmael, but no blessing came to Ishmael of a spiritual kind. It is in vain to be born of blood, or of the will of the flesh; we must be born again from above.

God is a sovereign, He is not bound to dispense His favors from father to son; and when He does so, we are to admire His grace. Do not imagine that there is such a thing as hereditary piety; it must be wrought in each individual by the self-same Spirit. Still, it is one of the highest privileges that God has ever been pleased to grant to me that I can rejoice in a father and a grandfather who trained me in the fear of God; and I congratulate every young person who has such a pedigree. God bless you. Be not satisfied unless you yourself obtain such mercy as God gave to your ancestors, and hear the Lord saying, "I am with thee."

This mercy was brought home to Jacob at a time when he greatly needed it. He had just left his father's house, and he felt himself alone. He was coming into special trial, and then it was that he received a fuller understanding of the privilege which God had in store for him. Let me read the words to you—"I am with thee." I have tried to think them out that I might speak concerning them to you; but they are too full. I defy anybody to measure their height and depth, their length and breadth. That God should give to Jacob bread to eat and raiment to put on was much, but it is nothing compared with "I am with thee." That God should send His angel with Jacob to protect him would have been much; but it is nothing compared with, "I am with thee."

This includes countless blessings, but it is in itself a great deal more than all the blessings we can conceive of. There are many fruits that come of it, but the tree that yields them is better than the fruit. "I am with thee." Will God in very deed dwell with men upon the earth? Will God walk with a man, and speak with him? "Lord, what is man, that Thou art mindful of him; and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" And yet He says, "I am with thee."

Why, when God is with a man there is a familiarity of condescension that is altogether unspeakable: it insures an infinite love. "I am with thee." God will not dwell with those He hates. He putteth away the wicked of the earth like dross. He saith to them, "Depart; I never knew you;" but to each one of His people He saith, "I know thee by thy name; thou art mine. And, more than that, I am with thee." As a man delights to be with a friend, so are the delights of Christ with the sons of men, whom He has chosen and redeemed with blood.

"I am with thee"—it means

PRACTICAL HELP.

Whatever we undertake, God is with us in the undertaking; whatever we endure, God is with us in the enduring; whithersoever we wander, God is with us in our wandering. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" If God be with us, can we ever be exiled or banished? If God be with us, what can we not do? If God be with us, what can we not endure? Well, said the apostle, as if answering that question, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." "I am with thee."

Come, brother or sister, if thou wouldst get the fulness of this privilege, believe that God is near thee now, near to thee as he that sits at thy side; nay, nearer; for he is so with thee as to be in thee. And dost thou know that His whole Godhead is with thee? "I am with thee;" as if there were not another, the whole Godhead is with thee. Thou hast not to cry aloud like Baal's priests, or cut thyself with knives, that thou mayest attract His eye; for He says, "I am with thee." Thy sighs He hears; thy tears He puts into His bottle. "I am with thee." And thou hast not His presence only, but His sympathy; He means, I am feeling with thee, suffering with thee. If there be a load, I bear it with thee; if there be work to do, I will work with thee. Ye are workers together with God. Beloved, said I not rightly that I can never open up all this to you?

How precious it must have seemed as it came to Jacob in that den of a place, where he lay with the hedges for his curtains, the heavens for his canopy, the earth for his bed, stones for his pillow, and God for his companion. "I am with thee." "Tomorrow when thou shalt open thine eyes thou wilt look back to the west and say, 'I have left my father's house and my mother, Rebecca, behind me;' and the tears will be in thy eyes; and thou wilt look to the east and say, 'I am going to the house of my mother's kindred, and I know them not, save that I have heard concerning uncle Laban that he is hard and grasping; and I know not how he will receive me.'" But is not that a precious thing to start upon a journey with—"I am with thee"—I, the ever blessed?

Is any young friend here who is leaving home? Are you going away for the first time, and do you feel sad? Or are you about to emigrate to a distant country, and does your heart feel heavy? Do not go at all till you can get a hold of this, "I am with thee." Say unto the Lord, "If Thy Spirit go not with me, carry me not up hence." Wait till He gives the answer, "My Spirit shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." This ought to be the blessing of your opening life, "I am with thee." Is God with you to-night? Can God be with you? Some come to service after having quarrelled with their wives and families; God is not with them. People who are following ill trades, and living ill lives, and rejecting the Gospel, God cannot be with them. "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" If you are a believer in Christ, and the Spirit of God has produced in you the true fruits of the Spirit, then you may say, "He is with me;" but not else.

II. Now turn to the thirty-first chapter of Genesis, at the third verse, and read these words,

"I WILL BE WITH THEE."

We will call this future blessing. It is almost unnecessary to take this second text; for if it is written, "I am with thee," you may depend upon it that He will be with us, for God does not forsake His people. Some people believe in a God who loves to-day and hates to-morrow; who pardons sin and yet afterward condemns. Such a God is not my God; for mine is unchangeable.

"Whom once He loves He never leaves,
But loves them to the end."

"I am God; I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed."

Poor Jacob had been living with Laban, and had passed through many messes and troubles, and it was time that he should receive the word of blessing over again. We read that, "Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, and, behold, it was not toward him as before." He had begun to take root in the worldling's portion, and was willing to stop away from the promised land, and build up a family among his worldly connections; but the Lord practically said to him, "This is not your rest." Laban's sons begin to growl as they see how their brother-in-law's flocks have increased, and therefore the time has come for Jacob to go.

Jacob does not like it; he never did like moving. Family connections, a host of children, and a mighty crowd of cattle, made a removal a great undertaking. Then the Lord said to him, "I will be with thee;" as much as to say, "I will be more with thee in Canaan than I ever have been in this place, which is not the land of promise. I will give thee My special presence if thou wilt get away into the place of the separated life, and walk with Me as thy father Isaac did." It was very sweet many years ago to some of us to hear the Lord say, "I am with thee," and to know that it was true; for "truly our fellowship was with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ;" but it may at this hour be very opportune if the Lord should renew His promise to us by saying, "I will be with thee."

You are commencing a new form of life, you are entering on new trials, you are undertaking new duties, and now comes in

THE NEW PROMISE,

"I will be with thee." If those upon whom you had a right to rely have turned against you, if those who were really indebted to you have become envious of you—"yet, nevertheless," saith God, "I will be with thee."

Jacob's journey was to be a very venturesome one. He knew that Laban would not like it, and, probably, would pursue him; but God says "Go, and I will be with thee." He knew also that his brother Esau would be pretty sure to take vengeance upon him for the sorry trick he had played him; and that touched his conscience, and he feared and trembled; but God said, "I will be with thee." The plainest road in the world is wrong if God does not bid us take it; and the roughest and most unpromising way will turn out to be safe and right if God commands our journey.

Jonah thought it was all right to go to Tarshish; but God was not with him, and he came back by a route which he never expected to follow. If you go your own road, I wish you may be fortunate enough to meet with as good a return conveyance as Jonah did, for you will certainly have to come back. But if the road be never so rough, if it be God's road, you shall run over it like a young roe; God will make your feet like hinds' feet, and you shall tread upon your high places. "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days, so shall thy strength be." Only mind that you follow a road in which God can be with you; for there are some ways in which God will never be found. He cannot walk in the ways of sin, or worldliness, or self-seeking; if we choose these we must go alone.

See, then, the promised mercy, and rejoice in it. Go forward, dear child of God, if the pillar of cloud is moving, without the slightest hesitancy, and let this be thy joy and comfort—"Certainly, I will be with thee. In all places whithersoever thou goest I will be with thee."

III. I want to go a step further, and come, in the third place, to experienced blessings. Let us look at Jacob's experience. Did Jacob find God to be with him? He had a long life and a tried one. He was a man that knew a great deal, and men that know a great deal are doubly likely to meet with great trouble. Cunning, wise, crafty, prudent, self-reliant people frequently flounder out of one slough into another. Above all things, I should dread being partner with a man that is over wise, for such men either make fools of themselves, or else they have to sleep with one eye open.

Jacob's cunning was an injury to him in the long run. Abraham was simple as a child; he believed God, and never stooped to a trick; and therefore his life was a noble one. Jacob was a very wise person, the kind of gentleman to have made a financier, or the manager of a company. He was a rare man of business; in fact, he was the father of the Jews, and that is saying a great deal. Yet because of his sharpness he was often robbed, and through his cunning he was overreached; and he did not, after all, so much enjoy life, and was neither so rich nor so happy as his simple-minded grandfather, Abraham.

We will, however, hear what Jacob has to say about these two gracious words of God, "I am with thee," and "I will be with thee." Turn to the thirty-first chapter again, and read the fifth verse. Up to as far as the time that he was about to leave Laban, he says, "The God of my father HATH BEEN WITH ME."

I have read that testimony with great joy. I thought of Jacob thus—Well, you certainly were not eminent for grace while with Laban. You were plotting and scheming—you against Laban and Laban against you; and yet your witness is, "The God of my father hath been with me." This is all the more encouraging as coming from you. Jacob seems to say of his God: It was He that gave me my wife and my children; it was He that prospered me in the teeth of those who tried to rob me; the God of my father hath been with me notwithstanding all my shortcomings. I trust that some of you can bear the like witness. Though you have not been all that you could wish in the Christian life, yet you can say, "The God of my father has been with me."

Now, we will look at him a little further on, in the thirty-fifth chapter, and the third verse; there we shall find him saying, "Let us arise, and go up to Bethel; and I will make there an altar unto God, who answered me in the day of my distress, and was with me in the way which I went."

As I have already said, he left Laban's house; and it was a very venturesome journey, but God was with him; Jacob tells us that so it was. Poor Jacob was full of fear when he heard that Esau was coming to meet him. You can see that by the way in which he divided his flocks and his herds, and set apart so large a present for Esau. But God does not leave his people because of their fears. I am so thankful for that. If He were to cast us off because of our unbelief, is there one of us who would not have been cast off long ago?

There was Peter walking on the waters with a brave faith; was not Christ with him? Yes, or else he could not have stood on the wave at all. By and by his faith failed him, and down went Peter; but did Christ give him up and say, "You shall die; according to your unbelief shall it be unto you?" No, there is not such a word as that in the Bible; but it is written, "According to thy faith shall it be unto thee." Jesus stretched out His hand and grasped sinking Peter, saying, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" So, though you may grieve the Lord by doubting and fearing, and though you ought to be ashamed of yourself for so doing, yet, still, He will not forsake you. If there is faith in your heart, though it be but little, you shall have to say, despite your doubts and fears, "The Lord was with me in the day of my distress, and was with me in the way which I went."

There was a night of wrestling with Jacob. His faith enabled him to draw near to God in mighty prayer, and his fear made him the more desperate and importunate. He said, "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me." Though he had to be importunate, yet it was not because God was against him, but because God was with him; for he that can exercise importunate prayer proves that God is with him strengthening him thus to supplicate. His wrestlings ended in his victory.

On that day, too, I have no doubt, Jacob was very much cast down, because he remembered his sin. He knew he had ill-treated Esau, and robbed him of the blessing; but, for all that, he came with a repentant heart to submit himself before his brother and to do what he could to please him. Because of this, God was with him. Oh, in that day, dear child of God, when you remember your faults, and your heart is heavy, do not think that the Lord has left you. It is one token that He is with you that He makes you confess your sin, and humble yourself before Him. Still believe in Him; still hear His word; and you shall have to say, "He was with me in the way which I went."

At the close of his life we find Jacob more fully than ever confessing that the presence of God had been with him. I read you the passage where he wished that the God that had been with him might be with his grandsons in the selfsame way—the forty-eighth chapter, at the fifteenth and sixteenth verses. "He blessed Joseph, and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads." There is to the faithfulness of God.

HIS LAST TESTIMONY

He had lost Rachel—oh, how it stung his heart; but he says, "God redeemed me from all evil." There had come a great famine in the land; but he says that God had fed him all his life long. He had lost Joseph, and that had been a great sorrow; but now, in looking back, he sees that even then God was redeeming him from all evil. He said once, "Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away; all these things are against me;" but now he eats his words, and says, "The Lord hath redeemed me from all evil." He now believes that God had been always with him, had fed him always, and blessed him always.

Now, mark you, if you trust in God, this shall be your verdict at the close of life. When you come to die you shall look back upon a life which has not been without its trials and its difficulties, but you shall bless God for it all; and if there is any one thing in life for which you will have to praise God more than for another, it will probably be that very event which seems darkest to you. Did God ever do a better thing for Jacob than when he took Joseph away and sent him to Egypt to preserve the whole family alive? It was the severest trial of the poor old man's career, and yet the brightest blessing after all. Can you not believe it? Inside that hard-shelled nut there is the sweetest kernel that you have tasted. Rest assured of that. Your father's rumbling wagons have woke you out of sleep, and you are frightened at them; but they are loaded with ingots of gold. You never have been so rich as you will be after your great trouble shall have passed away.

IV. It is time for me to conclude, and I do so by bringing before you, in the fourth place, one more word of blessing. We have had present blessing; we have had future blessing; we have had experienced blessing three times over; and now we go to transmitted blessing; for we find Jacob transmitting the blessing to his son and to his grandson. Read in the forty-eighth chapter, at the twenty-first verse, "Behold, I die: but

GOD SHALL BE WITH YOU."

I commenced by noticing the blessing which passed on from Abraham to Isaac; and now we see that Jacob hands it on to Joseph, to Manasseh, and to Ephraim, "I die: but God shall be with you." Some of you perhaps are thinking, "We are getting near the end of life; we have children, but they are not all converted yet, and those that are, it may be, are dependent upon us; what will become of them?" Do you think God will leave your children? Cannot you trust them with Him? What did your father do with his son? One after another the former generations have passed away, and the Lord has been faithful to their successors. Do you think He will not be faithful to those who come next? You have brought up your children in His fear; you have rested upon His name, and therefore you may say to them, "I die: but God shall be with you."

The time will come when we who are ministers shall be taken away from our beloved work on earth, and we cannot help thinking about the dear friends who hang upon our lips and depend upon our ministry. It is well for us to look a little forward and say, "I die: but God shall be with you." My venerated predecessor, Dr. Rippon, many a time prayed for his successor. I am sure he did not know who his successor was to be, for I was born about the time when he was dying; but, doubtless, I inherit that good man's prayers. I am sure I do. "I die," the old man might have said, "but God shall be with you." The Church at New Park Street thought it an awful thing for the old gentleman to die; but he would have been of no service to us if he had remained here forever. And so it will be by and by. People say, "What will the Tabernacle people do if they lose their minister?" It will probably be the greatest of blessings when it happens.

Many good men have clung to their places longer than they should have done, and have pulled down much that they had built up. It is well when the Lord says to such, "Friend,

COME UP HIGHER."

We may look forward each one to leaving our class, or to leaving the church over which we watch, or to leaving the great work over which we preside and we may say, "I die: but God shall be with you." God is not limited to one minister or fifty ministers. When we are gone, God will be with you.

They used to say of our dear friend, George Müller, "What will become of the Orphanage when Mr. Müller is laid aside?" When I was speaking to him, he said to me, "That was a question which I felt George Müller had nothing to do with. God will use George Müller as long as He likes, and when He chooses to put him aside, He will use somebody else." And now, mark, George Müller is not at Bristol. He has been all over Europe preaching, and the Orphanage has had very little of his personal presence, and yet it has gone on without George Müller, so far. Such a fact tends to answer idle questions.

Blessed be the everlasting God—if Abraham dies, there is Isaac; and if Isaac dies, there is Jacob; and if Jacob dies, there is Joseph; and if Joseph dies, Ephraim and Manasseh survive. The Lord shall never lack a champion to bear His standard high among the sons of men. Only let us pray God to raise up more faithful ministers. That ought to be our prayer day and night.

We have plenty of a sort, but, oh, for more that will weigh out sixteen ounces to the pound of Gospel in such a way that people will receive it. We have too much of fine language, too much of florid eloquence, and too little full and plain gospel preaching; but God will keep up the apostolic succession, never fear for that. When Stephen is dying, Paul is not far off. When Elijah is taken up, he leaves his mantle behind him. "I die: but God shall be with you." Take comfort, dear friends, and may His Spirit be with you, through Jesus Christ, His dear Son, whose name is "Emmanuel"—God with us.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—
Genesis 28.]

LUTHER NAILING HIS THESES TO THE CHURCH DOOR AT WITTEMBERG.

(See Illustration, page 12.)

AMONG all the abominations by which the Church of Rome outraged the spirit of Luther, none was more hateful to him than the sale of indulgences, or pardons for sin, granted by the Pope of Rome, and to be had on payment of a specific sum of money. This traffic, in the year 1517, had assumed a peculiarly revolting form in the hands of John Tetzel, a Dominican monk, whose name and deeds are inseparably associated with the life of Luther.

The indulgences in Germany were farmed out by the Papacy to Albert, Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, who by his boundless extravagance and luxury had involved himself deeply in debt. In order to meet his difficulties he sought out a man specially fitted to push the sale of indulgences with unwonted zeal, and found such a man in Tetzel, who, it is said, "had the voice of a town crier, and the eloquence of a mountebank. The resources of his invention, the power of his effrontery, and the efficacy of his indulgences were all alike limitless." He made a progress through Germany. The line of the procession, as it moved from place to place, might be traced at a distance by the great red cross, which was carried by Tetzel himself, and on which were suspended the arms of the Pope. In front of the procession, on a velvet cushion, was borne the Pontiff's Bull of grace; in the rear came the mules laden with bales of pardons to be given, not to those who had penitence in the heart, but to those who had money in the hand.

When he entered a city, Tetzel and his company went straight to the cathedral. The crowd pressed in and filled the church. The cross was set up in front of the high altar, a strong iron box was fixed down beside it, in which the money received for pardons was deposited; and Tetzel, in the garb of the Dominicans, mounting the pulpit, began to set forth with stentorian voice, the incomparable merit of his wares. After describing in most graphic and harrowing words the sufferings of departed sinners, he would exclaim: "At the very instant that the money rattles at the bottom of the chest, the soul escapes from Purgatory, and flies liberated to heaven. Now you can ransom so many souls, stiff-necked and thoughtless men; with twelve groats you can deliver your father from purgatory, and you are ungrateful enough not to save him! I shall be justified in the Day of Judgment, but you, you will be punished so much the more severely for having neglected so great salvation." Crowds repaired to his market wherever he appeared. Tetzel and his indulgences became the talk of almost all Germany.

The brazen monk had set up his red cross at Jüterbock, a small town on the Saxon frontier, within an hour and a half's walk of Wittemberg. The spirit of Luther was stirred within him, and he said, "By the help of God, I will make a hole in his drum." Luther, who acted as confessor as well as preacher, soon found what moral havoc Tetzel's pardons were working. When people came to confess to Luther, he said: "You must leave off your evil courses, or I cannot absolve you." But they soon told him that they had no thought of leaving off their sins, for they were already pardoned; and the people pulled out the indulgence papers of Tetzel. Luther told them those papers were worthless, that they must repent and be forgiven by God, or they would perish everlastingly. This soon reached the ears of Tetzel, who foamed with rage, and causing a fire to be kindled in the market-place of Jüterbock, gave a sign of what would be done to the man who should obstruct his holy work. He had authority of the Pope to commit all such heretics to the flames.

Nothing daunted by Tetzel's bluster, Luther warned the people in private and from the pulpit, with all boldness and fidelity, against the shameless practices of Tetzel. The festival of All Saints' was at hand, and as crowds visited Wittemberg on that occasion, Luther resolved, in the most public manner, to denounce Tetzel's nefarious traffic. Accordingly, he wrote out ninety-five "Theses" or propositions on the doctrine of indulgences, and pushing his way through the crowd, boldly nailed the paper to the door of the Castle-Church (as represented in our engraving).

These propositions Luther undertook to defend next day in the University against all who might choose to impugn them. The "Theses" described Tetzel's indulgences as a cheat and a delusion, and set forth the contrast between God's free gift and the miserable imposture of man's avarice. We have no space for further particulars, but may say, in brief, that the nailing of those "Theses" to the church door kindled a fire, by the light of which the dark abominations of Rome stood revealed to all the world, and set in motion moral and spiritual forces, by which, ere long, the proud Papacy was shaken to its base.

Luther Nailing his Theses to the Church Door at Wittenberg.—(See page 11.)

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS OF THE STORY.

ROLAND SEFTON was the managing partner in an English bank. Mr. Clifford, the senior partner, was an old man who usually lived abroad. He had been the intimate friend and partner of Roland's father, and in his old age he was content to leave the management of the bank in Roland's hands. Felicitia, Roland's wife, a niece of Lord Riversford, was an aristocratic young lady without fortune but possessed of literary talent. They had two children, Hilda and Felix, whom Roland tenderly loved. In trying to increase his income, principally in order that his wife might not miss any of the luxuries to which she had been accustomed, he engaged in speculations which ended disastrously. To make up his losses he appropriated, and sold certain securities valued at $50,000 belonging to Mr. Clifford, and $3,000 intrusted to his care by old Marlowe, a deaf and dumb wood carver whom he had made his friend. To escape the detection that would follow Mr. Clifford's return he absconded. By the aid of the old wood carver and his daughter Phebe, to whom he confessed his guilt, he got safely away to Switzerland, the native land of his aged mother, who lived in his family and was known as "Madame," in allusion to her foreign birth. The news of his flight was received by his wife just as she was reading her first published work. Roland when parting from Phebe Marlowe sent by her a message to his wife, asking her to meet him at Engelberg in Switzerland, in six months. The appointment was kept. Felicitia, however, could not forgive him the disgrace he had brought on her and the children, and intimated that his death would be a good thing for them. With her approval an unknown Englishman who had died the day before in the village was represented as Roland Sefton. Roland was the only person present when he died, and he placed in the dead man's pocket his own pocketbook, papers, and the portraits of his children to give a false identification. The man was accordingly buried as Roland Sefton, and the news of his death sent to England. Meanwhile Roland resolved to support himself by wood carving.

(Continued from page 829.)

The Dead areForgiven.

ROLAND SEFTON'S pocketbook, containing his passport and the papers and photographs, had reached Mr. Clifford the day before, with an official intimation of his death from the consulate at Berne. The identification was complete, and the inquiry into the fatal accident had resulted in blame to no one, as the traveller had declined the services of a trustworthy guide from Meiringen to Engelberg. This was precisely what Roland would have done, the whole country being as familiar to him as to any native. No doubt crossed Mr. Clifford's mind that his old friend's son had met his untimely end while a fugitive from his country, from dread chiefly of his own implacable sense of justice.

Roland was dead; but justice was not satisfied. Mr. Clifford knew perfectly well that the news of his tragic fate would create an immediate and complete reaction in his favor among his fellow-townsmen. Hitherto he had been only vaguely accused of crime, which his absence chiefly had tended to fasten upon him; but as there had been no opportunity of bringing him to public trial, it would soon be believed that there was no evidence against him. Many persons thought already that the junior partner was away either on pleasure or business, because the senior had taken his place. Only a few, himself and the three or four obscure people who actually suffered from his defalcations, would recollect them. By and by Roland Sefton would be remembered as the kind, benevolent, even Christian man, whose life, so soon cut short, had been full of promise for his native town.

Mr. Clifford himself felt a pang of regret and sorrow when he heard the news. Years ago he had loved the frank, warm-hearted boy, his friend's only child, with a very true affection. He had an only boy, too, older than Roland by a few years, and these two were to succeed their fathers in the long-established firm. Then came the bitter disappointment in his own son. But since he had suffered his son to die in his sins, reaping the full harvest of his transgressions, he had felt that any forgiveness shown to other offenders would be a cruel injustice to him. Yet as Roland's passport and the children's photographs lay before him on his office desk—the same desk at which Roland was sitting but a few months ago, a man in the full vigor of life, with an apparently prosperous and happy future lying before him—Mr. Clifford for a moment or two yielded to the vain wish that Roland had thrown himself on his mercy. Yet his conscience told him that he would have refused to show him mercy, and his regret was mingled with a tinge of remorse.

His first care was to prevent the intelligence reaching Felicitia by means of the newspapers, and he sent immediately for Phebe Marlowe to accompany him to the seaside, in order to break the news to her. Phebe's excessive grief astonished him, though she had so much natural control over herself, in her sympathy for others, as to relieve him of all anxiety on her account, and to keep Felicitia's secret journey from being suspected.

But to Phebe, Roland's death was fraught with more tragic circumstances than any one else could conceive. He was hastening to meet his wife, possibly with some scheme for their future, which might have hope and deliverance in it, when this calamity hurried him away into the awful unknown world, on whose threshold we are ever standing. But for her ardent sympathy for Felicitia, Phebe would have been herself overwhelmed. It was the thought of her, with this terrible and secret addition to her sorrow, which bore her through the long journey and helped her to meet Felicitia with something like calmness.

From the bay window of the lodging-house Mr. Clifford watched Felicitia coming slowly and feebly toward the house. So fragile she looked, so utterly sorrow-stricken, that a rush of compassion and pity opened the flood-gates of his heart, and suffused his stern eyes with tears. Doubtless Phebe had told her all. Yet she was coming alone.

to meet him, her husband's enemy and persecutor, as if he was a friend. He would be a friend such as she had never known before. There would be no vain weeping, no womanish wailing in her; her grief was too deep for that. And he would respect it; he would spare her all the pain he could. At this moment, if Roland could have risen from the dead, he would have clasped him in his arms, and wept upon his neck, as the father welcomed his prodigal son.

Felicita did not speak when she entered the room, but looked at him with a steadfastness in her dark sad eyes, which again dimmed his with tears. Almost fondly he pressed her hands in his, and led her to a chair, and placed another near enough for him to speak to her in a low and quiet voice, altogether unlike the awful tones he used in the bank, which made the clerks quail before him. His hand trembled as he took the little photographs out of their envelope, so worn and stained, and laid them before her. She looked at them with tearless eyes, and let them fall upon her lap as things of little interest.

"Phebe has told you?" he said pitifully.

"Yes," she whispered.

"You did not know before?" he said.

She shook her head mutely. A long, intricate path of falsehood stretched before her, from which she could not turn aside, a maze in which she was already entangled and lost; but her lips were reluctant to utter the first words of untruth.

"These were found on him," he continued, pointing to the children's portraits. "I am afraid we cannot doubt the facts. The description is like him, and his papers and passport place the identity beyond a question. But I have dispatched a trusty messenger to Switzerland to make further inquiries, and ascertain every particular.

"Will he see him?" asked Felicita with a start of terror.

"No, my poor girl," said the old banker; "it happened ten days ago, and he was buried, so they say, almost immediately. But I wish to have a memorial stone put over his grave, that if any of us, I or you, or the children, should wish to visit it at some future time, it should not be past finding."

He spoke tenderly and sorrowfully, as if he imagined himself standing beside the grave of his old friend's son, recalling the past and grieving over it. His own boy was buried in some unknown common fosse in Paris. Felicita looked up at him with her strange, steady, searching gaze.

"You have forgiven him?" she said.

"Yes," he answered; "men always forgive the dead."

"Oh, Roland! Roland!" she cried, wringing her hands for an instant. Then, resuming her composure, she gazed quietly into his pitiful face again.

"It is kind of you to think of his grave," she said; "but I shall never go there, nor shall the children go, if I can help it."

"Hush!" he answered imperatively. "You, then, have not forgiven him? Yet I forgive him, who have lost most."

"You!" she exclaimed with a sudden outburst of passion. "You have lost a few thousand pounds; but what have I lost? My faith and trust in goodness; my husband's love and care. I have lost him, the father of my children, my home, nay, even myself. I am no longer what I thought I was. That is what Roland robs me of, and you say it is more for you to forgive than for me!"

He had never seen her thus moved and vehement, and he shrank a little from it, as most men shrink from any unusual exhibition of emotion. Though she had not wept, he was afraid now of a scene, and hastened to speak of another subject.

A Letter that Saved Six Souls.—(See page 14.)

"Well, well," he said soothingly, "that is all true, no doubt. Poor Roland! But I am your husband's executor and the children's guardian, conjointly with yourself. It will be proved immediately, and I shall take charge of your affairs."

"I thought," she answered in a hesitating manner, "that there was nothing left, that we were ruined, and had nothing. Why did Roland take your bonds, if he had money? Why did he defraud other people? There cannot be any money coming to me and the children, and why should the will be proved?"

"My dear girl," he said, "you know nothing about affairs. Your uncle, Lord Riversford, would never have allowed Roland to marry you without a settlement, and a good one too. His death was the best thing for you. It saves you from poverty and dependence, as well as from disgrace. I hardly know yet how matters stand, but you will have no less than a thousand pounds a year. You need not trouble yourself about these matters; leave them to me and Lord Riversford. He called upon me yesterday, as soon as he heard the sad news, and we arranged everything."

Felicita did not hear his words distinctly, though her brain caught their meaning vaguely. She was picturing herself free from poverty, surrounded with most of her accustomed luxuries and shielded from every hardship, while Roland was homeless and penniless, cast upon his own resources to earn his daily bread and a shelter for every night, with nothing but a poor handicraft to support him. She had not expected this contrast in their lot. Poverty had seemed to lie before her also. But now how often would his image start up before her as she had seen him last, gaunt and haggard, with rough hair and blistered skin serving him as a mask, clad in coarse clothing, already worn and ragged, not at rest in the grave, as every one but he self believed him, but dragging out a miserable and sordid existence, year by year, with no hopes for the future, and no happy memories of the past!

"Mr. Clifford," she said, when the sound of his voice humming in her ears had ceased, "I shall not take one farthing of any money settled upon me by my husband. I have no right to it. Let it go to pay the sums he appropriated. I will maintain myself and my children."

"You cannot do it," he replied; "you do not know what you are talking about. The money is settled upon your children; all that belongs to you is the yearly income from it."

"That, at least, I will never touch," she said earnestly; "it shall be set aside to repay those just claims. When all those are paid I will take it, but not before. Yours is the largest, and I will try to find out the others. With my mother's two hundred pounds a year, and what I earn myself, we shall keep the children. Lord Riversford has no control over me. I am a woman, and I will act for myself."

"You cannot do it," he repeated; "you have no notion of what you are undertaking to do. Mrs. Sefton, my dear young lady. I am come, with Lord Riversford's sanction, to ask you to return to your home again, to Madame's old home—your children's birth-place. I think, and Lord Riversford thinks, you should come back, and bring up Felix to take his grandfather's and father's place."

"His father's place!" interrupted Felicita. "No, my son shall never enter into business. I would rather see him a common soldier or sailor, or day-laborer, earning his bread by any honest toil. He shall have no traffic in money, such as his father had; he shall have no such temptations. Whatever my son is, he shall never be a banker."

"Good heavens, madam!" exclaimed Mr. Clifford. Felicita's stony quietude was gone, and in its place was such a passionate energy as he had never witnessed before in any woman.

"It was money that tempted Roland to defraud you and dishonor himself," she said; "it drove poor Acton to commit suicide, and it hardened your heart against your friend's son. Felix shall be free from it. He shall earn his bread and his place in the world in some other way, and till he can do that I will earn it for him. Every shilling I spend from henceforth shall be clean, the fruit of my own hands, not Roland's—not his, whether he be alive or dead."

Before Mr. Clifford could answer, the door was flung open, and Felix, breathless with rapid running, rushed into the room and flung himself into his mother's arms. No words could come at first; but he drew long and terrible sobs. The boy's upturned face was pale, and his eyes, tearless as her own had been, were fastened in an agony upon hers. She could not soothe or comfort him, for she knew his grief was wasted on a falsehood; but she looked down on her son's face with a feeling of terror.

"Oh, my father! my beloved father!" he sobbed at last. "Is he dead, mother? You never told me anything that wasn't true. He can't be dead, though Phebe says so."

Felicita bent her head till it rested on the boy's uplifted face. His sobs shook her, and the close clasp of his arms was painful; but she neither spoke nor moved. She heard Phebe coming in, and knew that Roland's mother was there, and Hilda came to clasp her little arms about her as Felix was doing. But her heart had gone back to the moment when Roland had knelt beside her in the quiet little church, and she had said to him deliberately, "I choose your death." He was dead to her.

"Is it true, mother?" wailed Felix. "Oh, tell me it isn't true!"

"It is true," she answered. But the long tense strain had been too much for her strength, and she sank fainting on the ground.

(To be continued.)

CHRIST'S POWER TO HEAL.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 15. Mark 1:29-45. Golden Text, Exod. 15:26. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHILE the people were talking over and spreading abroad the news that Jesus of Nazareth had cast out an evil spirit by a simple command, and that the spirit had called Him "the Holy One of God," Jesus and His disciples entered into the house of Simon and Andrew. Popularity was hateful to our Lord. He saw and felt the fleshly exultation of those who were ready to give all the glory to man, and who were blind and insensible to the presence of their God. But sickness was in the house, Simon's mother-in-law lay tossing in the burning heat, perhaps the delirium, of fever, "and anon they tell Him of her." They make no petition, only call His attention to her; but it is enough. He only waiteth to be gracious. "He came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and the fever left her." There was health and life; no power of disease could hold its own against the touch of Jesus; sin and sickness when brought by faith into real contact with Him must yield before the Lord our Saviour, the Lord our Physician.

Our golden text is the key note to the office of the Lord as Healer. Speaking to Moses He says, "I make for you this day

A STATUTE AND AN ORDINANCE.

If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in His sight, and wilt give ear to His commandments, and keep all His statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee which I have brought upon the Egyptians; for I am JEHOVAH-ROPHI" i.e., "The Lord, thy Physician," or, as it stands in our translation, "The Lord that healeth thee."

Our beloved Lord came on earth as the "express image of His person" who had appointed Him "heir of all things" (Heb. 1:2, 3). He came to manifest God in all things. We have already seen Him as victor over the devil in the wilderness temptation; but He was also "manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil" (1 John 3:8), sin, sorrow, sickness, death. Thus we see that, being in Himself the Lord our Healer, He must heal whenever He came in contact with sickness, except in the cases of such as those at the pool of Bethesda, who were looking for help from other sources. What must have been the joy and wonder of the humble inhabitants of Simon's house, when the hectic flush disappeared, the black froth vanished from the parched mouth, the burning hand became cool, and the invalid arose and ministered unto them! As she stood over the fire cooking, as she fetched water from the well, there were none of the faltering steps of the partially convalescent, the touch of Jesus was perfect health. "He is the Rock, His work is perfect" (Deut. 32:4).

This first instance on record of the Lord's healing of sickness is perfect in all its details. Disciples tell the Lord about the sick one, He enters in, they bring Him to her, then they have no more to do. He chooses to heal her by a touch, a word would have done, but He does not bind Himself to a stereotyped method. Immediately the disease departs and the sick woman

MINISTERS TO JESUS.

Sickness is often sent as a means to compel a soul, too precious to the Lord to be abandoned to itself, into some path which has not been taken in obedience to the milder teaching, the Word of the Master. If "He openeth the ears of men and sealeth their instruction," and the opened ear does not hearken to His voice, then He is obliged to resort to another method. "He is chastened also with pain upon His bed" (Job 33:14-30). God must gain the ear of His children at any cost, must be able to communicate with them. When Simon's wife's mother was ministering to Jesus, all was in order. Probably if the one aim in life were to minister to Jesus in His way, as He chooses, listening always to His direction, there would be less need for the voice of sickness among us. Meanwhile let us bless God that He takes the trouble to check us by any means, however painful; but while doing so shall we not submit ourselves to His statute and ordinance, shall we not hearken and be healed in soul and body?

Can we not imagine the excitement among the neighbors, who had probably been saying of Peter's mother-in-law, "Ah, poor thing, she's in a bad way, she'll soon be gone," when their sick neighbor came out into the market for provisions, and told the story of her healing. The day was declining, but they lost no time, why should not their sick be healed as well? "At even, when the sun did set (just when the air was chill, a bad time for invalids), they brought to Him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils." There they were, some within the house and some without, and there stood Jehovah-Rophi in the midst, the whole city gathered together at the door in wonder, curiosity, or expectation. "And He laid His hands on every one of them and healed them. And devils also came out of many, crying out, and saying, Thou art Christ, the Son of God. And He, rebuking them, suffered them not to speak; for they knew that He was Christ" (Luke 4:40, 41).

What a day of blessing! Many that night in the city of Capernaum could not sleep for the wonders which they had seen and heard. Many perhaps were awake praising God, stretching out their once palsied limbs, listening with an exquisite joy to sounds long unheard by their hitherto closed ears. In almost every house there was told some story of deliverance. But all this time? He slept, but not for long. "In the morning, rising up a great while before day, He went out, and departed into a solitary place and there prayed."

WHERE WAS JESUS

What, in the moment of His success, when the power of God's enemy was giving way before Him, was this the moment for Him to be alone, ought He not to seize the opportunity? Many a successful evangelist thinks in the heyday of his success that he is so needful he must be present at every meeting; he must always take the lead or the work will suffer. The Lord said, "The Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." And, just as a Christian worker realizes how entirely it is God who does all Himself, he sees how very little necessary he is, and in the same proportion how very necessary communion with God is. Much work for God is shallow, just because the roots of it lie more in the sand of human effort than in the deep rock of our faith, the living present God. The orange tree can grow in a sandy soil, but wherever the fruit is flourishing, there is always a taproot which reaches down to the solid rock and drinks of the hidden moisture there.

The Master was not long left quiet in His retirement. "Simon and they that were with Him followed after Him. And when they had found Him, they said unto Him, All men seek for Thee." Did He say, "We will go at once to meet them, we must not lose such an opportunity, we will strike while the iron is hot." This would have been human wisdom, but He had been getting His directions from headquarters, and had no hesitation as to His plans: leaving the expecting multitudes in Capernaum, He said, "Let us go into the next town, that I may preach there also; for therefore came I forth." And He then made an evangelistic tour throughout Galilee, in the course of which He preached the sermon on the mount, also healed "all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people" (Matt. 4:23).

Immediately subsequent to His preaching the sermon on the mount, there came a leper to Him, beseeching Him, and kneeling down to Him, and saying unto Him, "If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean." "If thou wilt." Had the Lord sent away any unhealed who had come to Him? This misgiving about His willingness must have pained Jesus. But now His Word is so clear; besides the statute and ordinance (Ex. 15:26) we have the declaration, "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. 8:17) and again the rule for believers to which

SCRIPTURE MAKES NO EXCEPTION;

"Is any sick among you let him . . . be healed" (James 5:14-16). Jesus uttered no word of reproach to the poor leper, self consideration was unknown to our Lord, He "moved with compassion put forth His hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean." Why should we ever doubt for a moment the Lord's willingness to put forth His power on our behalf, He waits to be trusted for whatsoever may try us.

As soon as Jesus had spoken, the leprosy departed from the man, and Jesus charged him to tell no man, but to go and show himself unto the priest, and offer for his cleansing those "things which Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them." The priest, perhaps the very man who had before examined him, must now touch his ear and hand and foot with the blood of the sin offering, with oil, as a token of cleansing and consecration to God, and he must see how perfectly every trace of disease was gone. Instead of obeying Jesus' command to tell no man, the cleansed leper "went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more openly enter into the city (probably on account of the pressure of multitudes who thronged Him), but was without in desert places: and they came to Him from every quarter."

A LETTER THAT SAVED SIX SOULS.

(See Illustration, page 13.)

A LADY became very anxious about the welfare of her soul. She had been living without God, and without hope in the world. She knew she was on the downward road to destruction, and now she began to realize her sad condition.

In her distress she wrote to the Letter Mission in Clapham, near London, which undertakes to correspond with those who are anxious to know the "way of life," or who are troubled about their sins. "Is there any mercy for me, the chief of sinners?" was her earnest inquiry.

"Yes, there is mercy for you. 'God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' 'The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin. 'Come unto Me all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you shall be saved.'" Such was the nature of the reply sent to the anxious one. She believed in Jesus, and was saved. Now she is rejoicing in the peace which can only be obtained from the Prince of Peace, the Lord Jesus Christ.

In writing to this lady subsequently, the Superintendent of the Letter Mission had omitted to give the reference to a text which he intended to send to cheer the good lady; but before posting, he hastily printed on the envelope, just above the seal, this reference, "Isaiah 40:31."

The postman who had conveyed the letter observed the text, and was curious to know to what it referred. "When he reached home, he took down his Bible, which he had not opened for a long time, and read, 'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; they shall walk, and not faint.'"

"You know I am not one of your sort of people," he said one day, when calling upon the lady; "I don't read my Bible, but having got it down, I began to read here and there, and it all seemed new to me; and I began to think about its being true, so I thought I must come and see you, as I felt sure you would help me."

The lady gave him a tract, and assured him that she would pray for him. After a few weeks had passed, the postman found peace with God.

The postman did not keep his happiness to himself. He went home and told his wife how Jesus had blessed him, and shortly afterward she too had found joy and peace through believing. Through her the good news of salvation by faith in Jesus were communicated to her parents, who shortly afterward were rejoicing in the Lord. Since then two more members of the same family have been brought to the Saviour, and have obtained forgiveness through His finished work on Calvary. So six persons were saved from hell and destruction through that text being written on the envelope.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC FOR 1882.

JANUARY.

1 S	The word is nigh thee. Rom. 10: 8.
2 M	Consider him that endured. Heb. 12: 3.
3 T	Charity edifieth. 1 Cor. 8: 1.
4 W	The spirit shall return unto God who gave it. Isa. 61: 1.
5 T	Trust ye in the Lord forever. Isa. 26: 4.
6 F	I will pardon all their iniquities. Jer. 33: 8.
7 S	Bless, and curse not. Rom. 12: 14.
8 S	Lord, Thou wilt ordain peace for us. In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy.
9 M	The end of all things is at hand. [mercy]
10 T	The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy. Ps. 136: 1.
11 W	Thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive. Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. John 15: 17. [abound.]
12 T	Love one another. John 15: 17. [abound.]
13 F	He hath not dealt with us after our sins. Though He slay me, yet will I trust Him. Take away all iniquity. Hos. 14: 2.
14 S	The memory of the just is blessed. The Lord is good to all. Ps. 145: 9.
15 M	He is my rock. Ps. 92: 15.
16 T	Beat peace among yourselves. 1 Thess. 5: 13.
17 W	Do all to the glory of God. 1 Cor. 10: 31.
18 T	Thy law is my delight. Ps. 119: 77.
19 F	Honor all men. 1 Pet. 2: 17.
20 S	Your life is hid with Christ in God. Light is sown for the righteous. Ps. 97: 11.
21 M	Flee also youthful lusts. 2 Tim. 2: 22.
22 T	I have heard thy prayer. 2 Kings 20: 5.
23 W	Be clothed with humility. 1 Pet. 5: 5.
24 T	He that hath the Son hath life.
25 F	Be not rash with thy mouth. Eccles. 5: 2.

FEBRUARY.

1 W	I live by the faith of the Son of God. The gift of God is eternal life. [peace.]
2 T	Let Thy saints shout for joy. [Ps. 132: 9.]
3 F	I am come that they might have life. He giveth power to the faint. Isa. 40: 29.
4 S	I am the good Shepherd. John 10: 11.
5 M	Amend your ways and your doings. My soul trusteth in Thee. Ps. 57: 1.
6 T	There is none holier as the Lord. 1 Sam. 2: 2.
7 W	The Lord hath been mindful of us. [2: 2.]
8 T	Beware of evil workers. [peace.]
9 F	Acquaint now thyself with Him, and be at Thy sins and iniquities will I remember. Lighten mine eyes. Ps. 13: 3. [no more.]
10 S	Be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee. He is faithful that promised. Heb. 10: 23.
11 M	He will speak peace unto His people. Receive us graciously. Hos. 14: 2.
12 T	Speaking boldly in the Lord. Acts 14: 3.
13 W	I have chosen you out of the world. Marvel not if the world hate you.
14 T	George Washington's Birthday. Thou shalt call me, my Father. Jer. 3: 19.
15 F	Take my yoke upon you. Matt. 11: 29.
16 S	Thou shalt love the Lord thy God. Oh that men would therefore praise Thee. Live peaceably with all men. [Lord.]
17 M	Enter into His gates with thanksgiving.

MARCH.

1 W	Whatsoever is not of faith is sin.
2 T	Ask in faith. Jas. 1: 6.
3 F	Christ in you, the hope of glory. Whoso findeth me, findeth life. Prov. 8: 35.
4 S	Joy and peace in believing. Rom. 15: 13.
5 M	Ye shall therefore keep my statutes. Thy law is the truth. Ps. 119: 142.
6 T	Take heed to thyself. Deut. 4: 9.
7 W	Serve Him in truth. [unto you]
8 T	Peace I leave with you, my peace I give. The Lord will bless His people with peace. Thou art a God ready to pardon.
9 F	Who is a God like unto Thee. Micah 7: 18.
10 S	Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Take ye heed, watch and pray. God is with us. Isa. 8: 10.
11 M	Be ye holy, for I am holy. 1 Pet. 1: 14.
12 T	Godliness with contentment is great gain. I am meek and lowly in heart.
13 W	Trust in the Lord and do good. Ps. 37: 3.
14 T	Honor the Lord with thy substance. Prov. 3: 9.
15 F	Delight thyself also in the Lord. [3: 9.]
16 S	I will put my Spirit within you. With the heart man believeth.
17 M	By Him all that believe are justified. Come unto me, and I will give you rest.
18 T	Walk in the Spirit. Gal. 5: 16.
19 W	Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God. God will not fail thee. Deut. 31: 6.
20 T	We are ambassadors for Christ. If the Lord be God, follow Him.

APRIL.

1 S	We joy in God. Rom. 5: 11.
2 M	He that hath the Son hath life. He raised up Christ. 1 Cor. 15: 15.
3 T	I will receive you. 2 Cor. 6: 17. [sins.]
4 W	He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins. He will speak peace unto His people.
5 T	Good Friday. [18: 14.]
6 F	Is anything too hard for the Lord? Gen. 18: 14.
7 S	Easter Sunday. He restoreth my soul. Ps. 23: 3.
8 M	Walking in the fear of the Lord. Purifying their hearts by faith. Acts 15: 9.
9 T	I go to prepare a place for you. John 14: 2.
10 W	Ye shall find rest unto your souls. The fear of man bringeth a snare. [heart.]
11 T	He shall give thee the desires of thine heart. Grievous words stir up anger. Prov. 15: 1.
12 F	A man is justified by faith. Rom. 3: 28.
13 S	My soul trusteth in Thee. Ps. 57: 1.
14 M	He that believeth on me shall never thirst. I hate every false way. Ps. 119: 104.
15 T	All the paths of wisdom are peace. Ever follow that which is good.
16 W	Show thyself approved unto God. Blessed are the poor in spirit. Matt. 5: 3.
17 T	Thou art the God that doest wonders. The wages of sin is death. Rom. 6: 23.
18 F	Our God shall fight for us. Neh. 4: 20.
19 S	Lord, bow down Thine ear and hear. The Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

MAY.

1 M	His banner over me was love. Cant. 2: 4.
2 T	The Lord will not cast off forever. Preserve my life from fear. Ps. 64: 1.
3 W	Hitherto hath the Lord helped us. Ye are bought with a price. 1 Cor. 6: 20.
4 T	Let us make a covenant with our God. Thy God reigneth! Isa. 52: 7.
5 F	From this day will I bless you. Hag. 2: 19.
6 S	In Thee is my trust. Ps. 141: 8.
7 M	All souls are mine. Ezek. 18: 4.
8 T	The truth shall make you free. John 8: 32.
9 W	I will make the wilderness a pool of water. The needy shall not always be forgotten.
10 T	In His love and in His pity He redeemed the gift of God is eternal life. [them.]
11 F	God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you. He hath sent me to bind up the broken. God is light. 1 John 1: 5. [hearted.]
12 S	Forgiving iniquity and transgression and serve Him in truth. 1 Sam. 12: 24. [sin.]
13 M	Charity suffereth long, and is kind. The Lord loveth the righteous. Ps. 146: 8.
14 T	Blessed be the name of the Lord. The Lord of hosts is with us. Ps. 46: 7.
15 W	Stand fast in the faith. 1 Cor. 16: 13.
16 T	I will show mercies unto you. Jer. 42: 12.
17 F	Be patient toward all men. 1 Thess. 5: 14.
18 S	Awake to righteousness. 1 Cor. 15: 34.
19 M	I will come again. John 14: 3.
20 T	Decoration Day. He shall save His people from their sins.

JUNE.

1 T	I have waited for Thy salvation. I will receive you. 1 Cor. 6: 17.
2 F	Blessed are the meek. Matt. 5: 5.
3 S	Let patience have her perfect work. You hath he quickened. Eph. 2: 1.
4 M	It pleased the Lord to bruise Him. Ye shall he unto me a kingdom of priests. Continue ye in my love. John 15: 9.
5 T	But He giveth more grace. Jas. 4: 6.
6 W	Who forgiveth all thine iniquities. Honor the Lord with the first fruits. Who is a God like unto Thee? [Lord.]
7 T	The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord. The Lord is gracious, and full of compassion. Lord, I believe. John 9: 38. [passion.]
8 F	Ever follow that which is good. Be careful for nothing. Phil. 4: 6.
9 S	Let us walk in the light of the Lord. Enter ye in at the strait gate. Examine yourselves. 2 Cor. 13: 5.
10 M	The Lord our God is one Lord. Blessed are the peacemakers. Matt. 5: 9.
11 T	The Lord looketh on the heart. Great is the wrath of the Lord. The will of the Lord be done. Acts 21: 14.
12 F	Comfort ye my people, saith your God. I am the door. John 10: 9.
13 S	God is a very present help in trouble.

JULY.

1 S	According to your faith be it unto you. Thou art my hope. O Lord God. Ps. 71: 5.
2 T	I am the bread of Life. John 6: 35.
3 F	Independence Day. Ye are bought with a price. [given.]
4 S	Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven. God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. Having made peace through the blood of Christ with the Lord there is mercy. [His cross.]
5 M	It is more blessed to give than to receive. They that deal truly are His delight. Create in me a clean heart, O God. A new heart also will I give you.
6 T	He hath done all things well. Mark 7: 37.
7 W	Love your enemies. Matt. 5: 44.
8 T	God is our refuge and strength. Ps. 46: 1.
9 F	God is judge Himself. Ps. 50: 6.
10 S	Therefore will we not fear. Ps. 46: 2.
11 M	The fruit of the Spirit is Love. Gal. 5: 22.
12 T	Lighten mine eyes. Ps. 13: 3.
13 W	Worship Him who liveth forever. God shall supply all your need. Phil. 4: 19.
14 T	Give an account of thy stewardship. Hitherto hath the Lord helped us. My grace is sufficient for thee. 2 Cor. 12: 9.
15 F	Looking unto Jesus. Heb. 12: 2.
16 S	Serve Him in truth. 1 Sam. 12: 24.
17 M	Thou standest by faith. Rom. 11: 20.
18 T	I will give them an heart to know me. No more a servant, but a son. Gal. 4: 7.
19 W	My expectation is from Him. Ps. 62: 5.

AUGUST.

1 T	The will of the Lord be done. Acts 21: 14.
2 W	Hold fast that which is good. 1 Thess. 5: 12.
3 T	Rejoice evermore. 1 Thess. 5: 16.
4 F	Faith cometh by hearing. Rom. 10: 17.
5 S	O Lord, revive Thy work. Hab. 3: 2.
6 M	I know your manifold transgressions. Help Thou mine unbelief. Mark 9: 24.
7 T	He loved them unto the end. John 13: 1.
8 W	He made intercession for the transgressors. The Lord will be the hope of His people.
9 T	He raiseth up the poor out of the dust. Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.
10 F	Thou art a God ready to pardon. The Lord is long-suffering. Num. 14: 18.
11 S	He loveth more grace. Jas. 4: 6.
12 M	God will provide Himself a lamb for a love not the world. [burnt offering.]
13 T	The long-suffering of our Lord is salvation. All have sinned. Rom. 3: 23.
14 W	No man can serve two masters. Matt. 6: 24.
15 T	I will guide thee with mine eye. Ps. 32: 8.
16 F	Grievous words stir up anger. Prov. 15: 1.
17 S	The just shall live by faith. Gal. 3: 11.
18 M	Grow in grace. 2 Pet. 3: 18.
19 T	Christ died for the ungodly. Rom. 5: 6.
20 W	Bear ye one another's burdens. Gal. 6: 2.
21 F	Our trespass is great. 2 Chron. 28: 13.
22 S	Sanctify yourselves. Josh. 7: 13.
23 M	Blessed are they that mourn. Matt. 5: 4.
24 T	I will make you fishers of men. Matt. 4: 19.
25 W	The light shineth in darkness. John 1: 9.

SEPTEMBER.

1 F	In all their affliction He was afflicted. Behold the blood of the covenant. We all do fade as a leaf. Isa. 40: 6. [17.]
2 S	An idle soul shall suffer hunger. Prov. 19: 2.
3 T	Stand fast in the faith. 1 Cor. 16: 13.
4 W	He must reign. 1 Cor. 15: 25.
5 T	Let not your heart be troubled. John 14: 1.
6 F	Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord. Partakers of the Divine nature. 2 Pet. 1: 4.
7 S	Be sober, be vigilant. 1 Pet. 5: 8.
8 M	I am the Lord that doth sanctify you. Cast not away your confidence. Heb. 10: 35.
9 T	None shall make them afraid. Isa. 41: 10.
10 W	My words shall not pass away. Mark 13: 31.
11 T	Fight the good fight of faith. 1 Tim. 6: 12.
12 F	The way of the wicked is as darkness. Be ye followers of God, as dear children. Let him that is athirst come. Rev. 22: 17.
13 S	Feed me with food convenient for me. Walk circumspectly. Eph. 5: 15.
14 M	Be not afraid, only believe. Mark 5: 36.
15 T	Ye are the salt of the earth. [salvation.]
16 F	He hath clothed me with the garments of Thy law. The law of the Lord is perfect. Ps. 19: 7.
17 S	If God be for us, who can be against us? Thou hast delivered my soul. Ps. 86: 13.
18 M	So run that ye may obtain. 1 Cor. 9: 24.
19 T	Held Thou me up, and I shall be safe. Who may abide the day of His coming? Suffer little children to come unto me.

OCTOBER.

1 S	The Father Himself loveth you. John 16: 27.
2 M	Be ready to every good work. Tit. 3: 1.
3 T	All thy garments smell of myrrh. Ps. 45: 8.
4 W	The Lord is my strength and song. Hold fast the form of sound words. Awake, thou that sleepest. Eph. 5: 14.
5 T	Perfect love casteth out fear. 1 John 4: 18.
6 F	Praying in the Holy Ghost. Jude 20.
7 S	My days are swifter than a post. Job 9: 25.
8 M	Love is the fulfilling of the law. Sanctified and meet for the Master's use. Hold fast till I come. Rev. 2: 25.
9 T	Behold, the Lord God will help me. Is. 50: 9.
10 W	Lay hold on eternal life. 1 Tim. 6: 12.
11 T	My peace I give unto you. John 14: 27.
12 F	Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us. Let him take the water of life freely. O that Thou wouldst bless me indeed. He that refraineth his lips is wise. Walk humbly with thy God. Mic. 6: 8.
13 S	None of us liveth to himself. Rom. 14: 7.
14 M	Thou hast delivered my soul from death. My cup runneth over. Ps. 23: 5.
15 T	Have faith in God. Mark 11: 22.
16 F	Whom He called, them He also justified. The Lord is thy keeper. Ps. 121: 5.
17 S	I will bless the Lord. Ps. 16: 7.
18 M	Those that seek me early shall find me. Mine eyes are unto Thee, O God the Lord. Very great are His mercies. 1 Chron. 21: 13.
19 T	Canst thou by searching find out God?

NOVEMBER.

1 W	He is the propitiation for our sins. 1 John 4: 10.
2 T	Edify one another. 1 Thess. 5: 11. [2: 2.]
3 F	The love of many shall wax cold. Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow. The Lord shall yet comfort Zion. Zech. 1: 17.
4 S	I am the way. John 14: 6. [1: 17.]
5 M	It is God which worketh in you. Phil. 2: 13.
6 T	In due season we shall reap. Gal. 6: 9.
7 W	Go forward. Ex. 14: 15.
8 T	Search the Scriptures. John 5: 39.
9 F	I will betroth thee unto me forever. If God be for us, who can be against us? He will ever be mindful of His covenant. He that overcometh shall inherit all things. Fear not them which kill the body. The Spirit and the Bride say, Come. Remove far from me vanity and lies. Rest in the Lord. Ps. 37: 7.
10 S	Ye are not your own. 1 Cor. 6: 19.
11 M	Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ. Walk even as He walked. [eth me.]
12 T	The Lord will perfect that which concerneth thee. Thou shalt forgive the iniquity of Thy people. I have redeemed thee. Isa. 43: 1.
13 F	In everything give thanks. 1 Thess. 5: 18.
14 S	The word of the Lord endureth forever. He restoreth my soul. Ps. 23: 3.
15 M	Bear no burden on the Sabbath day. Jer. 17: 21.
16 T	Thanksgiving Day.

DECEMBER.

1 F	Made nigh by the blood of Christ. Walk worthy of God. 1 Thess. 2: 12.
2 S	Give us this day our daily bread. The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom. Thy kingdom come. Matt. 6: 10.
3 T	Commit thy works unto the Lord. We walk by faith, not by sight. I know thee by name. Ex. 33: 17.
4 W	Abstain from all appearance of evil. Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it. God Himself is with us for our Captain. The word of our God shall stand forever. Return unto the Lord thy God. Hos. 14: 1.
5 T	Arise, call upon thy God. Jonah 1: 6.
6 F	Let him that heareth say, Come. Give me neither poverty nor riches. Ye in me, and I in you. John 14: 20.
7 S	He knoweth them that trust in Him. Rejoice in the Lord always. [salvation.]
8 M	Thou hast heard me, and art become my friend. He that believeth on Him is not condemned. Beloved, now are we sons of God. Your life is hid with Christ in God. The name of the Lord is a strong tower. Christmas Day. Study to be quiet. Be zealous therefore and repent. All we like sheep have gone astray. In all thy ways acknowledge the Lord. Keep thee far from a false matter. God give thee of the dew of heaven. Wait on the Lord, and He shall save thee.

CHRONOLOGICAL CYCLES.

Dominical Letter.....	A
Epact.....	11
Golden Number.....	2
Solar Cycle.....	15
Roman Indiction.....	10
Julian Period.....	6595

Astronomical Calculations for 1882:

being the latter part of the 16th, and the beginning of the 17th, year of the Independence of the United States of America.

ECLIPSES.

This year, 1882, there will be two Eclipses of the Sun, no Eclipse of the Moon, and a Transit of Venus over the disk of the Sun.

I. A Total Eclipse of the Sun, May 17, not visible in America, the line of totality passing across Africa and Asia, and visible as a Partial Eclipse in Europe.

II. An Annular Eclipse of the Sun, November 10, not visible in America, the principal phases being confined to the Southern portions of the Pacific Ocean.

III. A Transit of the planet Venus over the disk of the Sun, on December 6, visible throughout the United States. There will be four contacts of the circular disks, or limbs, of the Sun and planet; namely, a first external contact of the limbs, and then, after an interval of about twenty-one minutes of time, the second contact, or first internal contact, will take place. After an interval of about six hours, the third contact, or second internal contact, will take place; and about twenty-one minutes after the third, the fourth contact, or second external contact, will complete the transit.

MORNING STARS.

Mercury, until January 6; also from February 22 to May 2; also from June 28 to August 14; also from October 22 to December 17.

Venus, until February 20, and after December 6, to the end of the year.

EVENING STARS.

Mercury, from January 6 to February 22; also from May 2 to June 28; also from August 14 to October 22.

Venus, from February 20 to December 6.

The Bible House: Built 1853. The Christian Herald Founded October, 1878.

THE past year has been one of great prosperity for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the Publishers for the third time record their acknowledgments to Almighty God for the favor thus steadily and abundantly bestowed.

The subscription list is a little more than 50 per cent. larger than it was at this time last year; and as the sermons of Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, which make the leading feature of the paper, are also its principal means of doing good, the publishers can, without self-glorification, express the satisfaction with which they send out thousands upon thousands of copies of those faithful statements of the way of salvation every week. They are read on Sabbaths in many solitary homes where the visit of the circuit preacher does not occur oftener than once a month.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has also prospered financially. For, as our terms are always cash in advance, every subscription means a receipted bill, and we have neither outstanding accounts nor doubtful assets.

Our relations with our subscribers also have been of the pleasantest kind, with no harassing for payment and no disputes about bills. We have adhered to the rule with which we started, and which we believe to be required by Christian courtesy: viz., to reply by return of post to every inquiry from a subscriber.

We hereby tender our thanks to eight hundred agents, through whose exertions we have largely built up our circulation. Some are aged persons, who find that means of livelihood within their failing strength; some are young children, who take it as an easy way to earn pocket-money; and others are men and women in the prime of life who have chosen canvassing as their professional business; while not a few are to be included in the number who, out of sheer good-will and without a thought of gain, go to work to promote the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the usefulness of which they conscientiously believe.

Now we shall be glad to enter renewals for 1882 as early as it is convenient for our subscribers to send them, and we repeat our offer to mail a circular of agent's terms and a package of sample copies to any person who contemplates canvassing for the paper.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1882.

16th Year. No. 2.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF MR. GEORGE MÜLLER, and Picture of Ashley Down Orphanages, and Portrait of Mr. James Wright, the Associate Director. THE TEN PLAGUES OF NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN: CORNERS AND SWINDLES IN STOCKS. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Continued).

"I'll Think About It." A Temperance Appeal.

SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Cuffe" (Continued).

Power to Forgive. S. S. Lesson. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

CURRENT EVENTS: Meeting of Congress—The Garfield Hospital—The Guiteau Trial—Death of Hon. E. W. Stoughton—An Ancient City Discovered—A Remarkable Ministerial Record—A Burglar Claiming Inspiration—Desperate Combat with a Whale—A Coincidence at a Prayer-Meeting—A Thief's Restitution—A Quaint Reproof, etc.

ILLUSTRATIONS: A Scene in the Burning Theatre in Vienna—The Happy Escape—Rescue of a Shipwrecked Crew by the Bradford Life-Boat.

THE BRIDE AND HER ORNAMENTS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).

FOREIGN TOPICS: More Coercion for Ireland—Trade in Great Britain—Anglo-French Alliance in Egypt—The Pope and the European Powers, etc.

Mr. GEO. MÜLLER and Mr. JAMES WRIGHT—View of the Orphanages at Ashley Down.

MR. GEORGE MÜLLER, THE EMINENT PHILANTHROPIST.

Birth—Parental Mistakes—Youthful Sins—Continued Waywardness—A Theological Student, yet Without a Bible—The Penalties of Transgression—A Providential Walk—A Cordial Welcome—The Turning Point of His Life—He Seeks to Become a Missionary—Visit to London—Preaches in Devonshire—Breaks a Blood Vessel—The Last Halfpenny—Removes to Bristol—The Far-Famed Orphanage—The Munificent Needlewoman—He Found a Religious Institution and Orphanage—Mr. James Wright Becomes Co-Director—Summary of Results—Thirty Thousand Answers to Prayer—Personal Blessings.

MR. GEORGE MÜLLER, whose visit to America last year is doubtless fresh in the recollection of our readers, is known by reputation throughout Christendom. Everywhere his name is mentioned with admiration, and the narrative of his great work is read with wonder. While scientists are demonstrating to their own satisfaction that faith and prayer are without influence and have no practical bearing on the affairs of daily life, Mr. Müller is supporting, educating, and providing for more than two thousand orphaned children without capital and without regular income, solely by those two despised means—faith and prayer. The Orphanages, of which a picture appears on our front page, have been built and paid for, and their inmates have been provided for to this day without any application for human aid. Mr. Müller at the commencement confided the whole enterprise to the care of God, and henceforth felt assured that the means required would be provided. When the funds ran out and the little children who were looking to him for bread had no provision for the morrow, Mr. Müller never applied to this or that wealthy friend; he simply laid the case before God in prayer, and the means were placed in his hands. Often has his faith been tried, and collapse seemed, humanly speaking, to stare him in the face; but his faith has never wavered, and it has always received its reward. It would be impossible within the space at our command, to give even a meagre account of this great work; but we propose to supplement the biography of Mr. Müller which we published in these columns on October 9th, 1879, with a few additional facts and incidents.

Mr. George Müller is a German. He was born at Kroppenstaedt, near Halberstadt, in Prussia, on September 27th, 1805. His father was exceedingly fond of him, but parental love in this case was unwisely displayed, for, like the patriarch Jacob, George Müller's father showed to his son a partiality which aroused some little jealousy in the breast of his other son. Another mistake of his father's was that of allowing the two boys too much money for their years.

YOUTHFUL SINS.

When he was ten years of age he was sent to Halberstadt, to the Cathedral Classical School, there to be prepared for the university; his father's desire being that he should become a clergyman, though not so much with the view of doing good to others as in order to secure a competence for himself. His time was now spent partly in study, partly in novel reading, and partly in sinful practices. Such was his way of life until his fourteenth year, when his mother was suddenly removed by death.

While she lay dying, George, unaware of her illness, was card-playing till two in the morning, and on the next day, which was the Sabbath, he went with some of his companions to a tavern and afterward wandered about the streets half intoxicated. On the next day he attended for the first time the religious instruction he was to receive preparatory to his confirmation; but here also his carelessness was as great as elsewhere. On his return to his lodgings his father had arrived to take him and his brother home to their mother's funeral. But even death and its attendant solemnities had no lasting effect on the boy's mind.

Referring to this period he says: "In November I went on a pleasure excursion to Magdeburg, where I spent six days in much sin, and though my absence from home had been found out by my father before I returned from thence, yet I took all the money I could obtain, and went to Brunswick, after I had, through a number of lies, obtained permission from my tutor. I spent a week at Brunswick, in an expensive hotel. At the end of the week my money was expended. I then went, without money, to another hotel, in a village near Brunswick, where I spent another week in an expensive way of living. At last the owner of the hotel, suspecting that I had no money, asked for payment, and I was obliged to leave my best clothes as security. I then walked about six miles to Wolfenbüttel, went to an inn, and began again to live as if I had plenty of money. On the second or third morning I went quietly out of the yard, and then ran off; but being suspected and observed, and therefore seen to go off, I was immediately called after, and so had to return. I was arrested, and being suspected to be a thief, was examined for about three hours, and then sent to jail. I now found myself, at the age of sixteen, an inmate of the same dwelling with thieves and murderers. I was locked up in this place day and night, without permission to leave my cell.

"I was

"IN PRISON

from December 18th, 1821, till January 12th, 1822, when the keeper told me to go with him to the police office. Here I found the commissioner before whom I had been tried had acquainted my father with my conduct; and thus I was kept in prison till my father sent the money which was needed for my travelling expenses, to pay my debt in the inn, and for my maintenance in the prison.

"I afterward spent two years and six months at a classical school at Nordhausen. During this time I studied with considerable diligence the Latin classics, French history, my own language, etc.; but did little in Hebrew, Greek, and the mathematics. I lived in the house of the director, and got highly into his favor, so much so that I was held up by him in the first class as an example to the rest.

"But while I was thus outwardly gaining the esteem of my fellow-creatures, I did not care in the least about God, but lived secretly in much sin, in consequence of which I was taken ill, and for thirteen weeks confined to my room. During my illness I had no real sorrow of heart, and cared nothing about the Word of God. I had about three hundred books

"BUT NO BIBLE.

"Now and then I felt that I ought to become a different person, and I tried to amend my conduct, particularly when I went to the Lord's Supper, as I used to do twice every year, with the other young men. The day previous to attending the ordinance, I used to refrain from certain things; and on the day itself I was serious, and also swore once or twice to God with the emblem of the Broken Body in my mouth, to become better, thinking that for the oath's sake I should be induced to reform. But after one or two days were over all was forgotten, and I was as bad as before.

By this time (1825) George Müller had become a member of the University, and obtained permission to preach in the Lutheran Church, although he was still godless and unhappy. Knowing, however, that no Church would have him which knew his real character, and that without a considerable knowledge of divinity he could never get a good living in Prussia, he determined to change his way of life, and give himself diligently to his studies. But no sooner had he entered Halle, the University town, than all his good resolutions came to nothing. He again gave way to profligacy, and was as reckless a spendthrift as ever.

One day, while in a tavern with some of his wild fellow students, he saw among them one of his former school-fellows named Beta, whom he had known four years before at Halberstadt, but whom at the time he had despised because he was quiet and serious. Müller, thinking that he might be better if he chose good companions, soon became the fast friend of Beta, but ere long it became evident that the latter was a backslider, and was glad to meet Müller because he hoped to be thus introduced into gay society. But God made Beta, after all, the means of lasting good to his young friend.

In June, 1825, Müller's continued profligacy again brought on serious illness. His state of health and want of money made his life outwardly somewhat better for a time, but the love of sin remained. At the commencement of August, Beta, Müller, and two other students drove about the country for four days. All the money for this costly pleasure had been obtained by pledging some of their remaining articles. When they returned their only thought was how to obtain fresh pleasures, and Müller, whose love of travel was very strong, proposed that they should go to Switzerland. At his suggestion, they made use of forged letters from their parents in order to procure passports, and, by pawning their books and other articles, obtained as much money as they thought necessary.

The young travellers went as far as Mount Rigi, in Switzerland, and spent in all forty-three days on their travels.

A PROVIDENTIAL WALK.

One Saturday afternoon, about the middle of November, 1825, he had a walk with his friend Beta, during which the latter mentioned that he was in the habit of going on Saturday evenings to the house of a Christian, where a meeting was held, and where they read the Bible, sang, prayed, and read a printed sermon. Müller asked permission to go with his friend, who, it seems, had been greatly troubled about his clandestine visit to Switzerland, and made a full confession of his sin to his father. He had also sought the acquaintance of a Dr. Richter, a godly man, who had himself studied a few years before at Halle, and who gave him, on his return to the university, a letter of introduction to a believing tradesman named Wagner. It was this devoted Christian at whose house the meeting was held.

A CORDIAL WELCOME.

At this time young Müller knew nothing of the ways of believers, and made an apology for coming to the meeting. The answer he received he never forgot. Mr. Wagner said: "Come as often as you please; house and heart are open to you." After the singing of a hymn, Mr. Kayser, who subsequently became a missionary in Africa, in connection with the London Missionary Society, fell on his knees, and asked a blessing on the meeting. This kneeling down made a great impression on George Müller, for he had never prayed on his knees, nor seen any one else pray on his knees.

THE TURNING POINT OF HIS LIFE.

As the two friends walked home, he said to Beta, "All we have seen on our journey to Switzerland, and all our former pleasures, are as nothing in comparison with this evening." "Whether I fell on my knees," Mr. Müller says, "when I returned home, I do not remember; but this I know, that I lay peaceful and happy in my bed. This shows that the Lord may begin His work in different ways. For I have not the least doubt that on that evening, He began the work of grace in me, though I obtained joy without any deep sorrow of heart, and with scarcely any knowledge. That evening was the turning point in my life."

"Now my life became very different, though not so that all sins were given up at once. My wicked companions were given up; the going to taverns was entirely discontinued; the habitual practice of telling falsehoods was no longer indulged in. I read the Scriptures, prayed often, loved the brethren, went to church from right motives, and stood on the side of Christ, though laughed at by my fellow students."

In January, 1826, he began to read missionary papers, and was moved to give himself to missionary work. His father, however, was greatly displeased with the proposal, and reproached him on the ground that he had expended so much money on his education, in the hope that he might comfortably spend his last days with his son in a parsonage at home. The father entreated him with tears to change his purpose, but he was steadfast, and resolved that he would henceforth receive no more money from his father.

In 1826 he offered himself as a laborer in the mission field in connection with the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, this theory, by which she sought to vindicate the ways of God to men, for scarcely had she finished her last sentence, when a band of horsemen rushed out upon her and her party from a narrow by-road. Four of them violently placed themselves between Sylph and her companions, and two immediately afterward dismounted near herself; one of them, though evidently from his movements an elderly man, had crape over his face, but the other had his face uncovered, and him Sylph, to her great alarm, recognized to be no other than Edward Denzille.

To her terror he laid rough hold upon her, raised her from the ground, and sought to place her on his saddle. She screamed and struggled desperately to get free from his grasp, but he was too strong for her. "Don't be afraid, Sylph," he cried. "I do not mean to hurt you. I am only proving my intense love for you. I only want you to be my wife."

"Never shall you succeed," she gasped out, giving him a look of utter loathing; "I will die first." And again she struggled frantically to escape from him, but in vain.

He had forced her up, almost in a swoon, upon the front of his saddle, and was preparing himself to mount behind, when Corny, who had pushed his way at a dash through the four intercepting horsemen, appeared upon the scene and made a rush to the rescue, shouting out, "Let her go, let her go! or by this and by that I'll brain yees!"

But the man masked in crape, who, as our readers will surmise, was the elder Denzille, raised his pistol, held by the barrel, high in the air, and then brought down the heavy stock of the weapon with all his force upon the head of the bold and impetuous Corny; and stretched him bleeding and unconscious on the road.

Seeing this done, Ned Denzille completed his mount, seized his horse's reins, drove in his spurs up to the rovel and started off in mad gallop, bearing away with him what he deemed his bravely won prize; but who was in a dead faint as he held her on with one arm before him.

All the horsemen, including the crape-disguised Mr. Denzille, followed at full speed; and Sylph's astonished friends gave her up for lost.

(To be continued.)

POWER TO FORGIVE.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 22. Mark 2:1-17. Golden Text, Isa. 43:25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A THIRD time our blessed Lord enters into Capernaum. No sooner is it noised abroad that He was in the house than the news is carried throughout the town that the great healing Prophet is in their midst again. He has not forgotten them, and although He goes to do the work of Him that sent Him in other cities, yet He is not indifferent to the need of the inhabitants of His own city. The multitude gathers; those who were healed in His last visit, overflowing with love and gratitude, are eager to drink in the words of life which fall from His lips; those who were disappointed the last time are there again; the laborers come in from the field, the busy housewife leaves her cooking, or washing, or spinning; the market is deserted, many are come together, no standing room is left even about the door. Simon's mother-in-law is there, strong and well, and the former sick ones are all seeking His recognizing smile. Then He who has had compassion upon their bodies opens to them the Gospel of the kingdom, and every eye and every ear is strained to catch the gracious words which proceed out of His mouth.

But there is

AN INTERRUPTION.

Somebody outside is pleading hard to be allowed to enter. Impossible for a band of four men with a poor paralytic whom they are bringing to the great Healer. There is no room; but these men are set upon attaining their object, they have given up a day's work to bring their sick comrade in contact with the Master, and they are not going to be foiled by little difficulties. Doors and windows are all blocked by the crowd outside. Probably one of them is a builder by trade, and he thinks of letting him down through the light roofing before Jesus. They lose no time, the covering is removed quickly, and quietly enough to cause little disturbance to the audience beneath, who then see the sick man on his mattress slowly descending just immediately in front of the Speaker. No doubt the crowd are annoyed at the interruption. Not so Jesus. He can see what no other eye sees. These men who brought their sick neighbor to Jesus remain unseen upon the roof, but Jesus sees their faith.

We know not what was the subject of the Lord's discourse; it may have been the gift of God and everlasting life, but suddenly breaking off He says to the sick of the palsy, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." It may be that when the sick man consented to be brought to Jesus it never occurred to him that there would be any reference made to his sins. Perhaps he thought that if he regained the use of his limbs, he would be more regular in his attendance at the synagogue, would be more exact in the payment of his tithes to the Levites, would give more alms, etc., but he never dreamed, perhaps, about squaring accounts with God about his past sins. Or it may be that the question had troubled him, and that he had enquired "How shall man be just with God?" (Job 9:2). And now he hears these words of absolution spoken with authority by Him who "spake as never man spake" (John 7:46).

There are men present who know a great deal about doctrine; for "there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, who were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem" (Luke 5:17); some who are come in perhaps to criticize; while others are hanging on the lips of the great Teacher; these are making their observations and weighing in the scales of critical prejudice all which they see and hear. They are too cautious to speak out the thoughts which are passing through their minds, for they are all inwardly occupied with the same question. They take for granted that Jesus is only a man in spite of the fulfilment of so many prophecies regarding Him; yet blinded by their unbelief they think, "Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God only?"

The thought is no sooner formed than it is answered by the great Heart-searcher; and we think those men must have started and looked abashed when He answered them aloud, and said, "Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins (He saith to the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house." Every eye is upon the paralytic. In an instant he arises, the withered hand which had been long moved by others, fills out in new muscular development, at once the contracted helpless leg experiences the same power, and the transformed man arises, rolls up his mattress, shoulders it, and walks abroad amid a shout of praise to God, for the voices of the spectators cannot be hushed, they glorify God, saying, "We never saw it on this fashion."

THE CASE IS PROVED.

Jesus has "power on earth to forgive sins."

This is the first instance where the connection between spiritual and physical healing is recorded. His miracles were rare, He only twice multiplied the loaves, and He stilled the waves as a very exceptional thing, but He was all day long, and every day, during the time of His ministry occupied as the Saviour from sin, and as the Healer of disease. The passage from which our golden text is taken proves His power to forgive. "Speaking to such as have failed in all their duties toward Him He says, 'Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins, thou has wearied me with thine iniquities. I, even I, am He that blotteth out thine iniquities for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins.' "For mine own sake." Jesus healed diseases and blotted out sins for His own sake. Why, O why, do not sinners "believe and receive and confess Him?"

A justly offended God says, "Sinner thou hast wronged me, rebelled against me, despised me, rejected me; I take sweet revenge on thee, and blot out all thy great debt to remember it no more;

now come and put me in remembrance." Some years ago

A QUAKER PHYSICIAN,

whose spirit of love and gentleness represented the Master whom he served, was driving in his buggy down a narrow lane in the city where he lived, which was partly blocked up with piles of brick and lumber. A drayman's cart stood directly in his way, he waited patiently for several minutes, and as the man did not move his cart he gently requested him to do so. The drayman, not recognizing the physician, began to use bad language calling the physician "old straight coat," and refusing to open the way. "Well, friend," said the doctor, "all I have to observe is this—if thee should get sick, or if thy family should ever be in distress, send for Doctor C. and he will do thee all the good he can." The drayman's heart was melted by the kindness which he knew he had not deserved, and he opened the way at once. God wins hearts by mercy, by undeserved kindness.

"For mine own sake," this is the secret of the whole matter, and this is what the pride of human nature receives so slowly. A man said the other day, "I cannot believe that a respectable man, such as I am, who have always had a conscience, have attended to my religious duties, and done all the good I could, I cannot believe that I have to go through the same change as outcasts and drunkards." Alas! how many think the same even if they do not say it. God says

"PUT ME IN REMEMBRANCE."

Of what? That "I am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins." O reader, how stands it with you about the past?

All the good which you may have done is very far short of your plain duty, and you have nothing over to pay up old accounts, and yet remember, "For every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof at the day of judgment" (Matt. 12:36). "God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil" (Eccl. 12:14). How can you meet the account when "God requireth that which is past?" (Eccl. 4:15). He puts it in your power to meet it with calmness and assurance, if only you will turn from sin and "dead works to serve the living God," for in this blessed Scripture you have a receipted bill for the whole amount. Your creditor states that the account is closed, "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself [by Jesus Christ, ver. 18], not imputing their trespasses unto them" (2 Cor. 5:19). "By Jesus Christ?" Yes, for we are, redeemed, not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, not with our own righteousnesses, which "are as filthy rags" (Isa. 64:6), but "with the precious blood of Christ" (1 Pet. 1:18, 19).

Redeemed at such a cost, yet not forgiven? How is this? The price laid down by the unspeakable self-sacrifice of Him whom you have offended, and still you are not forgiven? How comes this? Reader, if it stands thus with you, you have not obeyed your God, you have not put Him in remembrance. He has purchased the power to forgive you without violating His inviolable holiness and justice at a tremendous cost; He is in a position to pardon you justly, and requires of you only to accept of His gratuitous mercy. "But," you say, "does not this involve a change of life?" Of course it does. You cannot accept forgiveness for sin in which you are purposing to persevere; you cannot continue to treat with indifference the Saviour who has set you free. Ask that once palsied man what he thinks of Jesus, see how his eye brightens and how the tears stand in his eyes, as he tells of that never-to-be-forgotten day when in the presence of that crowded company in Capernaum he was healed, body and soul, by the words of Jesus. Tell him there is some habit of his which grieves his benefactor; cannot you hear him say with tears, "Nothing shall induce me to do it again." Ask him if he is prepared to suffer any monetary loss for that same Jesus; he will tell you that all he has is at His disposal. See him when once again Jesus comes that way; every glance of His grateful eye says, "Lord, I put Thee in remembrance of what Thou hast done for me."

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50
per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and single copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate and the House of Representatives assembled after the holiday recess on Thursday, January 5th. In the House, Judge Orth, of Indiana, protested in indignant terms against the manner in which the Speaker has made up the committees, and gave notice of his intention to present a proposition that the Standing Committees shall hereafter be appointed by the House instead of by the Speaker. No support was given to Judge Orth, but it is evident that on both sides of the House members are dissatisfied with the selections Mr. Keifer has made, and apprehension is felt that legislation will be impeded by the unsuitability of the committees for the business they will have to transact. The time of the Senate was mainly occupied with the introduction of amendments to Senator Sherman's bill for the issue of three per cent bonds. Mr. McPherson and Mr. Plumb each presented important amendments, and Mr. Beck advocated the whole question being postponed pending the consideration of the Morrill Tariff Commission Bill. The question of pension frauds was also hotly debated.

Rumors of Serious Irregularities are still current in respect to the Contingent Fund. A member of the Senate Committee on Appropriations is reported by the New York Times as saying that the investigation has developed many exposures, of which he cites as an instance the purchase of a sleigh and bells, which was entered on the Treasury books and records as a wagon. He says that in numerous cases vouchers have been falsified so as to represent the purchase of something entirely different from the article really bought; that recklessness, if not worse, has been exhibited in the mode of paying out money, and that money paid out of one fund has been frequently charged to another. He believes the examination of the irregularities of this character will consume considerable time, as the committee are determined to trace the responsibility in all these matters.

All the Evidence in the Trial of the Assassin at Washington was completed last week. Dr. Gray, of Utica Asylum, declared his positive conviction that Guiteau was sane. Several other medical experts were called, and then on Wednesday, January 4th, the testimony was finally concluded and the court adjourned until Saturday to give the lawyers engaged an opportunity for preparing the questions they would ask the court to submit to the jury. On Saturday Mr. Davidge and Mr. Porter for the people presented their case. They spoke in support of the rule of legal insanity as laid down by the judges of the English bench. That rule, they contended, had been adhered to in England and in this country ever since. It required the defence to show that the accused person was unable to distinguish between right and wrong, in order to establish his insanity. Mr. Reed and Mr. Scoville in reply argued that "The legal test of responsibility, when insanity is set up as a defence for alleged crime, is not merely whether the accused knew at the time what he was doing, and that the act was contrary to law, but was the act done as the result of an insane delusion, or was it committed under an influence or power which the accused could not resist by reason of his unsoundness of mind." They also argued that Guiteau's act was not the result of malice, and was, therefore, whether he was sane or insane, not murder but manslaughter. The prisoner continued his insolent interruptions during each day that the court was in session.

Mr. Campbell, the Delegate from Utah who holds the Governor's certificate, said recently in connection with the dispute between himself and Mr. Cannon, the Mormon Delegate: "I have been somewhat surprised to find so many men in Washington who sympathize with the Mormons. It is strange if people cannot understand that if any man in Utah, except a Mormon, were to have two wives he would be tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary for bigamy; while here is Mr. Cannon, who acknowledges that he has four wives, claiming a seat in Congress. Probably these Mormon sympathizers do not know that, while any Gentile in Utah who should have more than one wife would be promptly convicted and imprisoned for that offence, there are only three members of the Utah Legislature, in both branches, who are not practical polygamists, each having more than one wife."

The Death of the Hon. Edwin W. Stoughton, ex-Minister to Russia, took place on Saturday, January 7th. He had for several years been a sufferer from heart disease, and while he was in Russia in 1878 he was prostrated with a painful attack of that complaint. In the latter part of last year his condition again caused apprehension, but he so far recovered as to resume his usual occupations. On Friday he was worse and was unable to leave his bed, and on Saturday he died at 2.20 P.M. Mr. Stoughton was a native of Vermont, having been born at Springfield on May 1st, 1818. He settled in New York in 1837 and practised law with considerable success. President Hayes appointed him minister to Russia, but his health was not sufficiently vigorous to bear the rigor of the Russian winters, and though he made two attempts to live in St. Petersburg he was at last obliged to resign his office. He contributed many articles of an able character to the periodical press.

The Project of Erecting a Garfield Memorial Hospital is meeting with marked favor. The managers of the fund held a meeting on Thursday last, when it was reported that the circular addressed by the Postmaster-General to postmasters requesting them to organize committees in their respective localities to solicit subscriptions, is meeting with a hearty response. In foreign countries committees have been formed at Paris, Amsterdam, Cairo, Vienna, and London. The owners of three excellent stone quarries in the vicinity of Washington have offered the managers at a merely nominal price all the stone needed for the building.

Professor John William Draper, a Scientist and author whose reputation is world wide, died on January 4th, at Hastings-on-the-Hudson. He was seventy-one years of age, but was very active for his years. He had been for some weeks indisposed, but no apprehensions of a fatal result were entertained, and on the very day he died, his classes were assigned to him in the University of New York. Professor Draper was born at St. Helens, England, and obtained the rudiments of education in a Methodist school there. He afterwards studied at the London University. In 1833 he came to America, where several members of his family were already settled. In 1837 he was appointed Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, where he remained for three years. Coming to New York in 1839 he became Professor of Chemistry and Natural History in the University of the City of New York, and his connection with that institution continued until his death. He is said to have been the first to apply the discovery of Daguerre to the purpose of portrait taking, and was thus the pioneer of photographic art. He contributed many valuable papers to scientific journals and published several works as text-books of scientific departments. His best known work is the "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," which has been republished in England and has been translated into Arabic, Turkish, Servian, Russian, Polish, Hungarian, Italian, French, and German. In 1874 he published a "History of the Conflict between Religion and Science," which excited more active criticism than any other of his works. The objection to his book was well summarized by a critic, who said: "With Dr. Draper the word 'religion' is a symbol which stands for unenlightened bigotry or narrow-minded unwillingness to look facts in the face." (Luke 10: 21.)

Jerry McAuley's New Mission was opened on Sunday last in the building hitherto known as the "Cremorne Garden" in Thirty-second Street, New York. Dr. Taylor, Dr. I. Prime, and several other eminent ministers took part in the opening services. The mission in Water Street will still be continued, and Mr. McAuley has not removed from it any portion of the furniture, although many articles were personal gifts to himself. At present all that he has received toward furnishing the new mission is a present of two carpets. Mr. McAuley informs us that a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD living in Scotland, recently sent him a gift of postage stamps in token of her sympathy with him in the effort he is making.

A Remarkable Ministerial Record is that of the Rev. Dr. Diedrich Willers, who on Sunday, January 1st, preached for the last time as pastor of the German Reformed Church at Beartown, N. Y. Dr. Willers is in his ninety-third year, having been born in Germany in 1789; at the age of sixteen he enlisted in the army of Hanover and was an active participant with the allied forces under the Duke of Wellington at the battle of Waterloo, for bravery in which he received a medal. He came to America in 1819. During the long and arduous ministry of Dr. Willers he has preached 5800 sermons; officiated at 625 funerals; baptized 2026 persons; administered the rite of confirmation to 548 persons (of whom 406 were in his congregation) and performed 540 marriages. He has traveled a distance of about 80,000 miles in his endeavors to carry the Gospel message to remote villages and settlements and most of that distance he covered on foot or on horseback. He has resided at Beartown above half a century.

Guardian Angels is the Name of a Secret society reported by the New York Tribune as existing in Washington. It is said to be composed of ladies of eminent position in society, the wives and near relatives of Senators and Congressmen, who propose to unite their efforts for the reform by means of social influence of gentlemen connected with Congress and the civil service who are addicted to intoxicating drinks, and also to promote the principles of total abstinence in the homes of the aristocracy. Mrs. Logan, the wife of Senator Logan, is named as a leader in the movement.

A Reader of the Christian Herald sending a club of 23 subscribers, writes: "Others have applied for the paper, but have not yet handed in the cash. The paper has given great satisfaction, and the people demanded it again. Mrs. —, who took a copy last year, now renews and send, for another copy for her daughter. Unconverted husbands read the paper aloud to their families. Some subscribers send it, after reading it, to distant places; and one experienced Christian said that she felt that she was always doing real service to the Lord in that way, as every copy sent would do much good."

Portraits and Biographical Sketches of the following eminent persons have recently appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the dates given opposite their names: Father Taylor, the Seaman's Missionary, November 24th; Rev. Wm. Arthur (author of the "Tongue of Fire"), December 1st; Rev. Dr. Palmer, of New Orleans, December 8th; Governor St. John, of Kansas, December 22d; Mr. Robert Graham, of the American Church Temperance Society, January 5th.

Order through a newsdealer, who can get copies through any News Company.

A Female Burglar Claimed Inspiration when arrested last week at Fredonia, N. Y. It appears that the residence of Mr. L. H. Taylor of that village has been despoiled of much valuable property. No clue was at first found to the thieves, but a few days afterward Miss Ella Cummings, a pretty and accomplished young lady, a graduate, and lately a teacher in the State Normal School, was suspected of being concerned in the robbery, and when her home was searched the missing articles to the value of $1000 were discovered there. When arrested she confessed her guilt, but said she was not responsible for the crimes, as she was the agent of an irresistible power, and could not be convicted. It has been learned that she is a strong advocate and believer in Spiritualism, and says she has frequently received communications from the spirit world. The plea this young lady offers is doubtless a mere excuse suggested by the incidents of the trial of the miscreant at Washington, but as the Bible paints in clear colors the character of the spirits with which spiritualists hold converse, it is not impossible that she was really prompted by them to commit the crime. Satan's influence over the souls of men is already only too powerfully exerted without the aid of spiritualism, which is simply a more direct means of communication.

A Vessel with only one Man on Board, and he a frozen corpse, was towed into the port of New Haven on January 4th by the tug Alert. The captain of the Alert while off Stratford saw the sloop Lillie drifting aimlessly about and took her in tow. It was found that she had been stolen the day before from City Island by two men. There were marks of a struggle on board, and the hold was stained with blood. The only conclusion probable is that the two men quarrelled after they had stolen the vessel, one had been murdered and thrown overboard by the other, who had afterward been frozen to death while trying to navigate the vessel through the Sound. Satan generally rewards those who engage in his employ in this way, but it is not often that the end is so prompt and terrible as in this case.

How a Remarkable Coincidence Gave Encouragement to an anxious Christian was related at a religious service in New York last week. The man was threatened with a law suit. He was innocent of the wrong charged against him, but the persecution was not any more likely to fail on that account, for he was poor and had not the means to procure able legal assistance. Very much dispirited and full of apprehension he went to a prayer meeting, and as he sat there, he silently lifted up his heart to God in prayer. As he prayed scarcely listening to what was going on in the meeting, some words read by the minister conducting the meeting struck his ear. They were, "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper" (Isa. 54 : 17). They dropped like healing oil into his wounded heart, and he went away quietly trusting in God. From that day to this he has heard no more of the lawsuit. Who shall say that the coincidence was not an intervention of God to strengthen the faith of His child?

An Ancient City cut out of Solid Rock has been discovered in the far West. Mr. James Stevenson, who has had charge of the researches made under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, for which Congress made an appropriation three years ago, is the discoverer of the city. He made the acquaintance of an old Indian chief, one of the Pueblos, in whose possession he found many antique relics of a bygone age. As he was interested in these relics, which were principally pottery, household utensils, and arrow heads, the acquaintance developed, and in the course of conversation the chief told Mr. Stevenson of a locality where there was a city sixty miles long, the houses of which were cut in the face of high cliffs. Mr. Stevenson visited the spot, and found the chief's narrative accurate. At least one hundred thousand persons must once have lived in this city, which is composed of rows of caves cut out of the cliffs, and which were used as dwellings, some of them with five chambers one above the other. The excavations were all of the same pattern, having an oval roof, and only one aperture, which served for window, door, and chimney. Fireplaces were cut in the rear, and in some of them charred ends of timber were found, and there were recesses in the walls which had apparently been used as cupboards. Upon the top of the Mesa, or table-land, above these caves there were found large circular structures now in ruins, but with walls to the height of ten or twelve feet still standing. They were evidently places of worship. Measurements were made of two of these structures, one of which was 100 and the other 200 feet in diameter, and might have held from 1000 to 2000 people. Mr. Stevenson expresses his conviction that the Pueblos are the descendants of this pre-historic race, who like the Conies mentioned in Proverbs 30 : 26 "made their houses in the rocks."

A Stolen Bag of Christmas Presents was restored to the owner on Christmas Eve in Boston, Mass. A lady had been to the city to purchase presents for her children, and on returning, laid the satchel containing them down for a few minutes in the Old Colony Depot. In a few minutes she missed it, and though she instantly gave an alarm the thief was not captured. The next day, however, she received her bag and its contents intact by express, and with it a note signed "Repentant Sinner," in which the writer said: "I return your shopping bag and contents unharmed. For the first time in my life I was tempted to take that which did not belong to me. I took it to my miserable home and opened it; on seeing a little girl's bracelet it took me back to my happy childhood when I looked longingly for Christmas to come, and my conscience reproved me." There is a touch of pathos in the confession. The thief recalled to a sense of right and impelled to make restitution by the memory of childhood's days and the consciousness of the depth to which she had fallen, cannot be wholly lost to good influences. Would that she, and others like her, could realize that Jesus, who said "suffer little children and forbid them not to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven," said also, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out" (John 6 : 37).

A Quaint Reproof was administered recently by a colored preacher to Christians who fail to relieve the wants of their afflicted brethren. He said: "When I meet a widder who am out of wood, an old man who has been turned out o' doahs, or a working man whose home am under de shadow o' death, I doan lean on de fence an' look to Hebben fur relief. If I've got a dollar I hant it out. I lend it or give it or make 'em take it, an' if Hebben does anything funder dat's extra." In time of trouble the Christian may often do good by giving spiritual comfort and consolation, for then the mind of the sufferer is generally softened and receptive, but, as the preacher forcibly reminded his hearers, practical charity in the shape of relief for the body should be shown where it is needed and when it is possible (James 2 : 15, 16).

A Desperate Combat with a Whale is Described by Mr. Joseph W. Mead, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in a letter just received from him, written on board the Hercules off St. Helena. He says: "On the 6th of June last we lowered our boats and in a short time our second mate struck a whale. In a few minutes after, the whale caught the boat and completely chewed it up. The chief mate, when he saw our signal from the ship, sent a boat and had the crew picked up, took the line and still had the whale fast. The third mate also came up and went on the whale three times. The fourth time the whale caught and mashed his boat into fire-wood. About this time we received help from a ship called the Milton, which sent two boats to the rescue, for we were in a very weak condition. Before you could hardly think it possible, however, the Milton's boats were both mashed and their crews swimming in the water. They were soon rescued by our boats. The boats hung about the whale until dark, when we cut the line and let the huge monster go. The next morning, however, we saw him again and took another hold of him, and about 5 o'clock in the afternoon we succeeded in dispatching him. The perseverance with which these intrepid men struggled with this monster of the deep might be imitated with advantage by all those who are grappling with the formidable foes of morality and religion."

THE BRIDE AND HER ORNAMENTS: THE SIN OF FORGETTING GOD.

A Short Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire? yet my people have forgotten me days without number."—JEREMIAH 2 : 32.

God's Rebukes Proofs of His Love—He Chides Rather than Abandons—His Complaint of His People—I. A Very Grievous Sin—Whom They had Forgotten—Who it was that Forgot—A Redeemed People—The Space in which they had Forgotten—How is God Forgotten?—By Worldliness—By Self-Seeking—By Failure of Trust—By Neglect of Private Devotion—Luther's Busy Day—By Breach of Communion—It Leads to Mischief—II. The Chiding Question—Minds Full of Trivial Things—A Forgetful Bride Unreasonable—Forgetfulness at a Wedding Unseasonable—The Bride Labors to Obtain Ornaments—Thinks a Great Deal About Them—Glad to Wear Them—III. A Call to Repentance—What if God Forgot.

It is a clear proof of the great love of God to His people that He will not lose their love without earnest expostulation. When you do not care at all for a person, he may love you or hate you, it is all the same to you; but when you have great love for him, then you earnestly desire to possess his heart in return. This, then, is clear proof that God greatly loves His people, since, whenever their hearts wander from Him, He is greatly grieved, and He rebukes them, and earnestly pleads with them, setting the coldness of their hearts in a true light, and striving to bring them back to warm affection toward Himself.

Many parents are like Eli; they cannot endure the task of chastening their children; and so, when their sons grow up to be their plague, they must not wonder, for they have procured this evil to themselves by their unworthy love of ease. Our heavenly Father is never an Eli; He will not "spare the rod and spoil the child." He loves us too well to suffer us to go on in our iniquity. He will not stay His hand, and leave us to perish. He will scourge rather than abandon; He will chide rather than lose. To-day He speaks in tones of severity that He may not be compelled to utter to-morrow words of doom. Accept, then, at this time, dear friend, whatever shall come to you out of this text. If it should be bitter in your mouth, yet receive it thankfully from God as good medicine to your spirit, and so may His Spirit cause it to be.

Coming to the text in which God proves His love to His people because He will not let their love readily go away from Himself, notice, first, a grievous sin. "My people have forgotten me." Secondly, a chiding question about that sin. "Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?" And then, thirdly, let us observe the call to repentance which lies within the text, like perfume in a flower. If we have forgotten God, let us grieve over such forgetfulness, and turn to Him at once with full purpose of heart—even unto God our exceeding joy.

I. First, then, here is

A VERY GRIEVOUS SIN.

"My people have forgotten me days without number."

Observe whom they had forgotten; it will help us to see the sin of it. The Lord saith, "My people have forgotten me." It would not have mattered half as much if they had forgotten their dearest friends—if the husband had forgotten his wife, or the mother her child; but here are favored men and women who have forgotten their God, their Father, their life, their all. "My people have forgotten me, their God." Other nations, having set up their false gods, did not forget them, but, with blind pertinacity of devotion, they bowed before them; but my people have forgotten their God, the only God, the living and true God. My people have forgotten me—the good God, whom it is pleasure to remember.

Who were they that forgot God? That casts a second light upon this sin. "My people have forgotten me." Not strangers, not heathen, not those who have only heard of me but have never known me; but "my people." It signifies, "my chosen, my elect, a people whom I have taken out from the midst of the earth that they may be a people unto me forever. My people have forgotten me." Chosen of God, and yet forget electing love? "My people." It is a redeemed people who have become the Lord's, because they are not their own, but are bought with a price. He has redeemed them unto Himself forever—redeemed them from among men by the matchless price of His only begotten Son's life. And shall it be that those on whom there is the eternal blood-mark—who are set apart by sacrifice to be God's own—that they shall forget Him? Oh, sad ingratitude!

"My people." That is to say, a people not only chosen and redeemed, but brought to know Him, brought into fellowship with Him, brought into relationship with Him, brought absolutely into union with Him—they have forgotten me. You that sat at Jesus' feet, and drank in His loving words; you that sat at His table, and to whom He was made known in the breaking of bread; you that have laid your head upon the bosom of the Lord—can it, shall it be said of you, "My people have forgotten me?" Oh, but this is sad, "He that eateth bread with me hath forgotten me. He that said he would die for my sake has forgotten me. He that sang just now,

"Hast thou a lamb in all thy flock
I would disdain to feed?
Hast thou a foe before whose face
I fear thy cause to plead?"

He has forgotten me!" Alas, my brethren, that ever you and I should have been upon the mount with Jesus, that we should have been in the garden with Him, that we should have danced for very joy of heart in His presence, and should have felt ourselves next door to the gates of heaven when He has laid bare His heart to us, and yet it should ever be said of us that we have forgotten Him! This will be sad indeed, if ever it comes to this; and yet this is the crime that is laid at the door of His own people. "My people have forgotten me."

Observe sadly the space in which they had forgotten; in the case of Israel, it is added, "days without number." Ah me! I hope it has not come to that with any of us here present; and yet it may; it may. I may be touching a chord now which shall awaken the saddest memories. "Days without number." How long is it, friend, since you were in the habit of walking with God? How long is it since you have seen the face of the Well-Beloved? I ventured to put that question once to a professor, and, shaking his head, he replied, "Don't ask me that; if you will ask me whether I have been a drunkard, whether I have been dishonest in business, whether I have done any positive action by which I have degraded the Christian name, I can answer you without fear; but if you ask, How long since I have had fellowship with Christ, I cannot—I dare not—answer you."

Yet I venture to press the question, and I hope the answer will not be, "I have forgotten Him days without number." I hope you will not sing, as Cowper did,

"What peaceful hours I once enjoy'd!
How sweet their memory still!
But now I find an aching void
The world can never fill."

On the contrary, may it be yours and mine to be kept from forgetting God at all; and if there ever should be a moment in which we wander, may it be a small moment, much lamented and never repeated.

You see the sin lies in this, that we should forget God, that we should do it, and do it "days without number."

HOW IS GOD FORGOTTEN?

What are the manifestations of this offence? Some professors evidently forget God by their worldliness. When they were in a humbler condition of society they were wont to find great enjoyment at prayer-meetings—the assembling of the saints together was very joyful to them. The reading and hearing of the word were gracious refreshments to them, but they are now too rich to care for this light bread. They have prospered so much that if they prosper much more it will be a thousand times worse than adversity, as in the case of the celebrated captain who, when his soldiers said they had won a victory, said, "One more such victory as this, and we shall be defeated forever." Such rising men, like the Israelites, have been filled with the quails, but while the meat is yet in their mouths the wrath of God has come upon them. They have been fattened with the treasures of the world, but their souls have been starved to very skeletons, for they have not fed upon the things of God.

Some have forgotten God by self-seeking. They live unto themselves. It is clear that, though once they seemed to have a zeal for God, now their zeal is entirely to push their own way, to make their own fortunes, to plant out their children—anything and everything except the glory of God and the love of souls. And yet they profess to be God's people even now. True is the lament, "My people have forgotten me." It is well to forget self to glorify God; but to make self our god is a thing accursed in the highest degree.

Some, too, show that they forget God by the failure of their trust. They are in trouble, and they are very anxious. Why? Because they have forgotten God, though He has promised to help them. They are wondering what is to become of them, looking all about them with the greatest amount of carking care that even a worldling might feel; and if you say to them, "God will provide, God is your helper," they have forgotten God, they have left Him out of their calculation. They are fretting and worrying, they are troubled and cast down, because they have forgotten God. You can do this in your daily concerns, until you may act as if God Himself were dead.

It is sad indeed when a Christian acts upon atheistic principles, and despairs as if he had no God to succor him. Some people when things run a little cross to them, some working-men when they are out of work, some men when they cannot see God's work prospering just as they would have it, leave out of their calculation the one great Worker, the one great Force, and soon get troubled, and cast down, and go crawling about the world full of distrust. Ah me, what evils come to men when they have forgotten God!

Alas, there are some who add to this a forgetfulness of God through

NEGLECT OF PRIVATE DEVOTION.

Prayers are slurred over; drawing near to God becomes a form and a pretence. The word is read, but it is not read with the view of finding God in the sacred volume, and having fellowship with Him through the word. Oh, it is sad when it can be said that God's people are forgetting Him in the closet. "It was such a busy day," says one, "I could not find time to pray." Recollect how Martin Luther acted; he said that he must have three hours' prayer one day because it was such a busy day that he should not have strength to get through it if he did not have extra time for devotion.

It is foolish to say, "I have more to do, and so I will take less time in getting strength to do it with." As well might the mower say, "It is a bigger field to mow, and so I will take less trouble in sharpening my scythe." It is, depend upon it, a dead waste of time to be short in drawing near to God. The Lord might well complain: "My people have forgotten me. They have not waited upon me in wrestling prayer; they have not cried to me during the day. They have not lifted up their hearts to me in the moment of trouble; they have not consulted me in difficulty; they have not rejoiced in me in the time of their joy. They have forgotten me."

And you and I can do it in a very high sense by a breach of communion, by getting out of fellowship with God, by walking contrary to Him, so that He walks contrary to us. It is very bad walking and very bad living when God and ourselves are at cross purposes. It is a very sweet thing, when you are conscious of having done wrong, to go back to your heavenly Father at once and own it, and get right again. How willing He is to receive us! How glad He is to blot out the past and let bygones be bygones, and to let us start anew with Him. He delights to forgive. Sometimes we let the stones accumulate till there is quite a heap, and they are made into a wall, which blocks our way. If every stone had been flung away one by one, how much easier it would have been! There would not be clouds of dust if we kept our ways well watered with daily repentance. There would not be a separation between God and our soul in great things if we would not allow it in little things. But, I fear me, too often it may be said of this high point of rapturous fellowship with God, "My people have forgotten me days without number."

I scarcely need, I think, to talk longer about this sin, except to notice that, if ever we do forget God, it leads to all sorts of mischief. We lose our joy and our comfort; and then we lose our strength and our watchfulness; and then we backslide by little and little; and then, probably, we fall into one sin, and then into another sin, if not into a third more grievous still. David had never sinned with Bathsheba if he had not forgotten his God. By degrees we get hardened about our state, and soon it comes to this—that we have lost the presence of God, and do not care whether we have it or not. Oh, this is a sad, sad state of heart. God save us from it. May it never be said of us, "My people have forgotten me days without number."

II. And now, dear friends, I call your attention to which is the very marrow of the text: "Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?"

THE CHIDING QUESTION

And I suppose that question is put, first, because there are many trivial things which occupy minds so that they cannot forget them. How sad it is that the grandest things, the best things, should not equally engross our thoughts! Now, I will not say a word about you western women that are here; of course, you do not care about ornaments or dress; at least, you should not; but eastern women were very fond of ornaments, and it was a question which every Oriental could understand, "Can a maid forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?" Of course such forgetfulness was impossible. The young woman's mind was full of her jewels. Isaiah gives you a long list that seems to have been cut out of the fashion-book of the day, a long list of various things that ladies used to wear in those days; and these they never forgot. Their minds doted upon them, and when the marriage-day came round, that was the main thought—how they should be dressed, how they should glitter before all onlookers.

We should have had no need of either ornament or attire if it had not been for sin. Strange that the insignia of our fall should become the ground of our boasting. Yet so it is. But here is the point: do, then, these eastern women value their jewels and their dress so much that they cannot forget them? Are their heads filled with these things so that they never slip out of their memories? And do the people of God forget their God? I do not know a stronger way of putting it. Can these trifles secure their places so surely, and shall the supremest good so readily escape our thoughts? Shame on us!

The next is this: if a bride did forget her attire, or a maid did forget her ornaments, it would be very unreasonable behavior. The thing was so unreasonable, that it was quite unknown. Suppose we found having no regard whatever, on her marriage day, to her attire; she would be thought to be mad. They would say, "This is so contrary to all women's ways in this part of the world, that she must have lost her reason." It is unreasonable that a bride should forget her ornaments and her attire; but how infinitely more unreasonable it is that you and I should forget God. He is our diadem of glory; He is our beauty of holiness. In Christ we are arrayed in raiment of needlework, and our garments are of wrought gold. Can we, shall we forget Him?

AN EASTERN WOMAN

There may be a reason for forgetting to eat bread; there may be a reason for forgetting to put on one's garments; such neglects have been reasonable in times of fire, or danger to life, but there never can be a reason for forgetting God. A child of God is in the most unreasonable condition in which a human being can be when he is living a single day without remembering his God, his life, his heaven, his all.

Next, it would have been a most unseasonable thing for a maid to forget her attire at her wedding. If she forgot her dress on other days, it might be well enough; but, when the marriage drew near, for the bride to forget her attire would be thought a most unseasonable neglect. Forget it to-morrow, if you will, but not when your marriage has come. You may have forgotten it many days ago; but do not forget it now that the happy day has arrived. A bride who forgets her attire would be something who forgot to take oil in their vessels with their lamps. And, certainly, it is a most unseasonable thing for me and you to forget our God while we are here.

LIKE THE FOOLISH VIRGINS

Notice the conduct of the maid or the conduct of the bride, with regard to her ornaments. What does the maid do? Her conduct is the reverse of forgetfulness as to dress and ornaments. She labors hard to obtain her ornaments and to gain her attire. Many women in the East save up every coin that they have, and turn all into silver. They do not care about storing up coin, but they prefer the precious metal in the form of rings for their ankles, arms, necks, noses, and ears. It is their life's work to provide themselves with ornaments against the marriage day. While they do this, let us do better; let us store up the thoughts of Christ, and the words of Christ, and the things of Christ, and let us labor, let us wear ourselves away, to get more and more of Christ, that we may be adorned with Him and made comely in His comeliness.

When the eastern woman has with great difficulty obtained her ornaments and her attire, then she thinks a great deal of them; she preserves them with much care; she will, if possible, prevent a thief from taking away a ring or gem; she locks them up carefully. Oh, that we did store up every bit we get of our Lord's love, and put it by to keep it, never losing any pearl that we find, or any ring that we fashion by experience. I say that the eastern woman thinks about her bridal attire. Why, we hear of them dreaming about it—dreaming about the next bracelet they will buy, the next jewel they will hang about their necks. Would to God we were as much taken up with the preciousness of Christ!

How joyfully the eastern woman puts on her jewels, puts on her attire. She has these things to wear them. I am ashamed of those Christians who are ashamed of Christ. They have jewels; I hope they have; but they are very chary of ever showing them. Perhaps they get some Christian friend into a corner, and they say, "I have a jewel that I mean to wear, but not yet; I am afraid it should be seen as yet, but I will show it you if you will not tell anybody else." If anybody comes round after sermon and gently inquires, "Have you any of the precious things of Christ?" these timid ones blush and half deny their own joy. Some people—ay, some of Christ's well-beloved ones—whisper, "I hardly know." Is this after the right manner?

The eastern woman puts everything upon her on her marriage; and eastern ladies at a banquet are all ablaze with diamonds and jewels, and gold and silver. I wish you Christian people would publicly put on your priceless jewels and never be ashamed of them. Do you know anything about Christ? Tell it; tell it; and you will soon know more. Do you know anything about Christ? Live it; live it out; and you will soon have more. Do put on your jewels. I do not see, while the Bridegroom is about, why you should put on your everyday rags.

III. Now I close with a few words of

CALL TO REPENTANCE,

if we have in any measure or degree forgotten our God. I am sure, first, that our God does not deserve to be treated so. "You use no other friend so ill." Such love, such love, such wondrous love, infinite, unending, everlasting love, to you! And can you forget? Can you forget? So undeserving, and yet so favored! Can you forget your friend? Loved by God as He loves His own soul! Can you forget?

Have you forgotten? Will not the time past suffice for that? A half a minute's forgetfulness of God is half a minute too long. Let it not come to be "days without number." But, if the number be ever so small, let us weep to think we should have forgotten Him at all. Let our sorrows flow at the recollection that He has never forgotten us—no, never for a moment, and yet we have forgotten Him. Our names have been on Jesus' breastplate, and on His shoulders days without number; shall His name be ever out of our minds? "I have graven thee on the palms of my hands," says He. Let us engrave His name upon the tablets of our hearts.

Think, for a minute,

IF HE HAD FORGOTTEN YOU,

forgotten you in your merriest moment, ay, in your holiest moment, what would have been your portion? If God had suspended the outflow of His grace, and left you to yourselves, what had been your fate? Oh, my God, my God, if Thou hadst once forgotten me, where had I been? But He never has forgotten us. He is not forgetting us at this moment. He says to each one, however wandering, "I do earnestly remember thee still." He will never forget us. The dying thief said, "Lord, remember me;" and Jesus did remember him. He cries, "I remember thee, the love of thine espousals." Lord, dost Thou remember me? Then would I smite my heart to think I ever should have forgotten Thee.

Oh, how can we forget when God is our diadem of glory? It is our highest privilege that He is ours and we are His. God is our beauty, the honor and excellence of all His saints. It is this that makes us illustrious in the eyes of cherubim and seraphim—that God is ours and we are His. God is our joy, our only joy, our overflowing joy. He that knoweth God hath heaven within his spirit even now. Come, let us not forget again, but let us bind the glorious name of Lord about our heart. May the sweet Spirit do it now, for Jesus Christ's sweet love's sake. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON
—Jeremiah 2.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

"I'LL THINK ABOUT IT."

AND this was all I could get from him.

For a full half hour at least I had been hammering away at Tom Twitcher's drinking habits, and answering his objections one by one. And yet, as far as conviction went, successfully too. But although shut up completely, and obliged to confess himself in the wrong, "I'll think about it," was his only reply.

Provoking! I should think it was. Most provoking! I should like to know who wouldn't be provoked to find the fish he felt sure he had hooked swim away.

I think in future, before I begin to argue with any other Tom Twitcher, it will be as well to ask him the course he intends to take if convinced. If he is only going "to think about it," I will spare my breath and expend my time on some more worthy object.

You say, perhaps, I ought to be contented with such a conclusion, and that I ought to be rather delighted at the promise Tom gave me to think about it. You deem it a real victory to have made any of the Twitcher family think at all.

That's all you know about it. Excuse my bluntness. But I fancy I know a thing or two about this "thinking about it," and, if you like, I will let you into the secret.

Well, a long time ago I discovered that men, and women too for the matter of that, who promise you so faithfully to "think about it," scarcely ever think about it at all. The whole subject, and especially your fine, pet arguments, drop out of their minds almost immediately. You are no sooner out of their sight than Temperance vanishes too. It's a fact, I assure you, in the great multitude of cases. And any honest man of the Twitcher species will tell you the same thing. "Think about it!" Not they!

It is my opinion that they never intended to think about it.

"Hallo! I say. That's strong language."

Yes, but it is true.

"Then you hold that they told a lie?"

Yes, in many cases an eniphatie lie. For surely that is a lie, when a man pledges his word to do something which he never from his heart intended to do.

And then, I have discovered too that in the few cases where it is really intended to "think about it," no further intention is meant. They do not purpose to act upon what they think. I, for one, don't see the force of thinking about right steps in life, if there is no intention of taking them. Doesn't it seem an absurd, irrational thing to you too? "I'll think about it." Yes, and much use you will make of it when you do think.

Moreover, I have found that too often where men say that they will "think about it," they often mean in their heart of hearts that they will think against it. They may give you quite the contrary impression. They may lead you to suppose that they are going conscientiously to weigh the strong arguments you have brought to bear upon them. Not a bit of it. They will straightway go and build fresh buttresses for their shattered fortress. They will think against, instead of for, the cause you have at heart.

You say you are at a loss to see why they should have made a promise at all if they didn't mean to keep it, seeing they were quite at liberty to say it or leave it unsaid.

I think I can tell you why Tom Twitcher made the promise. And I think what is true of Tom is true of most people. At any rate, you will be able to judge for yourself.

You see our friend was so completely nonplussed that only two courses lay open to him. He must either yield altogether and become a total abstainer or say that he would "think about it." Now, he was not in the mind to give up his drink, and so he took the second course. He might certainly have yielded his principle and kept to his practice, but then he would have lost the better part of his reputation. Don't you see that Tom Twitcher made his promise to "think about it" a sort of harbor of refuge?

Another reason was, I imagine, that Tom Twitcher wanted to save himself future trouble. It is a very unpleasant thing to be beaten in argument, and it is not a nice thing to be shown that you are behaving in a not altogether proper manner. How, for instance, would you relish being told that drink was ruining your health, was weakening your mind, or was endangering the peace of your family? Tom Twitcher's "I'll think about it" was simply an ingenious plan of being let alone. That was all. Its chief value consisted in its likelihood of throwing people off the scent. You are not to imagine Tom drinking as usual. Oh dear, no! You are to imagine him, with knitted brows, "thinking about it."

Ah! Tom, Tom, if you would only stop drinking while you are thinking about it, I would believe you then. You might think then as long as you liked.

How can you think while you are steeping your poor brain in strong drink? A clear thought can never be produced from such a muddled, confused mind as yours now is. Give up the drink for a while, let its fumes pass away, and you will then think to some purpose.

Alas! how many men and women are going down to a drunkard's grave with this promise on their lips, "I'll think about it."

And worse still, how many are going swiftly to a drunkard's eternal ruin with the same cry!

A Scene in the Burning Theatre in Vienna.

Oh that they would think of their souls. Oh that they would think of the Saviour who died for them.

Heard the word of the Lord: "The ways of a man are before the eyes of the Lord, and He pondereth all his goings."

A SCENE IN THE BURNING THEATRE IN VIENNA.

As already mentioned under the head of "Foreign Topics," the Ring Theatre, formerly the Comic Opera-House, where Mdlle. Sarah Bernhardt recently performed, took fire shortly before 7 o'clock, on Thursday evening, December 8th, just before the commencement of an opera by Offenbach. The house was crowded. In the confusion of the horrible catastrophe the iron partition separating the stage from the body of the theatre was not let down, and the fire consequently was not confined, as it might have been, to the stage.

The scene was most heartrending and passes all description. Thousands of people assembled in the wide Ring-strasse and the neighboring streets, could hear the cries of agony and despair from the unfortunate people at the windows of the theatre, praying to be saved. The rapidity with which the flames spread prevented the people from taking advantage of the ordinary means of exit. It is believed that nearly 1000 persons perished in the flames. Only a small proportion of the audience were saved by risking a leap from the windows, three stories high, into cloths extended to receive them. In nearly all cases the deaths were caused by suffocation.

The excitement in Vienna was intense, and was increased by the belief that the disaster was due to negligence and want of presence of mind.

When the fire was over, and all who were within lay in a burned and charred heap, the melancholy business of removing the dead was commenced; and as the timbers were cleared away, the sights that met the eye were of the most appalling description. Many with glazed eyes, burned hair, and charred faces, had on their holiday clothes and decorations, which the flames had not reached, on account of the close pressure of the throng.

The theatre was an exceedingly handsome structure, in keeping with the splendid edifices which have risen up within the past few years in its immediate neighborhood.

As we shudder with horror at the account of the horrible catastrophe, we are appalled by the thought of that greater conflagration which is coming, and which it faintly typifies. Men are amusing themselves now, spending their time in frivolous pursuits, in passing show and vain unsubstantial delights like the tinsel pageant of a theatre, while their eternal interests are neglected. How awful will be their fate when the dread hour arrives in which the world and the things that are therein shall be destroyed with fire from heaven. (2 Peter 3: 10.)

THE "BRADFORD," THE RAMSGATE LIFE-BOAT.

THE annals of life-boat service are full of incidents of heroism. The brave men who live on the coast and who engage in this perilous service are men who voluntarily risk their lives in the hope of rescuing others, and they frequently face a death which seems inevitable to those who watch them, in order that men whom they may have never seen may have a chance of life. Within recent years a life-boat movement has been started in England of a very interesting character. Its object is to assist the brave men who man the life-boats. At the points of the coast where there is most danger of wreck, and therefore most need of life-boats, the towns and villages are, for the most part, very poor, and the inhabitants cannot afford to purchase a vessel suitable for the service. The consequence has been that many lives have been sacrificed which might have been saved had the daring men who ventured out on expeditions of rescue been carried in a skilfully constructed life-boat. The movement to which we have alluded is designed to meet this difficulty. The citizens of large inland cities and wealthy manufacturing towns have subscribed and purchased life-boats which have been stationed at various points on the British coast, and they generally bear the names of the towns which have presented them.

Among these boats is the "Bradford" of Ramsgate. There is no better boat on any part of the British coasts, and only two in Great Britain are larger. She was presented by the people of Bradford (which is the centre of the woollen branch of the dry-goods trade), and is called after that town. The occasion of her most important service was the wreck of "The Indian Chief" on January 6th, 1881, on which day the master of a Ramsgate smack, "Forget-me-Not" reported to the authorities of that port that, while running for home, he had observed a large ship ashore on the Long Sands. The tug Vulcan, with the life-boat Bradford in tow, therefore left the Royal Harbor at a quarter past twelve to render assistance. There was a strong easterly gale blowing, and the sea, which was running very high, broke in volumes over the boats as they left the harbor on their noble mission, the life-boat being frequently hidden from the view of the hundreds who witnessed her departure.

A Perilous Adventure in the Hebrides.

In consequence of the adverse wind and heavy sea the tug was retarded in her progress, and did not arrive near the Long Sands until considerably after nightfall. They spoke the Knock Lightship, but owing to darkness, the whereabouts of the stranded vessel could not be discovered, and the tug and life-boat were compelled to lie-to until day break, the crew of the latter, who remained in the boat, being grievously exposed to the severe weather. Describing the gale which blew, the coxswain, Charles Edward Fish, says: "Old Tom Cooper, one of the best boatmen in all England, who made one of our crew, agreed with me that it was more like a flaying machine than a natural gale of wind. The feel of it in the face was like being gnawed by a dog."

At nine o'clock on Thursday morning a large ship was sighted, bearing northwest to the Knock Lightship. The Bradford was at once turned to windward, and, on being let go by the tug, bore down on the stranded vessel, which proved to be the Indian Chief, Captain Fraser, 1238 tons register, of Liverpool, bound from Middlesborough for Yokohama, with a general cargo. The crew numbered twenty-nine, all told, but of these only twelve remained to be saved by the Bradford, one of whom, the second mate, died from exhaustion after he was got into the boat. The men had taken refuge in the rigging, and comprised, besides the deceased, nine seamen, the chief mate, and a pilot, the captain having been killed by a falling mast. The rescue was accomplished shortly after ten o'clock, and the life-boat proceeded on her journey in tow of the Vulcan, arriving in Ramsgate Harbor about half past two on Thursday afternoon, having been absent upward of twenty-six hours.

From daybreak on Thursday morning the vicinity of the pier was thronged with persons anxiously awaiting the return of the Bradford. Wives were watching for their husbands, mothers for their sons, and numbers of citizens solicitous for the brave men whom they knew. The long hours of the night passed, and all longed for daybreak, hoping to catch sight of the trusty boat and her gallant crew. With the first ray of dawn every glass was turned seaward, but there was no sign of what they sought. The morning passed wearily away, but soon after noon a glad shout went up as an old sailor announced that he saw and recognized the Bradford heavily laden approaching the land. When at last she touched shore what words can describe the enthusiastic cheers, the hearty greetings of the waiting crowd which had increased to two thousand persons, as the lifeboat and crew, and the shipwrecked men they had saved stepped on dry ground.

We do not know how far angels and the spirits of just men made perfect are cognizant of the events passing on our world, but we have reason to believe that when souls shipwrecked in the voyage of life are rescued from the power of Satan and set their feet on the Rock of Ages, the event is known in Heaven; for Jesus assured us that "there is joy among the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth" (Luke 15:7).

THE HAPPY ESCAPE.

ON St. Kilda, one of the smallest and most desolate of the Hebrides—a group of islands to the west of Scotland—lived a poor widow and her son. Her husband, a fisherman, had perished in a shipwreck and left her with one only child to cheer her sad heart. She trained him in the love and fear of God, and well did he repay his fond mother's care. He was her stay and support, though only sixteen years of age. The winter of 1846 will long be remembered as one of unexampled suffering by the poor, especially in Ireland and Scotland, owing to the failure of the potato crop. Ronald and his mother suffered with the rest in their wild sea-girt home. To help their scanty meal he set off one morning to collect some of the wild fowls' eggs from the neighboring cliffs. It was often a dangerous thing to attempt; for should the parent bird be there, she might dart off the nest and strike with her powerful wing the enemy of her young.

But Ronald was brave, and was nerved with the desire to obtain food for his beloved mother. Having received her blessing, and supplied himself with a strong rope by which to get down the cliff, a knife to strike the bird should she attack him, and a basket for the eggs, he set off. The view as he went was grand in the extreme. The cliffs rose perpendicularly three or four hundred feet from the sea, whose wild waves dashed madly against them, and then broke into fantastic spray, glittering like so many gems in the sunshine.

Ronald had now reached the highest point of the cliff, whence his companions were to let him down by a thick rope of many plies. It was fastened round his waist, and he was slung down until he got half way; he then gave the signal to his friends to halt opposite one of the fissures in which the birds build.

He planted his foot on a slight projection of the rock, grasped with one hand the knife to defend himself should the bird be on the nest, and with the other tried to take the eggs.

Just then the bird flew out, and with its strong wing attempted to strike him. He made a blow with his knife; but oh, horror! in place of striking the bird, he cut the cord, and having severed most of the plies, hung suspended by only a few strands.

Rescue of a Shipwrecked Crew by the Bradford Life-Boat.

He uttered one wild shriek. Below him raged the wild abyss of water! Above him rose the steep cliff! He hung suspended midway! His companions saw his danger, and gently tried to draw him up. As they drew in each coil, Ronald feels thread after thread giving way. "O God, save me!" was his agonizing prayer.

He looks below at the dark mass of waters yawning to receive him—above to the glorious heavens, whence alone he looks for help. He feels he is going. He hears the wild cry of his companions; the frantic shriek of his fond mother, as they hold her back from rushing to try to rescue her child from destruction. He becomes insensible. But just as the rope gives way, a strong hand grasps him; and at the risk of being dragged down the cliff, one of his friends saves him, and places him in his mother's arms. His prayers were heard, and God saved him.

And now, reader, will you not apply this story, and think of your life as a cord, and each year as one of the various plies of threads of which it is composed? Every year as it ends is, as it were the breaking of a ply; and when the last goes, you will be ushered into the presence of God, "to give an account of the deeds done in the body." You know not of how many or how few plies or years the cord of your life may be composed.

Oh, then, think ere the last ply gives way, of Him who is able and willing to save you, and all who come to Him, through Jesus Christ His well-beloved Son! Cling to His almighty arm, and you will be guided into that calm haven where no loud billows roar, no storms rouse the wild waves, but all is peaceful, bright, and happy, because sin, and consequently sorrow, cannot enter.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 14.)

Author and Publisher.

It was all in vain that Mr. Clifford tried to turn Felicity from her resolution to relinquish her income to her husband's creditors. Phebe cordially upheld her, and gave her courage to persist against all arguments. Both of them cared little for poverty—Phebe because she knew it, Felicity because she did not know it. Felicity had never known a time when money had to be considered; it had come to her pretty much in the same way as the air she breathed and the food she ate, without any care or prevision of her own. Phebe on the other hand knew that she could earn her own living at any time by the work of her strong young arms, and her wants were so few that they could easily be supplied.

It was decided before Phebe went home again, and decided in the face of Mr. Clifford's opposition, that a small house should be taken in London, and partly furnished from the old house at Riversborough, where Felicity would be in closer and easier communication with the publishers. Mr. Clifford laughed to himself at the idea that she could gain a maintenance by literature; as all the literary people he had ever met or heard of bewailed their poverty. But there was Madame's income of two hundred pounds a year; that formed a basis, not altogether an insecure or despicable one. It would pay more than the rent, with the rates and taxes.

The yearly income from Felicity's marriage settlement, which no representations could persuade her to touch, was to go to the gradual repayment of Roland's debts, the poorest men being paid first, and Mr. Clifford, who reluctantly consented to the scheme, to receive his last. Though Madame had never believed in her son's guilt, her just and simple soul was satisfied and set at rest by this arrangement. She had not been able to blame him; but it had been a heavy burden to her to think of others suffering loss through him. It was then almost with cheerfulness that she set herself to keep house for her daughter-in-law and her grandchildren under such widely different circumstances.

Before Christmas a house was found for them in Cheyne Walk. The Chelsea Embankment was not then thought of, and the streets leading to it, like those now lying behind it, were mean and crowded. It was a narrow house, with rooms so small that when the massive furniture from their old house was set up in it there was no space for moving about freely. Madame had known only two houses—the old straggling, picturesque country manse in the Jura, with its walnut-trees shading the windows and tossing up their branches now and then to give glimpses of snow-mountains on the horizon; and her husband's pleasant and luxurious house at Riversborough, with every comfort that could be devised gathered into it.

There was the river certainly flowing past this new habitation, and bearing on its full and rapid tide a constantly shifting panorama of boats, of which the children never tired; and from Felicity's window there was a fair reach of the river in view; while from the dormer windows of the attic above, where Felix slept, there was a still wider prospect. But in the close back room, which Madame allotted to herself and Hilda, there was only a view of back streets and slums, with sights and sounds which filled her with dismay and disgust.

But Madame made the best of the woeful change. The deep, quiet love she had given to her son she transferred to Felicity, who, she well knew, had been his idol. She believed that the sorrows of these last few months had not sprung out of the ground, but had for some reason come down from God, the God of her fathers, in whom she put her trust. Her son had been called away by him; but three were left, her daughter and her grandchildren, and she could do nothing better in life than devote herself to them.

But to Felicitia her new life was like walking barefoot on a path of thorns. Until now she had been so sheltered and guarded, kept from the wind blowing too roughly upon her, that every hour brought a sharp pin-prick to her. To have no carriage at her command, no maid to wait upon her—not even a skilful servant to discharge ordinary household duties well and quickly—to live in a little room where she felt as if she could hardly breathe, to hear every sound through the walls, to have the smell of cooking pervade the house—these, and numberless similar discomforts, made her initiation into her new sphere a series of surprises and disappointments.

But she must bestir herself if even this small amount of comfort and well-being were to be kept up. Madame's income would not maintain their household even on its present humble footing. Felicitia's first book had done well; it had been fairly reviewed by some papers, and flatteringly reviewed by other critics who had known the late Lord Riversford. On the whole it had been a good success, and her name was no longer quite unknown. Her publishers were willing to take another book as soon as it could be ready; they did more, they condescended to ask for it. But the £50 they had paid for the first, though it had seemed a sufficient sum to her when regarded from the standpoint of a woman surrounded by every luxury, and able to spend the whole of it on some trinket, looked small enough—too small—as the result of many weeks of labor, by which she and her children were to be fed. If her work was worth no more than that, she must write at least six such books in a year, and every year! Felicitia's heart sank at the thought.

There seemed to be only one resource, since one of her publishers had offered an advance of £10 only, saying they were doing very well for her and running a risk themselves. She must take her manuscript and offer it as so much merchandise from house to house, selling it to the best bidder. This was against all her instincts as an author, and if she had remained a wealthy woman she would not have borne it. She was too true and original an artist not to feel how sacred a thing earnest and truthful work like hers was. She loved it, and did it conscientiously. She would not let it go out of her hands disgraced with blunders. Her thoughts were like children to her, not to be sent out into the world ragged and uncouth, exposed to just ridicule and to shame.

Felicitia and Madame set out on their search after a liberal publisher on a gloomy day in January. For the first time in her life Felicitia found herself in an omnibus, with her feet buried in damp straw, and strange fellow-passengers crushing against her. In no part of London do the omnibuses bear comparison with the well-appointed carriages rich people are accustomed to; and this one, besides other discomforts, was crowded till there was barely room to move hand or foot.

"It is very cheap," said Madame cheerfully, after she had paid the fare when they were set down in Trafalgar Square, "and not so very inconvenient."

A fog filled the air and shrouded all the surrounding buildings in dull obscurity; while the fountains, rising and falling with an odd and ghostly movement as of gigantic living creatures, were seen dimly white in the midst of the gray gloom. The ceaseless stream of hurrying passers-by lost itself in darkness only a few paces from them. The chimes of unseen belfries and the roll of carriages visible only for a few seconds, fell upon their ears. Felicitia, in the secret excitement of her mood, felt herself in some impossible world, some phantasmagoria of a dream, which must presently disperse, and she would find herself at home again, in her quiet, dainty study at Riversborough, where most of the manuscript, which she held so closely in her hand, had been written.

But the dream was dispelled when she found herself entering the publishing house she had fixed upon as her first scene of venture. It was a quiet place, with two or three clerks busily engaged in some private conversation, too interesting to be abruptly terminated by the entrance of two ladies dressed in mourning, one of whom carried a roll of manuscript. If Felicitia had been wise the manuscript would not have been there to betray her. It made it exceedingly difficult for her to obtain admission to the publisher, in his private room beyond; and it was only when she turned away to go, with a sudden outflashing of aristocratic haughtiness, that the clerk reluctantly offered to take her card and a message to his employer.

In a few moments Felicitia was entering the dark den where the fate of her book was in the balance. Unfortunately for her, she presented too close a resemblance to the well-known type of a distressed author. Her deep mourning, the thick veil almost concealing her face, a straw clinging to the hem of her dress and telling too plainly of omnibus-riding; her somewhat sad and agitated voice; Madame's widow's cap and unpretending demeanor—all were against her chances of attention. The publisher, who had risen from his desk, did not invite them to be seated. He glanced at Felicitia's card, which bore the simple inscription, "Mrs. Sefton."

"You know my name?" she asked, faltering a little before his keen-eyed, shrewd, business-like observation. He shook his head slightly.

"I am the writer of a book called 'Haughmond Towers,'" she added, "published by Messrs. Price & Gould. It came out last May."

"I never heard of it," he answered solemnly.

Felicitia felt as if he had struck her. This was an unaccountable thing: he was a publisher, and she an author, yet he had never heard of her book. It was impossible that she had understood him; and she spoke again eagerly.

"It was noticed in all the reviews," she said, "and my publishers assured me it was quite a success. I could send you the reviews of it."

"Pray do not trouble yourself," he answered; "I do not doubt it in the least. But there are hundreds of books published every season; and it is impossible for one head, even a publisher's, to retain all the titles and the names of the authors."

"But I hope mine was not like hundreds of others," remarked Felicitia.

"Every author hopes so," he said; "and besides the mass that is printed, somehow, at someone's expense, there are hundreds of manuscripts submitted to us. Pardon me, but may I ask if you write for amusement or for remuneration?"

For my living," she replied, with a sorrowful inflection of her voice which alarmed the publisher. How often had he faced a widowed mother and her daughter, in mourning so deep as to suggest the recentness of their loss! There was a slight movement of his hand, unperceived by either of them, and a brisk rap was heard on the door behind them.

"In a moment," he said, looking over their heads. "I am afraid," he went on, "if I asked you to leave your manuscript on approbation, it might be months before our readers could look at it. We have scores, if not hundreds, waiting."

"Could you recommend any publisher to me?" asked Felicitia.

"Why not go again to Price & Gould?" he inquired.

"I must get more money than they pay me," she answered ingenuously.

The publisher shrugged his shoulders. If her manuscript had contained Milton's "Paradise Lost" or Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," such an admission would have swamped it. There is no fate swift enough for an unknown author who asks for more money than that which a publisher's sense of justice awards to him.

"I am sorry I can do nothing for you," he said, "but my time is very precious. Good-morning—No thanks, I beg. It would be a pleasure, I am sure, if I could do anything."

Felicitia's heart sank very low as she turned into the dismal street, and trod the muddy pavement. A few illusions shrivelled up that wintry morning, under that murky sky. The name she was so fearful of staining, the name she had fondly imagined as noised from mouth to mouth, the name for which she had demanded so great a sacrifice, and had sacrificed so much herself, was not known in those circles where she might most have expected to find it a passport to attention and esteem. It had travelled very little indeed beyond the narrow sphere of Riversborough.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

The Going Forth of the Three Unclean Spirits.
By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 6.)

The Going Forth of the Three Unclean Spirits—The First Spirit—Antichristian Infidelity—Spiritualism or Sorcery—How Introduced—A Fulfilment of Prophecy—The Second Spirit—Revolutionary Socialism—Historic Revolutions—The Third Spirit—Mohammedanism and Popish Superstition—The Scarlet Woman.

A COMPARISON of Rev. 13: 11-17, with 19: 20, shows the false prophet to be the name of the two-horned wild beast. The going forth of these three spirits indicates an extraordinary fresh diffusion of their evil principles.

THE FIRST SPIRIT

of Antichristian infidelity going forth from Satan appeared in a new and startling manifestation in 1847-8 in North America, in the form of so-called modern Spiritualism, which is nothing else than revived sorcery, necromancy, and demonology. It arose in the neighborhood of Rochester, N. Y., and subsequently has spread, more or less, through all the United States, and, in a less degree, in Great Britain and various parts of Europe. Its mediums are possessed by demons in much the same way, although not generally in so violent a form, as the demoniacs mentioned in the Gospels, out of whom our Lord ejected the unclean spirits.

The three spirits are expressively spoken of as being like frogs, which are much more active in the darkness of midnight than in the daytime, and so mediums generally prefer dark circles and an exclusion of light before they can obtain manifestations from the spirits. The unclean nature of these spirits is sufficiently shown by the project of the abolition of marriage and the substitution of promiscuous free love which is entertained by many spiritualists; and, in fact, the most advanced of them openly avow their desire to see the Christian religion wholly destroyed, and supplanted by Pantheism and Socialism.

The three spirits are also declared to be the miracle-working spirits of devils, or, in the original Greek, of demons, which in its most usual Greek signification, denotes the spirits of deceased wicked persons, and not the spirits of Satan's fallen angels, who are a totally different class of evil spirits. These demons are, in fact, the disembodied spirits of thousands of deceased infidels, such as Paine, Voltaire, and Hume, and deceased democratic revolutionists, such as Barère, Robespierre, Mirabeau, and the first Bonaparte, and deceased Jesuits, such as Ignatius Loyola, the Inquisitors, and Machiavel, etc., who are allowed to go to and fro among mankind at this period, and invisibly to incite and energize them to such infidelity, revolution, and superstition as shall plunge them all into the war of the great day of God Almighty, so as to bring them eventually under the leadership of the final Napoleonic Antichrist, who will be the modern incarnation of those spirits.

In regard to the true grammatical meaning of the word demons, incorrectly translated devils, in this passage in Rev. 16: 14, "They are the spirits of devils, working wonders," the learned Dr. Seiss, of Philadelphia, justly says in his "Last Times":

"Though demons are referred to about eighty times in the New Testament, and are even said to be of different kinds, they are never mentioned in a way to show that they are the fallen angels. They are never assigned a celestial origin. They are never referred to except in connection with our world. Satan is never called a demon.† It is to be regretted that in our English Bible the translators have always use the word devils instead of demons. Jahn refers to numerous authors who have maintained by a multitude of quotations from Greek, Roman, and Jewish writers, that the demons are the spirits of dead men, particularly of such as maintained bad characters while living. They live in our atmosphere, wander about our world, awaiting the final judgment, and constitute, perhaps, the most efficient agents for the accomplishment of Satan's infamous designs against the peace and good of our race."

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders." By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Book-sellers. Price, $1.

† Dr. Seiss' "Last Times" ($1.25, Smith & English, Philadelphia), is a very attractive and popularly written work on the prophecies, as is also his Parable of the Virgins and wonderful Confederation, here quoted. He holds much the same views regarding the Jews, the Tribulation, the latter-day Napoleonic Antichrist, &c., as are here set forth.

Although Spiritualism only arose in 1847-8, it has spread with almost more rapidity than any other false religion ever did. There are said to be in the United States some twenty newspapers and periodicals principally devoted to it, besides numerous other literary treatises. Many persons of eminence and high talent in various professions are its advocates, and it claims altogether one million believers, but, at a moderate computation, it has perhaps infected and contaminated a quarter or half a million persons sufficiently to make them practical unbelievers in orthodox Christian doctrines.

Spiritualism is often introduced into households by the apparently harmless proceeding of table-turning and table-rapping. Then some one in the circle often becomes developed as a medium, that is, a person under the mesmeric control of evil spirits, who from time to time enter into and take possession of the medium's body and faculties of articulation, so that at such periods the medium utters not his own thoughts or words, but those of the evil spirit possessing and controlling him.

The demon spirits speaking through the mediums profess to be departed spirits, whose bereaved relatives on earth they then make communications to. They often claim to be the deceased spirits of eminent philosophers, poets, statesmen, and theologians, and deliver lengthy communications in keeping with the character they assume. These utterances are sometimes couched in an elevated tone of piety, at other times in an infidel anti-Christian tone; but they are believed in by numbers of infatuated Spiritualists as a new Gospel superseding the old Bible.

Spiritualism is a manifest fulfilment of the prophecy in 1 Timothy 4: 1-3: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils (in Greek, teachings of demons), forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats," etc. It is markworthy that already many Spiritualists advocate the abolition of marriage and the substitution of free love or unhallowed libertinism, and some of them recommend a vegetarian diet, or even fasting, as conducive to bring the mediums more under the influence of the spirits. Spiritualism being nothing else than a revival of ancient witchcraft, necromancy, clairvoyance, and possession by familiar spirits, it is not surprising that extraordinary supernatural prodigies are often wrought by the mediums, just as by the Egyptian magicians and the Witch of Endor in olden time.

During the last few years other forms of Anti-Christian infidelity, such as Rationalism, Positivism, Neology, and Colensoism, have defiantly held erect their serpent crests and hissed forth their prophecies. Avowed scepticism, euphoniously styling itself Secularism or Freethought, has its halls, lecturers, such as C. Bradlaugh, and numerous adherents in London and every large British town, and is estimated to circulate annually in Britain twenty-eight million copies of publications, large and small, chiefly among the class of artisans and mechanics.

THE SECOND SPIRIT

of Revolutionary Socialism from the ten-horned wild beast, or political-Roman Empire, likewise went forth with clamorous croaking and fresh energy among the nations in 1848, that unparalleled epoch of political revolutions. France, after enjoying many years of quietude, as a monarchy under King Louis Philippe, suddenly broke out into revolution, proclaiming liberty, equality, and fraternity, and became a republic. Louis Philippe fled to England. A revolution also broke out in Prussia and Austria, and was apprehended even in London, so 170,000 special constables were sworn in, and the military were kept under arms, in the eventful month of April, 1848, when Feargus O'Connor headed a great Chartist procession to the House of Commons. But peace was providentially preserved in England.

In that year the Napoleon dynasty, which is the seventh headship of the seven-headed wild beast, or Roman Empire, began to revive from its "deadly wound by the sword" received at Waterloo in 1815, for Louis Napoleon, who had been an exile in England, returned to France, and was elected on June 8th, 1848, a deputy in the French National Assembly, and on December 30th President of the French Republic for three years. He dissolved the National Assembly in 1851, and on December 4th accomplished a coup d'état, and on December 24th he obtained seven million votes (partly by the help of the Catholic priests), electing him President for ten years. Then on December 2d, 1852, he was elected Emperor of France; and thus the Napoleon dynasty began to be healed of its Waterloo wound, although it has not yet regained anything like all the dominion possessed by Napoleon I.*

Alison, the historian, says of the revolutions of 1848: "Paris, as in every age, was the centre of impulsion to the whole civilized world; and disastrous beyond all precedent, or what even could have been conceived, were the effects of this new revolution in Paris on the whole continent; and a very long period must elapse before they are obviated. The spectacle of the French Government, esteemed one of the strongest in Europe, and a dynasty which promised to be of lasting duration, overturned almost without resistance by an urban tumult, roused the revolutionary party everywhere to a perfect pitch of frenzy. A universal liberation from government, and restraint of any kind, was expected, and for a time obtained, by the people in the principal Continental States, when a republic was again proclaimed in France; and the people, strong in their newly-acquired rights of universal suffrage, were seen electing a National Assembly, to whom the destinies of the country were to be intrusted. The effect was instantaneous and universal; the shock of the moral earthquake was felt in every part of Europe."

W. Beale, the author of the learned commentary "Armageddon," in three volumes, also says of those revolutions in 1848: "Thus, like the sudden eruption of some huge volcano, the demoniac miracle-working spirits simultaneously burst their various prison houses, and scattered death and misery around them. Atheism, Communism, Socialism, Red Republicanism, the elements of apparent liberty, but, in truth, the chains of darkness in which Satan binds the souls of men, as with fetters of iron, were the accursed fruits of the working of the three unclean spirits, the Satanic frogs issuing from the mouths of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet."

"The spirits of demons were the unseen instruments, and miraculous were the results of their agency, results not terminating, but leading to a still darker and more dreadful future, to that coming unparalleled time of tribulation, the future great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great, of Revelation 16: 18. Stirring up the apostate nations of the earth to bloody strife, urging them on in fiendish triumph to the overthrow of all established institutions, breaking down thrones and altars in the name of liberty, and casting titles, honors, property, into one promiscuous heap, at the feet of that incarnate Moloch of the day, 'La République démocratique et sociale,' the Red Republic of Communism, they but prepared the way for the rise of that last great Antichristian Anarch who is to emerge from it to his predicted supremacy 'over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations'—that last Roman Cæsar, who will rival in efficiency the centralized despotism of the Augustus of ancient days."

The same democratic revolutionary spirit has been actively at work ever since 1848, and has produced the long-continued rebellion in China, the Sepoy Mutiny in India in 1857, the Druse massacres in Syria, the Garibaldian uprisings in Italy in 1858, and the tremendous Civil War of 1861-4 in the United States, as well as the political convulsions in Mexico and South America. Its energetic development is especially manifest in Communism in France, Socialism in Germany, Nihilism in Russia, Fenianism in Ireland, and European Internationalism—a sort of Red Republican association of working men. The frequently recurring strikes among workmen are also often a manifestation of the same spirit.

THE THIRD SPIRIT

of Popish and Mahometan crusading propagandist fanatical superstition proceeds from the False Prophet, which, according to Revelation 13: 11-17, compared with 19: 20, is evidently a synonym for the two-horned wild beast, representing the ecclesiastical power of the Roman Empire, just as its political power is denoted by the ten-horned wild beast. These two wild beasts, in Revelation 13 are not yet completely developed, although the component parts of the corporate body of each of them already exist. The ten-horned wild beast will be a political confederacy of ten federally united kingdoms, into which the whole extent of Cæsar's Roman Empire, now existing in the form of nearly twenty separate kingdoms or states, will then be organized. The two-horned wild beast will be an ecclesiastical confederacy of the two spiritual kingdoms of the papacy and Mahometanism, which will be eventually united under one supreme pontiff, without losing their individual distinctness, just as the ten kingdoms under ten kings will preserve their distinct individuality, although federally united under one supreme emperor.

As the ten horns will be the ten political kingdoms of Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and Bulgaria, so the two horns will be the two ecclesiastical kingdoms of the papacy and Mahometanism, which, on the whole, are the prevailing religions in those countries.* The State Church of England, as well as the Greek Church in Greece, were originally incorporated with the Church of Rome, and will be so again at the final crisis of three and a half years.

The scarlet woman, in Revelation 17: 9, sitting upon the seven hills, admittedly signifies the Church of Rome, and is there depicted at the future period of her final judgment (verse 1) as "Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations (i.e., false religions) of the earth," for she will then have received into her bosom, and amalgamated with herself Mahometanism, the Greek Church, Buddhism, Spiritualism, etc. It is only thus that she can be described as seated upon "peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues," language which certainly denotes universal dominion far beyond what the Church of Rome possesses at present. She is also depicted as then sitting triumphantly as its ecclesiastical mistress upon the ten-horned wild beast, that is to say, upon the ten confederated nations which we have just enumerated, and, in the intoxication of her marvellous success, waving deliriously a cup, exclaiming, "I sit a queen" (Revelation 18: 7).

(To be continued.)

* [NOTE, added August, 1880].—When the first edition of this book, "Forty Coming Wonders," was published in 1866, the Emperor Louis Napoleon was reigning over France, and the following paragraph (which we now reprint in italics) was printed under the head of the First Wonder:

It is important to notice that, while it appears quite certain that some Napoleon must be the seventh-eighth head of the Roman Empire who is to make the seven years' covenant with the Jews, in the event of Louis Napoleon's death, some other Napoleon, standing in his place, will have to fulfil these prophecies.

The Emperor Louis Napoleon was defeated by Germany at Sedan, Sept., 1870, and died at Chislehurst, in England, in Jan., 1873. His son, Prince Louis Napoleon, who then became head of the Napoleon dynasty, was killed in the Zulu war, in July, 1879, so that now the Prince Jérôme Napoleon, who was pointed out in 1854, by the Rev. R. A. Purdon, as likely to become the final Napoleonic Antichrist, and who will not be 70 years old until 1893, has become head of the Napoleon dynasty. Strong probabilities attach to him, for he has formerly been accounted a reviled, or "vile person," and he is of fierce countenance, and an infidel and great socialist (Daniel 8: 23; 11: 21, 37; Rev. 17: 3).

* Moreover in the year-day fulfilment of Daniel, the two little horns in chapters 7 and 8 undoubtedly represent respectively the Papacy in the Western Roman Empire, and Mahometanism in the Eastern Roman Empire, and in Rev. 13 we find those two little horns combined on the two-horned wild beast. In the future literal-day fulfilment those two little horns in Daniel 7 and 8 represent the final Napoleonic Antichrist in his career respectively in the Western and Eastern Roman Empire.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British Government is Displaying Increased energy in the suppression of the Irish Land League. Eleven of the worst counties have been organized into five districts, each under the supervision of a special magistrate, who is really an inspector, with instructions to institute minute personal examinations in each district, and with power to use the police and military in urgent cases; and these magistrates are charged especially to advise the Central Executive on the best means of restoring order. It is also reported that the Government intends to ask Parliament to give them increased powers for dealing summarily with suspected persons.

A Large Meeting of Irish Landlords was held in Dublin on January 3d, at which a petition was prepared for presentation to the Queen praying that compensation might be granted to those who suffer by the operation of the Land Act. The petitioners say: "This meeting sees with alarm that the Land Act is being administered in a manner at variance with the pledge that it would not diminish the value or disturb the foundation of property, and contrary to the assurances on the faith of which Parliament was advised not to provide for compensation to landlords, and that if appeals from decisions of assistant commissioners result in the sanctioning of these decisions, the Legislature should provide compensation for those landowners whose property will be thereby unjustly diminished." That the administration will not favor such a project may be inferred from a speech delivered the following day by Mr. Chamberlain, who is a member of the Cabinet. Mr. Chamberlain ridiculed the landlords' demand for compensation. He said he thought the tenants, rather, ought to be compensated for the excessive rents extracted from them for many years.

An Attempt to Introduce a Reform of Procedure will, it is reported, be made by Mr. Gladstone early in the ensuing session of the British Parliament. The scandals of last session brought the House of Commons into disrepute, and it is expected that the administration will propose that a bare majority shall have power to close a debate and proceed to a vote whenever it is manifest that wilful obstruction is being pressed. It is hinted that such a proposal will be met with determined opposition by the Conservatives, who, as the House of Commons is now constituted, are in the minority. It is also reported that Mr. Gladstone will introduce a measure giving the franchise to every householder in the country. At present a householder who lives outside the limits of a borough cannot vote in the election of a member of parliament unless he pays an annual rental of about eighty dollars a year.

Some Sensation has been Produced in Political circles in Great Britain by an announcement made by the Earl of Derby, in a speech delivered on January 4th. Lord Derby's father was several times prime minister of a Conservative cabinet, and was until his death the leader of the Conservatives of the country, and the present earl has occupied a prominent position in the Conservative ministry under Lord Beaconsfield. In his speech on Wednesday he declared himself a thorough Liberal, and it is supposed will in future take his seat in the House of Lords on the ministerial side. The change is important, because in the House of Lords Mr. Gladstone's supporters are in a minority.

The Prospects of Trade in Great Britain for the present year are pronounced hopeful by financial authorities. The London Times says: "The past year has been marked by a quiet but steady improvement in trade. After the first quarter of the year railway traffic returns began to show an increase, which has continued ever since, the improvement in the second half of the year being at the rate of from three to four per cent. Other trade statistics are equally satisfactory. The enormous production of iron in 1880 has been exceeded in 1881. The home consumption also has been on a much larger scale, and is largely on account of shipbuilding. On the Clyde alone 100,000 more tons of shipping have been built than in the most active previous year. The prosperity of other trades is shown by the increase, up to the end of November, in the aggregate of the value of exports of British produce and manufactures by from three to four per cent. Pauperism is again diminishing and the revenue from deposits in savings banks increasing."

In the Affairs of Egypt, England and France are again acting in concert. A newspaper correspondent at Cairo telegraphs that "France and England have agreed to send to the Khédive of Egypt an identical note announcing that in the event of peace being disturbed, or his authority overturned, they are prepared effectively to support him, restore order and protect his authority by material co-operation. France and England, previous to sending the note, of course agreed on the mode of procedure and the respective share of each government therein."

The Situation of the Pope of Rome is likely to become a matter of international diplomacy. A Paris journal says: "Prince Bismarck has sent a courteous but very explicit note to the Italian Government in which he states that, in his opinion, the pope's independence cannot be regarded as a question for Italian home politics, but should be held as an international question. The note declares an intention on the part of Prince Bismarck to promote a meeting of a Congress of the Powers for the purpose of making the guarantees of the independence of the pope stronger and more effectual than they are at present." The telegram adds: "Russia, Austria, Germany, England, and Spain favor the holding of a Congress. All arrangements are complete for the departure of the pope for Malta, in case he deems it impossible for him to remain in Rome." The Cardinal Archbishop of Rouen, who recently returned from Rome, has published a letter describing the position of the pope, in which he makes a proposal remarkable for its effrontery. He urges the Italians to choose another capital and leave Rome to the pope, in order to avert the necessity of his departure from that city. It is by no means clear that the departure of the pope would be regarded by the Italians as a misfortune.

The Ultimate Policy of France with Regard to Tunis is still a matter of doubt. The Constantinople correspondent of the London Times says: "Intelligence has been received from Paris that M. Gambetta intends to follow the example of England's Transvaal policy by granting to Tunis a large measure of autonomy, but will make her pay a war indemnity." A despatch to the Times from Susa says: "The intention of the French to permanently occupy this city becomes more and more apparent. They have already expended $25,000 in restoring the citadel."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Completed the fourth week's work in Edinburgh December 17th amid evidences of deepening blessing. In the estimation of ministers in the city, the revival at the present time is more advanced than it was four weeks after the opening of their meetings in 1873. Hundreds of persons have been unable to gain admission to some of the meetings, and the sympathy and co-operation of the churches are most cordial and constant. Lords of session, learned counsellors, distinguished physicians, the representatives of literature, science, and art in the universities and colleges, men and women of rank, title and wealth, attend the meetings and take part in the services. Apart from the evangelistic addresses in the Assembly Hall, which are invariably crowded, the noon prayer-meetings excite considerable interest, and furnish a good barometrical test of the progress of the work in which the evangelists are engaged. The Saturday Singing and Scripture Service for Children is also attended with signal success.

Mr. George Muller in Egypt.—A Correspondent of an English journal, writing from Port Said, at Cairo, says: "We have had the joyful privilege of hearing the venerable evangelist, Mr. George Müller. In seeking to preach the Gospel to every creature, he has taken in this ancient land of Egypt; he has held services in English and German in Cairo and Alexandria. We arranged two meetings. One was in English, and was well attended. Mr. Müller spoke on Isa. 53: 5, 6. An interesting part of his audience was sixteen men part of those saved who were on board the Dutch steamer König der Nederlanden, lost in the Indian Ocean. The meeting for preaching in German was perhaps even of greater interest. Nearly fifty attended. Besides several German residents, there were the shipwrecked men who understood the language. In cordial response to our invitation there were also with us about twenty of the Bohemian young women with their conductors, who are engaged as musicians in the casinos. All of them listened most attentively to the preacher's earnest stirring words about the way of forgiveness. At the close of his address, Mr. Müller spoke of the preciousness of the Word of God, and intimated that copies of it would be given at all the meetings. We then had the joy of putting into the hands of the girls, of the shipwrecked men, and a few others, sixteen Bibles and twenty-three Testaments."

Mr. Francis Murphy has Received a most enthusiastic welcome in Scotland, and has conducted a most successful series of Blue Ribbon Gospel Temperance meetings in the Reid Hall, Forfar. At the close of the first week nearly 1500 had signed the pledge, who had never done so before, and in addition to these almost an equal number donned the "ribbon of blue," as indication of their hearty sympathy with the movement. The majority of the ministers in the town and neighborhood are working most vigorously to advance the interests of the mission.

"Coming Wars," by the Rev. M. Baxter. Two Pamphlets; price five cents each by mail. First Pamphlet contains "Ten Signs of the End, and Description of Approaching Events;" with two maps of the territory to be under Antichrist's rule and four large diagrams. Second Pamphlet contains valuable quotations from twenty-six Expositors on the same subject. Address, with price inclosed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

By THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1882.

16th Year. No. 3.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:
PORTRAITS OF MR. AND MRS. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS—History of their Missionary Institute.
INGERSOLL ANSWERED. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday morning.
LYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story (Continued).
 The Pharisees Answered. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. Baxter.
DEATH OF MR. ADAM McCALL. By Mrs. Guinness.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter.
CURRENT EVENTS: Finance in the Senate—An Awful Railroad Accident—Gov. Cornell on Intemperance—The Assassin's Trial—A Brave Engineer Rewarded—A Drunken Man's Ingratitude—A Delicate Surgical Operation—A Tarantula's Bite, etc.
PICTURES ILLUSTRATING STORIES: An Appeal in a Cemetery—The Last Night of the Concerts.

CHASTENED HAPPINESS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
PICTURE OF THE EXTERIOR OF THE RING THEATRE IN VIENNA.
COBWEBS AND CABLES. By Hesba Stretton (Contd).
FOREIGN TOPICS: A Gloomy Prospect in Ireland—Political Crisis in France—The German Emperor's Rescript—A Mysterious Pyramid Opened, etc.

REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS.

MRS. H. G. GUINNESS.

MR. GUINNESS' EAST LONDON TRAINING INSTITUTE FOR HOME AND FOREIGN MISSIONARIES.

MR. AND MRS. GRATTAN GUINNESS.

Foreign Work of Mr. Guinness—His Bible Cart in France—His Work on the Approaching End of the Age—Missionary Institute—The Directors—First Students—Aim Pursued in the Studies—Evangelistic Work—Finances—Removal to Harley House, in September, 1874—Hulme Cliff College Offered and Accepted—The Work Accomplished.

THE Rev. Grattan and Mrs. Guinness, whose portraits appear on our front page this week, have gained a world-wide reputation for their concentrated enterprise and untiring zeal in the service of Christ. Mr. Guinness is a man who puts his work forward rather than himself; so it happens that very little is known of him otherwise than as a public man, except the fact that he is a cousin of Sir Arthur Guinness, the well-known Dublin brewer. He became first known to the Christian public about twenty-five years ago, at the time of the first appearance of Mr. Spurgeon in London. He preached to great crowds in London, and in the North of Ireland. Afterwards, in 1859, he made an evangelistic tour in Canada and the United States, and attracted large audiences. He also turned to profitable account a tour of study and observation which he made in Egypt, Syria, and Turkey.

To Mr. Guinness the honor belongs of being one of the first to overcome the difficulty of proclaiming the Gospel in the chief cities of France, when, under the Empire, the sale of Bibles at bookstalls and open-air preaching were both forbidden. With characteristic ingenuity and energy he procured a cart and horse, and travelled the streets with a stock of Bibles for sale. Large crowds were attracted by that novel way of doing business, and as the Bibles were accompanied with a few words of earnest exhortation, the way of salvation was communicated to multitudes who were shut out from it by the laws of the country. Subsequently he made Bath, in England, his headquarters, where Mrs. Guinness wrote a most interesting biography of Mrs. Henry Denning (Miss Geraldine Hooper), the well-known and successful lady preacher.

Mr. Guinness has prepared an enduring monument to his name in his great book, "The Approaching End of the Age," which in four years has passed through two editions in England and has been published in this country. It is one of the most elaborate works on the subject of prophetic Scripture that have ever been written, and has attracted a larger measure of attention than an uninterested public usually accords to that vast and important branch of Bible knowledge. The author shows in that book an exceptional power of taking a comprehensive view of a subject as well as an exact view, and deals exhaustively with facts and figures, the least fascinating of all descriptions of literary work. Page after page commands the reader's admiration for the clear head and unwearying industry that have produced the book, which, moreover, was written during no period of leisure, but when Mr. Guinness was daily occupied with the trying and varied responsibilities of his Missionary Institute, a woodcut of which forms part of the frontispiece in this paper.

Mr. Guinness received efficient help in the preparation of "The Approaching End of the Age," from his accomplished and faithful wife, to whom he bears this tribute in the preface: "There remains to the author the grateful task of acknowledging the very considerable help he has had in writing and revising this volume from the practised pen of his beloved wife, for many years the sharer of his toils in various efforts to spread in different lands the knowledge of saving or of sanctifying truth. The part which, in spite of much wearying labor by day, and often by night, as Honorary Secretary of the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions, she has cheerfully taken in the task of preparing this work, however others may regard the result, will endear it to him while memory endures."

Mention has been made in the preceding paragraphs of

THE MISSIONARY INSTITUTE.

This College has a history replete with interest, whether regard be had to its inception, its mode of work, or its grand success. Its origin took place in February, 1873, at No. 29, Stepney Green, London, England, and its originators and first Directors were Mr. H. Grattan Guinness and Dr. Barnardo, who prayerfully conferred upon the subject, and in their energetic hands the scheme soon assumed a practical shape. But, the question may be asked, "What made these two brethren think of training and helping forth missionaries?" In the first place it may be answered, that they both originally themselves contemplated becoming missionaries; Mr. Guinness intended to join the mission begun by Captain Gardiner in Terra del Fuego, and Dr. Barnardo had dedicated himself as a medical missionary to China.

MAN PROPOSES, BUT GOD DISPOSES.

The Lord had other work in store for His servants, and by His Providence unmistakably indicated to each that he was to take a different path. Both were to be missionaries, they had not mistaken their vocation, but both were to be Home missionaries; one itinerant, the other local. Dr. Barnardo founded, and has for many years conducted, the important East-End Juvenile Mission and Homes, which now contain more than one thousand boys and girls, at a cost of $2500 a week.

Mr. Guinness and Dr. Barnardo's experience of mission work, and their interest in the foreign field not having in anywise cooled by the fact that they were personally unable to labor in it, the desire very naturally arose in their hearts, to help in the same direction younger and freer men, who might do what they themselves had longed and intended to do—preach Christ among the heathen.

Mr. Guinness's frequent evangelistic tours brought him in contact with many such young men, and Dr. Barnardo's varied missionary operations in Stepney seemed to afford a most suitable sphere for a Training Home. Believing the thought to be of God, they resolved, after prayerful consideration, to do what they could. The Home was opened in 1873, and, at once, applications were made by one hundred young men who wished to consecrate themselves to the service of Christ among the heathen; and, after the most careful selection had been exercised, thirty-two were received, and entered on a suitable course of training. They were from different denominations.

MRS. GUINNESS

was installed in the post of honorary secretary, which she has filled since the origin of the Missionary Institute, and has endeared herself to all who love the Master, by her lofty conscientiousness, noble self-abnegation for the good of others, and untiring industry in furthering the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom. She is a very able speaker and writer.

THE AIM IN THE STUDIES,

to which, from the very first, the attention of the young men has been directed, is rather to ground them well in general knowledge than to perfect them in any one branch. It is felt that a missionary should know something of everything, geography, astronomy, navigation, botany, medicine, physiology and surgery, and should also be enough of a practical mechanic to know how to supplement physical power by the use of the mechanical forces. He may, if he be a pioneer missionary, have to build his house, to make his furniture, to till his garden, to cook his food, to make his clothes and mend them, as well as to work the printing press, etc.

But, above all it is with the truth of the Word of God that a missionary's mind should be thoroughly furnished, and in the Biblical studies pursued at Mr. Guinness's Institute, a special effort is made to teach the students to understand the Bible as a whole, and its doctrines in their variety and harmony; equipping the young men at the same time to silence the foolish objections of adversaries and to answer the questions of sincere inquirers as to the grounds on which it is concluded that the Bible is authentic and divine.

The measure of culture which the students receive varies in each individual case, according to his abilities, previous training, and the length of the period he can devote to study. As to the last point, Mr. Guinness does not require any particular time, but looks for special guidance from God as regards each of His servants. They are mostly young men without means, and therefore maintained and educated gratuitously.

EVANGELISTIC WORK

occupies much of the time of the students, and this is found to be attended with many solid advantages. It tests and develops their fitness for missionary labors, and benefits the ignorant and ungodly in whose midst they reside. They, therefore, visit from house to house, teach the young in Sunday and week-night schools, engage in open-air preaching, and hold frequent meetings in halls and chapels both in and around London. In their visiting they have been brought into contact with multitudes of the wretched and depraved of various classes, with street vendors, beggars, tramps, outcasts; with infidels, Romanists, Jews; with French, Germans, Hindoos, and Asiatics of all races; and have gained access to low lodging-houses and to more respectable dwellings in the miles of narrow, ill-ventilated streets which stretch around London in every direction. In this way they have engaged in conversation on the things of God, with people plunged in ignorance and vice, and pointed them with the happiest results, to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world.

THE FINANCES.

This great work was begun without any funds in hand, or any promises of support, but with the conviction that if it were of God, and for His glory, He would send the needful funds. And God has been the Helper of the Institute, and inclined the hearts of His stewards to aid generously with their substance. Yet the faith of God's servants has often been exercised, and the cash-box often empty. On one occasion, after the payment of some heavy expenses, nothing was left in hand; and prayer for daily bread for the large household went up more earnestly than usual, for not only had the current outlay to be met, but some needful additions in prospect required at least $500. This was in the first year of the Institute's existence. One of the two directors had to leave London for a week's special services in a distant city; he carried the burden with him, and laid it daily before the Lord. Going down one evening to the hall where he was to preach, a telegram from his colleague awaited him. "Good news! I have received $1000 for the Institute; praise the Lord!" He did praise Him; and preached His faithfulness all the more fervently from this fresh illustration of it.

HARLEY HOUSE, EAST LONDON, was taken for the work of the second year, the house at Stepney Green having been altogether outgrown by the necessities and demands which had arisen. The extension of Dr. Barnardo's work rendered it impossible for him to continue his practical co-operation, and so he withdrew from his position of Director. Mr. Guinness was now the sole and only responsible Director, and Mrs. Guinness the Honorary Secretary of the Institute. The increasing applications from Christian young men for admission as students, the retirement of Dr. Barnardo, and the necessity for Mr. and Mrs. Guinness residing on the spot, resulted in Harley House, being taken on September 29th, 1874, and in these and adjacent premises which have since been erected on the ground behind, consisting of class rooms, lecture halls, and dormitories (as shown in frontispiece), the training of men for mission work has ever since gone on with unabated zeal and ever widening success.

In the year 1875, by what seemed to Mr. and Mrs. Guinness a succession of remarkable providences some valuable premises in Derbyshire were offered to them, in order that they might establish there a branch of the Training Institute. There was a residence, accommodation for twenty or thirty men, and twenty-one acres of good arable land, situated in one of the most beautiful and healthful parts of England. The whole was offered free for ten years, with prospect of permanence, if a good work were established there.

Prayerful consideration was followed by another enlargement of their borders; and, in dependence

God, Mr. and Mr. Guinness resolved to endeavor to carry out the desire of the Christians who had consecrated the place to the service of missionary work at home and abroad, and in grateful remembrance of whom it is the name of which, after some months of preparation, was opened in March, 1876, as a country branch of the Training Institute, with a resident Principal, and enrolling twenty and thirty students.

HULME CLIFF COLLEGE,

As the work goes on, with the evident approval and manifest blessing of the Master, among the youngest of the Institutes for training young men for the work of the Christian Ministry, it is one of the most serviceable and successful. It has been in existence only a little more than eight years, but during that time more than thousand candidates have applied for admission, about two hundred and fifty have been received, and of these about one hundred are at the present time laboring in the Gospel, either in the home or the foreign field, while between seventy and eighty are still studying in the Institute, qualified for future usefulness. The portraits and names of three of these students, Messrs. Adam McCall, Clark, and Harvey, the first of whom has been called to his reward, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 9th, 1880.

These students have been of various nationalities; not only English, Scotch, Irish, and American, but French, German, Italian, Spanish, Swedish, Polish, Russian, Bulgarian, Syrian, Egyptian, Chinese, Negro, Hindoo, Parsee, Koordish, and others, and are laboring with truly Apostolic zeal in different countries of Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australasia.

DEATH OF ADAM MCCALL,

Minister of the Livingstone Inland Mission on the Congo.

A BRIEF notice of the death of Mr. Adam McCall, whose portrait and life we published on September 9th, 1880, has already appeared in these columns. The following details of the sad event, written by the pen of Mrs. Grattan Guinness, have just come to hand. Mr. McCall engaged in his mission in South Africa under the auspices of the Livingstone Inland Mission, over which Mr. Grattan Guinness presides.

The East London Missionary Institute is just plunged into deep sorrow and trial by the sudden loss of a valued member, the intelligence just received, that it pleased God to call home thus early the able and devoted young leader of the Congo Mission, the beloved young brother, ADAM MCCALL.

It had been aware for some months past that Mr. McCall's health had been failing, and that the doctor on the last had ordered him home, but he felt that at such a juncture he could not leave the work, and did not himself think an immediate return so useful for him. As for Mr. and Mrs. Craven, he had been home last summer, and it was not until they had left that he found it needful to seek medical advice for himself.

On September he was so ill that he went to Llanelli to consult Dr. Lucan, and we were anxiously awaiting the opinion of this gentleman, when he received a telegram from Madeira from Mr. McCall, "detained by severe illness, will write." In the middle of the following night we were aroused from sleep by a second and terrible message: "Pneumonic abscess broken, peritonitis imminent." Receipt of this fatal news, Mrs. McCall, of Llanelli, the recently widowed mother of our friend, and only brother, Mr. John McCall, started to the Donald Currie steamer, "Garth Castle," at Llanelli.

On board this vessel they telegraphed to Llanelli on the eve of starting. "Another message. He cannot live more than a few hours more on." The fact was that he was even then on his way for Friday evening brought us a fourth telegram, the last of this sad series, "Adam McCall died this morning."

We are stunned by this blow, so sudden, so unexpected! Mr. and Mrs. Craven, who are now here, and who left him so lately, our dear students, some of whom were hoping to work under his guidance, his affianced wife, who is also with us preparing for mission work, and we ourselves, who had counted so much on his help in this difficult mission, are all filled with grief and surprise, and find it hard to understand this most unexpected providence. We bow to the will of God, and know that all is well, for He is "too wise to err, too good to be unkind." We are dumb, for He has done it, but we are sorely pained and astonished!

It is not to the usual African fever that he has succumbed, but, as the result proves, to a complaint the seeds of which were planted during his previous wanderings in South Africa, where he was once or twice laid aside by severe inflammation of the liver. The illness which laid him up at Baza Mantinga last year was of a similar character, and from it we now fear he never perfectly recovered. He has made allusion in almost every letter since to disorder of the liver and general sense of ill-health, but has borne up bravely, and in his last letter expressed the hope that he should be "able to hold out" till his task was accomplished, but the malaria of the Lower Congo acting on a system already predisposed to this dangerous malady has developed thus rapidly its most fatal form, and cut short a fourth young life, full of promise and of power.

To the names of Telford, Peterson, and McKergon we have now to add, with aching hearts and tearful eyes, that of Adam McCall. Four lives in four years laid down for the sake of Christ and Africa! Almost each station we have been permitted to plant has cost a life. Tedford died in founding Palaballa, Peterson in building Banza Mantinga, McKergon in erecting Maladdi, and now Mr. McCall in establishing Manzanga and Banana!

If the Master had not said, "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature!" one would be tempted to think the cost too great! But He did not hesitate to redeem a lost world, because the doing so involved the sacrifice of Himself.

Mr. McCall had been exceedingly busy all the summer, superintending the erection and arrangement of the last new station of the mission at Banana, sending stores up the country for the stations in the interior, and a hundred loads of goods to supply, for twelve months, the pioneer party which he had hoped to have been now leading on to Stanley Pool.

A PROVIDENTIAL DELAY.

He had been much tried by the non-arrival of the Kroomen carriers needed for the expedition. He and we wondered at the time why the Lord permitted this insuperable hindrance to progress to arise. In previous years we had had no difficulty in getting Kroomen carriers, but this year all our three parties of outward bound missionaries failed to secure a gang, so that while he was permitted to make every preparation for the onward move, Mr. McCall was prevented from actually starting on the journey into the interior. We are glad of this now, for had he done so his death must have occurred under more trying circumstances than the present. At Madeira he has at any rate had the benefit of first-rate medical skill, with every comfort.

He was, however, much tried at the time by this detention, for though he had abundant work at the lower stations of the mission, his longing and consuming desire was to get into the interior, and plant a station on the Upper Congo.

In his last letter he wrote, "I am half beside myself with the vehemence of my desire to do and dare for the cause of our Lord and Master in the great Congo Valley," yet when afresh disappointed of carriers, he did not murmur, but wrote, "No, Kroo boys again! It is trying! but I am resigned to the Master's will. I am His. If He sees fit to keep me here yet longer, I willingly obey. There is plenty to do—plenty that no one can do equally well." "Our God and Father will enable me to carry out such plans as He in His unbounded wisdom sees to be best. He knows, we do not know! Our part is to trust; His to bless, help, and guide those who do implicitly trust Him. Our part is to wait patiently; His to do for us above all we ask or think! Our part is to lay ourselves soul and body on his altar; His to accept the sacrifice!" for the mission, thus suddenly deprived of its able and enterprising head.

WE ENTREAT PRAYER

Our party on the Congo are now reduced to fifteen, of whom nine have only arrived there this year. They will more than ever need the help and guidance of God, and His protecting and sustaining care.

THE LAST NIGHT OF THE CONCERTS.

(See Illustration on page 44.)

"WE must go to-night, my dear, or we shall never have the opportunity." This remark was made by a lady to her husband, as I was passing them in the street. It evidently had reference to a musical entertainment which had throughout the day been advertised by placards, with the importunate and monitory intimation that this was positively the "LAST NIGHT;" these two words being printed in large and very black capital letters. The tone in which the remark was made indicated that it was the expression of a resolve as well as request. The lady's supplicatory and imperative position was maintained, and the gentleman, a member of our church, was, by the joint force of the two appeals—the "last night," and "we must go, my dear"—swayed from the prayer-meeting to the concert.

The staring capitals led my mind to thoughts and recollections quite remote from the entertainment which the bill announced. They seemed to me a condensed and startling appeal to every mortal; a solemn admonition, bringing to mind the brevity of life and the certainty of death.

"The last night!" To hundreds this will be literally and "positively the last night" of their earthly existence. The sun that rose this morning has passed the meridian. It will soon sink in the west, and darkness will pervade the hemisphere.

Mrs. — was a young woman of amiable disposition. Her family were nominally connected with a Christian congregation, and with them she attended on the public worship of God. She became a mother, and for a few days rejoiced in the consciousness of danger passed, and of a new and tender affection implanted in her heart. But symptoms alarming to her medical attendant appeared. He expressed his fears to husband and parents, but they waived the intimation, and strove to rally her drooping frame.

But their perplexity and distress did not escape her notice. Like a flash of lightning, the conviction burst upon her mind that she was going to die. For a moment it paralyzed every power, and then her pale cheek grew flushed and her languid eye sparkling, and her voice, that had spoken in soft whispers, became strong. Her speech, too, was at times loud and resolute in expressions of determination not to die; and at times plaintive and touching in appeals to her loved ones to save her from approaching death. But it was her last night. What shrieks, what tears, what prayers there were during those hours in that chamber of anguish, need not be recounted. In the morning all was still; the voice was hushed; the fair round cheek was cold and rigid. She was dead.

I knew a young man who, though not more than nineteen years of age, had long been a cheerful and efficient helper to his widowed mother. He fell into a declining condition of health. Hopes and fears had their usual alternations in the minds of his friends. He himself was convinced that death was approaching. It was not a painful conviction, except on account of his mother and sisters, for his soul was stayed on Christ. Calling to see him on a Sabbath evening, he extended his hand, and in a solemn manner, said, "Dear sir, I am near my journey's end; this is my last night." So it proved. Before morning he fell asleep in Jesus, full of trust, full of hope, full of peace and joy. It was his LAST NIGHT; but a day was at hand for him, brighter than suns can make—a day of heavenly glory.

Reader, if this should be your last day, or night, on earth, where would your to-morrow be?

ght of the sun from falling on the earth until Thursday morning." Beside that, he would "Mr. Ingersoll, don't you know that David Ster and Herschel the astronomer, and all the men of their class, agree in the fact that the sun is not light, that it is an opaque mass, that it is like the candlestick that holds the light, a phosphorescent atmosphere floating around it, changing and changing, so it is not to be at all wondered at not until that Thursday morning its light is in the earth?"

He had would have gone on and told Mr. Ingersoll that by observation it has been found there are burned out volcanoes in other worlds, when they were in explosion and activity, they have cast forth an insufferable light, throwing glare all over our earth. And the boy would ask him also if he had ever heard of the Aurora Borealis or the Aurora Australis.

Mr. Ingersoll has only to go to one of our high schools to learn there are ten thousand sources of light besides the light of the sun. But if he had been in one of the classes in our high schools, as a student in astronomy, or geology, or chemistry, the patient teacher would have said to him: "Rob, go down to the foot and be in disgrace—be in disgrace for your stupidity!" This is not wilful misrepresentation in this case on the part of Mr. Ingersoll. He does not know any better. It is the profound and most disgusting ignorance exhibited on a lecturer's platform in America, when he says there cannot be any light, or implies there cannot be any light, except that which comes from the sun.

In the first case which I showed you it was wilful misrepresentation. In this case it is ignorance, logical, and astronomical, and chemical. But either wilful or ignorant misrepresentation, either both will impeach Robert G. Ingersoll as incompetent to give testimony in this case between Infidelity and Christianity.

II. I take a step further in impeaching this speech against Christianity. He sharpens all his criticisms to destroy our belief in Noah's Ark. He says that from the account there, it must have rained eight hundred feet of water each day in order that it might be fifteen miles above the hills. He says that the ark could have been large enough to contain "two of every sort," for there would have been hundreds of thousands and hundreds of thousands of creatures! He says that these creatures would have come from all lands and all zones! He says there is only one small window in the ark and that it could not have given fresh air to keep the animals inside the ark from suffocation! Then he winds up that part of the story by saying that the ark actually landed on a mountain seventeen thousand feet high.

THE ANCIENT DELUGE

He says he does not believe the story. Neither I! There is no such story in the Bible. I will tell you what the Bible story is. I must say that I have changed my mind in regard to some matters which once were to me very mysterious. They are no more mysterious. This is the key to the Bible. This is the story of an eye-witness, Noah, the story incorporated afterward by Moses in the Pentateuch. Noah described the scene just as it appeared to him. He saw the flood and he fathomed its depth. As far as eye could reach everything was covered up, from horizon to horizon, or as it is, "under the whole heaven."

He did not refer to the Sierra Nevadas, or to Mount Washington, for America had not been discovered, or, if it had been discovered, he could not have seen so far off. He is giving the testimony of an eye-witness. God speaks after the manner of men when He says everything went under, and Noah speaks after the manner of men when he says everything did go under. An eye-witness. There is no need of thinking that the kangaroo leaped the ocean, or that the polar bear came down from the ice.

Why did the deluge come? It came for the purpose of destroying the outrageous inhabitants of the then thinly populated earth, nearly all the population probably very near the ark before it was launched. What would have been the use of submerging North and South America, or Europe, or Africa when they were not inhabited?

Mr. Ingersoll most grossly misrepresents when he says that in order to have that depth of water it must have rained eight hundred feet every day. The Bible distinctly declares that the most of the flood rose instead of falling. Before the account where it says "the windows of Heaven were opened," it says, "all the fountains of the great deep were broken up." All geologists agree in saying that there are caverns in the earth filled with water, and they rushed forth, and all the lakes and rivers forsook their bed.

What am I to think, and what are you to think, of a man who, ignoring this earthquake spoken of in the Bible as preceding the falling of the rain, and for the purpose of making a laugh at the Bible, will say it must have rained over eight hundred feet every day? Taking the last half instead of the first half. The fountains of the great deep were broken up, and then the windows of Heaven were opened.

Well, then, another thing, in regard to

THE SIZE OF THE ARK.

Instead of being a mud-scow, as some of these infidels would have us understand, it was a magnificent ship, nearly as large as our Great Eastern, three times the size of an ordinary man-of-war.

Well, Noah saw the animal creation going into this ark. He gave the account of an eye-witness. They were the animals from the region where he lived. There were a great number of them, and he gives the account of an eye-witness. They went in two and two of all flesh.

Two or three years ago I was on a steamer on the river Tay, and I came to Perth, Scotland. I got off and I saw the most wonderful agricultural show that I had ever witnessed. There were horses and cattle such as Rosa Bonheur never sketched, and there were dogs such as the loving pencil of Edwin Landseer never portrayed, and there were sheep and fowl and creatures of all sorts. Suppose that "two and two" of all the creatures of that agricultural show were put upon the Tay steamer to be transported to Dundee, and the next day I should be writing home to America and giving an account of the occurrence, I would have used the same general phraseology that Noah used in regard to the embarkation of the brute creation in the ark—I would have said that they went in two and two of every sort. I would not have meant six hundred thousand. A common-sense man myself, I would suppose that the people who read the letter were common-sense people.

"But how could you get them into the ark?" says Mr. Ingersoll with a great sneer. "How could they be induced to go into the ark? He would have to pick them out and drive them in, and coax them in." Could not the same God who gave instinct to the animal inspire that instinct to seek for shelter from the storm. However, nothing more than ordinary animal instinct was necessary. Have you never been in the country when an August thunder-storm was coming up and heard the cattle moan at the bars to get in? and seen the affrighted fowl go upon the perch at noonday, and heard the affrighted dog and cat calling at the door, supplicating entrance? And are you surprised that in that age of the world, when there were fewer places of shelter for dumb beasts, at the muttering and rumbling and flashing and quaking and darkening of an approaching deluge, the animal creation came moaning and bleating to the sloping embankment reaching up to the ancient Great Eastern, and passed in? I have owned horses and cattle and sheep and dogs, but I never had a horse, or a cow, or a sheep, or a dog that was so stupid it did not know enough to come in when it rained!

Yet Mr. Ingersoll cannot understand how they could get in. It is amazing to him. And then, that one window in the ark which afforded such poor ventilation to the creatures there assembled—that small window in the ark which excites so much mirthfulness on the part of the great infidel. If he had known as much Hebrew as you could put on your little finger nail, he would have known that that word translated window there means window course, a whole range of lights. This ignorant infidel does not know a window pane from twenty windows. So, if there is any criticism of the ark, there seems to be too much window for such a long storm. This infidel says that during the long storm the window must have been kept shut and hence no air. There are people in this house to-day who, all the way from Liverpool to Barnegat lighthouse, and for two weeks, were kept under deck, the hatches battened down because of the storm. Some of you, in the old-time sailing vessels, were kept nearly a month with the hatches down because of some long storm.

For the tenth or the fifteenth misrepresentation by Mr. Ingersoll, he says that on a mountain seventeen thousand feet high, and that, of course, as soon as the animals came forth they would all be frozen in the ice! Here comes in Mr. Ingersoll's geographical ignorance. He does not seem to know that Ararat is not merely the name for a mountain, but for a hilly district, and that it may have been a hill twenty feet high, or a hundred feet, or two hundred feet high on which the ark alighted. But in order to raise a laugh against the Holy Scriptures, Mr. Ingersoll lifts the ark seventeen thousand feet high, showing an ignorance of just that altitude!

THE ARK LANDED

The flood that Ingersoll describes is not Noah's flood; it is Ingersoll's flood of hatred against God. It is not Noah's ark that Ingersoll describes; it is Ingersoll's ark with a whole flock of hooting owls of the midnight of Infidelity, whole nests of viperine and adderine venom against God, whole lairs of panthers which with spotted claw, if they could, would maul the eternal God to pieces. And there is only one small window in that ark and it opens into the blackness of darkness described by my text, "having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them."

We are not dependent on the Bible for the story of the flood, entirely. All ages and all literatures have traditions, indistinct traditions, but still traditions. The traditions of the Chaldeans say that in the time when Xisuthrus was king there was a great flood, and he put his family and his friends in a large vessel and all outside of them were destroyed, and after a while the birds went forth and they came back and their wings were tinged with mud. Lucian and Ovid, celebrated writers, who had never seen the Bible, described a flood in the time of Deucalion. He took his friends into a boat, and the animals came running to him in pairs. And so, all lands, and all ages, and all literatures, seem to have a broken and indistinct tradition of a calamity which Moses, here incorporating Noah's account, so grandly, so beautifully, so accurately, so solemnly records.

BROKEN TRADITIONS,

But I must halt in this argument, as in a great trial sometimes an attorney will stop for lack of time to finish, and I must on other Sabbath mornings take up this subject. I have only opened the door of a subject it will take me other Sabbath mornings to explore. I have impeached Robert G. Ingersoll for having misrepresented once, twice, thrice. I demand that you put into execution the principle of every court-room, gentlemen of the jury, and throw overboard his entire testimony. "False in part, false in all."

I have this morning only discussed the cleanest part of Mr. Ingersoll's infidelity—the best part of Mr. Ingersoll's infidelity. There are depths below depths, and I shall go on and say all I have to say on this subject.

My prayer is that the God who created the world, not out of nothing, but out of His own omnipotence, may create us anew in Christ Jesus; and that the God who made light three days before the sun shone, may kindle in our souls a light that will burn on long after the sun has expired; and that the God who ordered the ark built and kept open more than one hundred years that the antediluvians might enter it for shelter, may graciously incline us to accept the invitation which this morning rolls in music from the throne, saying: "Come thou and all thy house into the ark."

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 23.)

Sylph Rescued from the Denzilles—Her Champion Shot by Mr. Denzille—Sylph Offers to Dress the Wound—Mutual Recognition—Captain Vaughan's Adventures—The Fate of a Welsh Regiment in Ireland—A Declaration of Love—A Duplicate Ring—A Clue to Sylph's History.

JUST as Ned Denzille had lifted the unconscious Sylph upon his saddle, and started his horse at full speed, two other horsemen hove in sight—a cavalry officer and his orderly—and they were riding in the same direction which the Denzilles and their men had taken. Mr. Somerville, Sylph's newly made friend, held up his hand as they drew near, and when they came to a halt, informed the officer, in a few words, of what had taken place, and begged for his interference.

Asking a few hurried questions so as to inform and assure himself, the officer did not lose a moment in acceding to this request. "Come!" he cried, to the trooper behind him, "we must not suffer such an outrage as this to succeed in a country that professes to be civilized; at all events, you and I will do our best to hinder it, and release the lady."

The cavalry horses were full of mettle, and it was not long, therefore, until those who were pursued became dimly visible in the pale moonlight; and after a few minutes more they were overtaken.

Spurring his horse to where Sylph was seen, the officer shouted to Ned Denzille, "Halt this instant, sir! In the king's name I bid you. It is at your peril you refuse!" and then drawing his sword he showed that his threat had a meaning in it.

Ned, panic-stricken, as though he had seen an apparition, complied, reined in his panting steed, and made surrender. "Evans," said the officer, "while I keep guard over this gentleman do you dismount, and help that lady off the horse."

All of the pursued had fled at sight of the officer and his man, with the exception of the two Denzilles. The father beheld, with utter indignation and amazement, the quick submission of his son; and the unwarranted interference of the officer, as he deemed it, increased his passionate excitement. He was quite beside himself. Drawing his pistol from its holster, as he saw Sylph delivered from her kidnapper and placed on the ground, he pointed it at the officer and fired, and then lashing his horse with fury, he rode off, filling the air, as he sped, with the bitterest curses and imprecations.

Though he took aim under extreme excitement, the old and well practised duellist did not miss his mark. The bullet struck the officer in the shoulder, and crying out to his orderly: "He has shot me," he stooped over his horse's mane, and gave a groan of agony.

Leaving Sylph, who was now in no peril, since even Ned Denzille, following his father's example, had vanished, the trooper hastened to the aid of his officer. "Had I not better help you down, sir," he said; "here, lean upon my shoulder, and I will lift you off, sir."

"No, Evans," was the reply; "I will hasten at once for surgical aid, for I feel as though I could bear the exertion."

"But had you not better, sir, have your wound stanchied in some way," interposed Sylph. "I am a surgeon's daughter, and have had a little experience in these emergencies, and, if you will allow me, I think I can be of some assistance to you. Oh, do let me help you, sir," she entreated; "for you have incurred this hurt through rendering me a kindness."

The officer seemed startled at the voice which he heard, dismounted, though with difficulty, from his horse, with the help of his orderly, and moved slowly, from weakness, toward the lady that had addressed him, as if desirous to settle in his mind some surprising and eager doubt. The movement was mutual, for Sylph, too, upon closer scrutiny, felt she was on the very verge of a joyful recognition.

Yes, to her amazement and delight, the officer was Captain Vaughan, whom she had first met at Chester jail, now on two occasions her good chain-pion and providential deliverer. And his orderly was Doctor Gilbert's old valet, the faithful and eccentric Hugh, to the backbone a Welshman.

This meeting so completely unexpected, filled each of them with unutterable gladness; but leaving to a future time all questioning as to the events and circumstances which rendered it possible, Sylph and Hugh applied themselves to the task before them. Aided by Hugh, and Mr. Somerville, who, running on foot, had been able, by this time, to come up, Sylph put forth her most anxious and skilful exertions to stay the bleeding. This done, Captain Vaughan, after a time, was remounted on his charger to be taken to Mr. Somerville's house, who offered both to him and Hugh his warm hospitality. And while the whole group slowly wended their way thither we shall explain how it came about that Captain Vaughan and Hugh were at hand in such an opportune moment.

Soon after Sylph parted from Captain Vaughan in Chester, he got "the route" from that city, and was ordered on foreign service. Previous to his leaving, however, Hugh enlisted in his regiment, and the captain got him appointed as his servant.

The captain and Hugh, in the two or three years following saw service in India and the Mauritius, but got home in time to take part in the war in Holland, and shared in the disastrous retreat of the British from Flanders after the loss of the battle of Rusemonde, in which retreat was also the future Duke of Wellington, who, as Lieutenant-Colonel Wellesley commanded a brigade in the rear guard.

Arrived safely in England, Captain Vaughan retired from the service, but continued Hugh as his valet, who, as invalided had been dismissed the army.

When the disaffected condition of Ireland became fully manifest, Sir Watkin Wynn raised a Welsh Fencible regiment of dragoons to aid the English Government, who were in straits for men, and Captain Vaughan, who was known to the public-spirited knight, volunteered to take the command of the company under him; still retaining Hugh as his attendant, who, now convalescent, was fit again for military duty.

Drafted into Ireland, a part of the regiment met with a dreadful fate in a town of Kildare, named Prosperous. The mails from Dublin, according to general instructions from the insurrectionary committee, were stopped on all the roads on May 23rd, 1798. It was the preconcerted signal of a call to arms, and before the streak of dawn on the 24th, an unknown multitude of rebels, chiefly armed with pikes, some of them 12 and 15 feet long, and tipped with steel, came into Prosperous.

The sentinels of the North Cork Militia in the town, taken by surprise, were killed before they could raise an alarm, and the rebel bands rushed with a wild yell upon the barracks. The soldiers, startled from their sleep, snatched their muskets, and endeavored to hurry out, but found the doors firmly barricaded. Worse than this, fire was flung into the cellars beneath, which were filled with straw and fagots, and in a few seconds the first story of the barracks was girdled with a ring of fire. Beset before and behind, the miserable militia men were driven from the lower to the upper rooms, to avoid being consumed or suffocated.

As the flames pursued them they sprang in panic from the upper windows; but only to fall upon a serried row of pikes; and as each keen blade caught its victim, who, transfixed, writhed in agony, a fierce "hurrah" rang out from the exultant and infuriated rebels. All in the barracks were killed, or desperately wounded.

The Ancient Britons, as Sir Watkin's regiment styled themselves, were fortunately quartered (twenty-three of them), not in the barracks, but in a private house. Eight of their number leaped out of a back window and escaped across the country in the darkness. The rest, however, were slain, and their horses, arms, and uniforms, became the booty of the rebels.

It was to convey some despatches in connection with this dreadful disaster to the commandant of Dungannon Fort, Waterford, that brought Captain Vaughan and Hugh on the road near Enniscorthy, on the evening of the attempted abduction of Sylph. Wexford was supposed to be the disaffected county in the South of Ireland at time and, therefore this route, as commended the authorities, was taken by Captain Vaughan and was the one also chosen by Hugh afterwards sent on by his master immediately to fulfill the commission which he himself was now unable to execute.

"Oh, how wonderful are the ways of God," said Sylph to her rescuer—whose wound, though severe, the surgeon found not dangerous—when next day he was able to enter into conversation with her. "When I was in the power of the wicked Edward Denzilles and unable to extricate myself, I could, I fear, have doubted the existence of a righteous God, or that He cared for those we called Him Father. For in swift thought I said to myself, 'If I be His child, why does He thus suffer His enemies and mine to triumph over me?' When I entreat His help, why does He not deliver me?" Foolish Sylph!" she soliloquized: "If evil He permitted to assail thee was the very means of restoring to thee a long-lost friend. For I, you not been called to my aid by Mr. Somerville, you would have passed on totally unconscious of such an insignificant individual as Sylph Somers. Gilbert lived in this out of the way corner of the world, and would have continued in complete ignorance and forgetfulness of her existence."

There was no mistaking the meaning of this speech. With a flush of joy the wounded officer perceived that the passion he had long cherished was mutual; that the fond remembrance which had been so delightful to him under Indian sun and even amid the rage of battle, was followed by a corresponding remembrance in the heart of the beautiful woman before him, now in the full maturity of her loveliness; that he was as dear to Sylph as she was to him.

Seizing her hand in his he pressed it to his lip while he said—calling her by her name as emboldened by his glad discovery—"Forget you, Sylph, that was utterly impossible. Believe me, that from the day we sadly parted in Chester your fair image has never been absent from my thoughts. Oh, how I longed to meet you again after we separated. Indeed, I felt impelled to follow you, at all risks, to Ireland, but that, to my sore vexation could not be, from a sudden and imperious call to soldierly duty. In a most unexpected way, however, the God whom we both love and serve has brought us into contact; shall it not be, Sylph, only the beginning of a perpetual companionship? You have called me friend; I am that, Sylph, but much more than that. I declare myself this to your most devoted and faithful lover, and am bound to ask you to be mine!"

This declaration, made so speedily, was more than Sylph had looked for, and it almost alarmed her. It opened up to her view a result which though in her heart of hearts she coveted, yet, the strange inconsistency of her woman's nature was also one at which she trembled. To be a wife to link her destiny with that of another; to enter upon a relationship peculiar and mysterious in its character, and in its consequences momentous and unknown, were considerations that pressed themselves this moment upon the heart and mind of Sylph with an agitating power, and yet a kind of delirious happiness at the same time pervaded her being, a thrill of joy that no earthly cause had ever before awakened in her bosom; a spell of sweet enchantment, a thralldom of bliss, from which she could not, would not break away, and she remained in the grasp of her lover's hand, until he won from her that word which confessed her his for life.

While Captain Vaughan held her hand in his Sylph, though in a whirl of happiness, was yet of servant enough, as she bashfully held down her head, to notice that Captain Vaughan had on a ring exactly like one of a peculiar form and setting which she found among her mother's trinkets in the drawer of the iron safe, about which Doctor Gilbert had spoken to her an hour or two before his death. On the day after her engagement to the captain, therefore, she thought struck her that she would wear the duplicate ring and see if he would mark the likeness.

After breakfast she was alone in the sitting-room, and as the centre, now, of all-powerful attraction to her fiancé, it was not long before he joined her; for though painfully stiff in the left shoulder from his wound, and somewhat weak from loss of blood, he was able to take easy movement from room to room, and to enjoy conversation.

Sitting down beside Sylph it was not long before her experiment concerning the ring on her finger proved a success. Captain Vaughan, indeed, was more speedy in his observation, and more energetic in his conduct upon making it, than she could at all have anticipated. Eagerly seizing her hand and closely scrutinizing its jeweled ornament, he very excitedly asked, "Where in the world, Sylph, did you get that ring? Your answer I feel certain will lead to a most unparalleled and joyful discovery."

Sylph gave him the history of the trinket, adding all she knew about her mother who had owned it.

"Oh, God! how wonderful are Thy ways," he exclaimed; "and my use of that sacred name," he added, "is not irreverent, but an acknowledgment of His love and power, for He has wrought in your case and mine a wondrous and most extraordinary providence. Sylph, would you believe it, I can tell you who you are and who your mother was, yes, and your father too, and it is that ring upon your hand that solves the long-hidden secret of your early history. And let me tell you at once, that your baptismal name is not Sylph, but Zilpah, and that your second name, or surname, is not Somers, but Somerville; and more than this, it strikes me forcibly that our host in this very house, too, is not merely your Christian friend and co-worker in all that is good, but is also, I believe, a relative of yours."

(To be continued.)

THE PHARISEES ANSWERED.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 29. Mark 2: 13-28; 3: 1-5. Golden Text, Exod. 20: 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER the healing of the palsied man our Lord "went forth again by the seaside, and all the multitude resorted unto Him and He taught them." It must have been on His return from preaching that "He saw Levi, the son of Alphæus sitting at the receipt of custom."

TWO LITTLE WORDS

from the Master were sufficient to change the whole tenor of this man's life. "Follow Me," He said, "and he left all, rose up, and followed Him" (Luke 5: 28). The claims of business, the profit he had made by it, the getting in of bad debts, were all left, the claims of Jesus must take precedence of all else; he sought "first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," and most surely all things he needed were added unto him. All that Levi had was now the Lord's, and he did not hoard up that which remained to him, in case he should be brought down to the same poverty as He who had "not where to lay His head," for the next thing he did was to make Him a great feast in his own house.

It is more than probable that Levi, having found Jesus, longed for the conversion of those who followed the same calling; and that before breaking up house and home, he would make use of them to bring his former business associates in contact with the Lord Jesus: "there was a great company of publicans and of others which sat down with them" (Luke 5: 29). Scribes and Pharisees were looking on, who came, it would seem, only to criticise. Until this new Teacher arose, they had stood on the highest pinnacle of religious reputation, they had paid dear for it, had denied themselves much, had strictly paid the tithe of all their possessions, even to the smallest herbs in their vegetable gardens, had fasted twice every week, no easy thing for a man who has not some end to gain; and here was this Jesus of Nazareth, a man who had no pretence to the same austerity, a man of the people, yet who possessed a power both in preaching and teaching which wrought wonders wherever He went—while their labored piety had nothing to show for it, although it was the very acme of the religion of the day, although it was indisputably "the thing."

Thus the Scribes and Pharisees were driven to do what all religious but unspiritual people do now, to seek some flaw in the religion of the Lord Jesus. Not possessing the moral courage to speak directly to Him, they attack His disciples and say, "How is it that He eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners?" The eye and ear of Jesus are busy; never occupied with Himself, He sees all that is going on, within and without those hearts, and "He saith unto them, They that are whole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Any idea of seeking or saving the lost and outcast never entered into the minds of these Pharisees.

But externalism had taken strong hold upon them, and even the disciples of John, the austere forerunner of Jesus, could hardly understand the very little manifestation of austerity in Jesus and in His disciples, therefore they come to Him (comp. Matt. 9: 14) saying "Why do the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast, but Thy disciples fast not?" And Jesus said unto them, "Can the children of the bridechamber fast while the Bridegroom is with them? As long as they have the Bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. But the days will come when the Bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days." Here is the Lord's lesson about fasting. Let it be when there is an absence of the Bridegroom, it is not a virtue in itself but an accessory. Let there be an end in view. "This kind cometh not out but by prayer and fasting," Paul was "in fastings often" perhaps voluntary when the burden of the Lord lay on him, and involuntary when in this journey he could not obtain food. The Lord then takes occasion to show how impossible it is to make a patchwork of the new and old life, new cloth tears an old garment, new wine bursts old leather bottles, such as are used in the East, by its fermentation; in the same way, nature and grace, the flesh and the Spirit, the love of God and the planned austerity of our old nature, cannot accord together. Ananias and Sapphira tried it, Simon in Samaria tried it, so did Judas, and later the seven sons of Sceva; and in each case it was a fearful failure.

Our subject passes on to another questioning of the Pharisees which was subsequent to this time, but which is also mentioned in the first three Gospels. Jesus was going through the cornfields on the Sabbath day, probably on His way from some blessed work of healing and preaching. His disciples, who very likely had been some time without food, began to pluck the ears of corn. But the of the Pharisees were upon them. O how intensely trying it must have been to our beloved Lord to have, in almost every audience, those who had not the remotest idea of learning anything, but who criticised, found fault, and by their very presence and manner threw cold water upon all He said. And He never sent them away, but bore with them, showing what manner of spirit He was of. They said unto Him, "Behold, why do they on the Sabbath day that which is not lawful?" Thus in the cowardly spirit of the natural man, they complained of Jesus to His disciples, and of His disciples to Jesus.

JEALOUS EYES

But, in point of fact, the disciples were not transgressing the law, "When thou comest into the standing corn of thy neighbor, then thou mayest pluck the ears with thine hand; but thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbor's standing corn" (Deut. 23: 25). There was no prohibition against this being done on the Sabbath, in case of need. The Lord answered them as He usually did, from the written Word, saying, "Have ye never read what David did, when he had need, and was an hungered, he and they that were with him? How he went into the house of God in the days of Abiathar, the high priest, and did eat the shew bread, which is not lawful to eat but for the priests, and gave also to them which were with him? And He said unto them, The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath: therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath." But the words of our Lord are no warrant for the non-observance of the Lord's Day as seen in European cities, or for the growing disregard of it in our own land. We never read that He worked as carpenter on the Sabbath or that His disciples plied their trade, or bought or sold on that day: never anything for profit or amusement. It is still true that "the Sabbath was made for man," and only He who made it is Lord of the Sabbath day. God never made the Sabbath-breaker nor yet the disobedient and the profane to be lords of it.

"And He entered again into the synagogue (this seems to have been on another Sabbath day (Luke 6: 6), and there was a man there which had a withered hand," and the hopes of the Pharisees having been roused that they might find a weak point in Jesus with regard to the observance of the Sabbath, "they watched Him, whether He would heal him on the Sabbath day; that they might accuse Him." What a scene! Jesus the Son of God, in whom dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, stands there ready to bless every one who comes to Him, and these poor lost souls, these Pharisees, eagerly intent upon shielding their

IDOL OF REPUTATION

for piety from the smallest imputation, taking upon themselves to criticise the Lord, and thus withdrawing themselves from all possibility of blessing through Him! What do they care whether the man with the withered hand is healed or not, it is nothing to them; but if only they can find an accusation against Him, then this teacher of the people will lose His popularity and they will be once more restored to the zenith of influence.

The Lord Jesus would be hindered from healing by no such considerations. "I must work the work of Him that sent Me while it is day" (John 9: 4). "He saith to the man which had the withered hand, Rise up, and stand forth in the midst" (Luke 6: 8). There was no secrecy, no doing things in a corner, He was Master of the situation wherever He was; unrecognized as the Son of God, but felt as a Power which was irresistible. It was necessary for the poor cripple's faith that every eye should be upon him. This is what the natural man shrinks from. How many have been kept back from peace with God, because they were too proud to let it be known that they needed help; they would not remain to an inquiry meeting, or, if in a chapel, they would not come up to a penitent form; they did not want others to pass remarks on them, the keeping up appearances was more important in their eyes than the being actually healed. This poor man, when he stood in the midst, would come under the same condemnation as Jesus Himself, he came for healing on the Sabbath day. But his sense of need and his confidence in Jesus overcame all reluctance, he accepted the position of a man in need and stood forth in the midst.

Every eye was upon him, and Jesus, who had been surveying the criticising glances of His would-be accusers, said unto them, "Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath day or to do evil? to save life or to kill? But they held their peace." It was not their object to seek out the real right and wrong, but only to find a handle whereby they might accuse Jesus. Then Jesus was angry, "being grieved for the hardness of their hearts," for their utter indifference as to what was really just, and to the condition of the poor man before them. And He said unto the man, "Stretch forth thine hand." O how often had he essayed to do this in vain, should he then make another attempt? What if he failed and became the despised laughing-stock of the company present? It is really the fear of this contingency which hinders so many from taking a step of faith. This man, however, was not about to try an experiment, he would simply obey Him who had unlimited power. Christ was not mocking him, "He sent His Word and healed them" (Ps. 107: 20) there was power in His Word to expel the disease and unbind those muscles and tendons. "And he stretched it out; and his hand was restored whole as the other." Reader, come out from your hiding-place, stand forth in the midst in your true colors, be what you are, stretch out your withered hand, or withered faith, or withered love, or withered zeal at the Master's word and He will make it whole.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and single copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Attention of the Senate was Occupied last week by a debate on Senator Sherman's Refunding Bill. Mr. Sherman proposes to refund two hundred millions of the three and a half per cent bonds at three per cent, and make them payable in five years. This would leave three hundred and fifty millions still payable at the option of the government. Mr. Sherman thought that considering the drain on the Treasury there would be for arrears of pensions, and that there was a probability of alterations in the tariff, not more than $250,000,000 could be paid off in five years. He did not expect that at three per cent, the bonds would sell rapidly, but he advocated the project because it would save the government a million of interest every year, and investors would be attracted by the certainty of five years permanency. Senator McPherson advised an alteration in the amount to $400,000,000, and in the time to ten years. The bill was opposed by other Senators, one of whom—Senator Vest—advocated the insertion of the clause compelling the national banks to accept the new bonds. It will be remembered that a similar clause was inserted in the Refunding Bill last year, and Mr. Hayes vetoed the bill mainly on account of that clause.

An Important Paper has been Sent to President Arthur respecting polygamy in Utah, which the politicians in Washington describe as an institution rapidly dying out. The paper in question furnishes names, dates, and facts, alleging that out of thirty-six members, composing the General Assembly of Utah, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, thirty-two are high officers of the Mormon Church, bound by their oaths to obey the dictates of the church in all things, secular as well as spiritual, and twenty-eight are living in polygamy, in violation of the law of Congress of 1862. Three of these men are alleged to have five wives each and two others have six wives each.

Judge Cox has Stated the Principles on which he will found his charge to the jury in the case of the assassin, Guiteau. Three important issues were involved. One was that of malice. The defence argued that the murderer entertained no malice, in the true sense of the word, against President Garfield, and therefore the crime was not murder, but manslaughter. On that point the judge ruled that the word malice in the statute meant only a deliberate intention to kill, and did not necessarily include hatred or ill-will. Therefore as Guiteau's intention was admitted, the crime was murder. Then there was the question of insanity, and upon this the whole case turns. An insane man not being responsible for his actions, if he commits a crime is entitled by the law to acquittal. The question involved, therefore, is whether Guiteau when he fired the fatal shot was insane in the sense intended by the law. The judge ruled that the test of responsibility consisted in the process by which the criminal arrived at the determination to commit his crime. If he became convinced by his reason that in murdering his victim he was doing a great public good, he must be held responsible; but he would not be responsible if when he committed the crime he thought he was obeying a law or a command higher than the law of the land, providing that delusion had taken possession of his mind independently of his will and reason, and not as the result of his reflections. The third issue was as to any doubts the jury might entertain. Ordinarily a prisoner is entitled to the benefit of doubt on matters of fact, but in this case the prosecution argued that the defence having set up insanity as an affirmative proposition, were bound to prove it. The judge decided that the defence ought to furnish clear and convincing proof of the insanity, but that if the jury were in doubt whether the prisoner was insane or not, they must give him the benefit of the doubt and acquit him. Both the prosecution and the defence are satisfied that these decisions are fair, and are content to have the case so submitted to the jury.

Legislation on the Subject of the Licensing laws is urgently recommended by the Governor of the State of New York in his message sent to the Legislature January 11th. Gov. Cornell said: "The manifest inadequacy of the laws for the regulation of the liquor traffic must be a cause of regret to all good citizens. Licenses are granted to hundreds and thousands of parties pretending to be hotel-keepers, whose sole occupation in the way of public entertainment consists in selling liquor; while in a still greater number of instances liquor is sold openly and boldly without license. The evils resulting from the sale of liquor, even within the pale of the law, are bad enough, and always to be deplored; but the degradation and ruin resulting from the wholesale violation of law and order are lamentable in the extreme. Crimes most wicked and revolting, of almost daily occurrence, are attributable, in nearly every instance, to the bane of intemperance. There seems to have been, during the past year, a marked increase in the number of brutal homicides. Scarcely a day passes without the publication of some horrible tragedy, generally perpetrated on weak and defenceless persons. In much the larger proportion of instances these terrible deeds are directly traceable to habits of intemperance." This statement, it must be remembered, is made in a written message by the Governor of the wealthiest and most populous State in the Union. When such statements are made by temperance speakers, those gentlemen who take "a calm view" of the evil call them exaggerations.

Fifteen Aldermen of the City of Brooklyn were sentenced to pay a fine of $250 each and to serve terms of imprisonment varying from ten to thirty days by Justice Gilbert on Jan. 14th. Their offence was contempt of court. They had passed over the mayor's veto, and in spite of an injunction, a motion conceding to the elevated railroad companies a franchise for which the mayor considered the city would not receive adequate compensation. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, but in the meantime the aldermen, much to their mortification, were consigned to prison.

Two Conspicuous Signs, Illuminated by the electric light, are now visible side by side every night at the corner of Sixth Avenue and Thirty-second Street New York. One is that of the Cremorne Garden, which is advertised by its proprietors as the resort of pretty bar-maids. The other, over the next door to the Cremorne Garden, indicates the Cremorne Mission now opened by Jerry McAuley. From the door of the mission thousands of vicious and depraved persons of both sexes, fashionably attired, may be seen promenading in that street and on the avenue from dusk till midnight. It is evident that Jerry McAuley has planted his mission where it is sorely needed, and many prayers are offered that it may be the means of rescuing the friendless and fallen from sin and punishment. Mr. William E. Dodge, Mr. Morris

K. Jessup, Mr. S. Otis Livingstone, Mr. Spencer W. Coe, Mr. S. E. Hiscox, and other philanthropists have visited the mission and aided in its support. It has cost $12,000, all of which has been paid, and a surplus fund has been subscribed which will cover its expenses for one year. The Water Street Mission, where Jerry McAuley has for many years conducted religious services, was on Sunday crowded by its old friends to welcome John O'Neil, the successor of Jerry McAuley. General Clinton B. Fisk, one of the trustees of the mission, was present and assisted in the services. Prayers were made for the success of the Cremorne Mission, where Jerry and Maria McAuley were entering upon their new work. The new leader of the mission is a young man who, through the instrumentality of Jerry McAuley, was four years ago redeemed from a life of vice.

A Holocaust on the Hudson River Railroad was reported on Friday night. The Chicago express, on which were many Albany legislators, halted about seven o'clock just outside New York, near the Spuyten Duyvil station. The brakes were out of order, and while the train men were examining them the local train from Tarrytown to New York dashed up at full speed. The engine struck the last car of the Albany train, cut through it and drove a part of it into the preceding car. The passengers were thrown from the seats and imprisoned under the ruin, but it is thought none were killed. Before they could be liberated the overturned stoves set the two cars on fire and eight persons were burned to death. Among them were State Senator Wagner, the originator of the Palace Car system, and a young couple named Valentine who had been married only the day before. The position of the corpses, when recovered after a long delay in putting out the fire, indicated that they had suffered excruciating torture before they died. Nineteen other persons were seriously injured, some, it is feared, fatally. The brakeman who went back to stop the second train, but who it is supposed either did not go far enough, or waved the wrong light, has been arrested.

The Albany Legislators on the Train were much shocked at the sight of the charred bodies, one of which was all that remained of their colleague. Good may come out of evil if the sight made such an impression upon them as to dispose them to get to some useful work instead of wrangling about offices and organizing deadlocks. This would be a good time to pass a bill compelling this wealthy railway company to spend some of their enormous gains in taking out of their cars the fatal stoves and substituting proper heating apparatus. A deadlock is always interesting, and sometimes profitable to those concerned, but citizens are of opinion that legislation to restrain the greed of monopolies and to protect life, even the lives of legislators, would be a better occupation for the men we send to Albany than cultivating a deadlock.

An Active and Zealous Christian Minister has been called to his reward. The Rev. John Cotton Smith, D.D., rector of the Church of the Ascension, in New York, died of heart disease on January 9th, in his fifty-sixth year. He was a descendant of John Cotton and Cotton Mather. His father was Dr. Thomas M. Smith, President of Kenyon College. Dr. Smith came to the Church of the Ascension in 1860, and immediately commenced active and energetic mission work among the poor of the city. He founded mission schools in several neglected districts, and recognizing the baneful influence of bad accommodation and bad air in the dwellings of the poor, he organized an association which erected two blocks of improved tenement houses. Under his guidance the Church of the Ascension contributed during his rectorship more than $1,000,000 to charitable work. Dr. Smith was actively interested in foreign mission work and was a prominent member of the Board of Foreign and Domestic Missions. He was a member of the American Bible Society, the Tract Society, and other institutions, and was one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance. Besides all this work Dr. Smith found time to write several valuable theological treatises.

A Present of a Handsome Gold Watch and chain, valued at five hundred dollars, has been made by ex-President Hayes to the engineer of the train by which the ex-President travelled on March 5th, and which collided with another train near Severn. Engineer John M. Unglaub, who had charge of the engine of the train, stood manfully at his post, reversing the engine as soon as he saw the approaching engine, but failed to avert the accident. Mr. Unglaub was badly injured, and Mr. and Mrs. Hayes, when they were made aware of the facts, with tears in their eyes thanked Mr. Unglaub, saying that he had not only saved their lives, but those of others on the train. Mr. Unglaub was removed to his home in Baltimore, and Collector Thomas saw personally that he had every attention. Mr. Unglaub, having recovered, resumed his place on the road. On Tuesday, Jan. 3, he was at the engine-house in this city, when he was called upon by a personal friend of President Hayes, who handed him a fine gold watch and chain, valued at $500, accompanied by a letter from Mr. and Mrs. Hayes asking him to accept it as a token of their gratitude and a memento of his coolness exhibited on that occasion.

A Remarkable Address was Delivered in Washington at the obsequies of a child on January 10th by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll. As we read it we are impressed by the utter darkness in which dwell minds that have not been enlightened by the Holy Spirit. Colonel Ingersoll as he stood beside the little grave said he "wished to take from every grave its fear." "All should be brave enough," he said, "to meet what all the dead have met. Why should we fear to meet that which will come to all that is? . . . We do not know whether the grave is the end of this life or the door of another, or whether the night here is not somewhere else a dawn." This vague speculation as to what might or might not be, was but poor comfort to offer to the bereaved family. Yet, as he rejects revelation, the would-be comforter could have offered nothing brighter. But it is not possible "to take from every grave its fear" by such means. He who broke the bonds of death alone could reveal what lay beyond, and He said, "In my Father's house are many mansions, I go that I may prepare a place for you, that where I am there ye may be also" (John 14 : 2, 3).

The Promise of a Pair of Gold Ear-Rings has issued in the bereavement of a household in Brooklyn, N. Y. A little girl thirteen years of age, the treasured daughter of loving parents, was promised that among her Christmas presents would be a pair of gold ear-rings. In order that she might wear them on Christmas day she went at once and had her ears pierced. Unhappily the cold of those bitter days in December affected the wounds, and erysipelas developed. In spite of skillful medical care she suffered excruciating pain and died on January 5th. A home so full of sadness it would be difficult to find, and bitter and unavailing regret fills the hearts of those who loved the child. Custom and fashion blind us to the fact that the practice of wearing ear-rings is a relic of barbarism, and that when ladies encourage children to make holes in their flesh to hang jewelry in, they are really perpetuating a savage custom in civilized society.

An Act of Kindness was Treated with curious ingratitude in Illinois recently. A boatman named Heberling sitting in his boat-house saw a boat in the bay which was drifting down with the current. He watched it as it came down, and the current brought it so near his boat-house that with the aid of a boat-hook he was enabled to catch it and pull it in. He was surprised to see a man lying on the bottom of the skiff, who was drunk. After a great deal of shaking the man came to sufficiently to sit up, and his rescuer asked him his name and where he was going, to which the only answer was "Dunno." A bystander, however, recognized him as the watchman on a steamer lying on the island side of the bay. Mr. Heberling offered his services to take him over in the skiff, and they were accepted by the watchman. Mr. Heberling took the oars, and by steady pulling soon landed on the other side. But when he started to return, he was stopped by the drunken man, who coolly informed him that he could not have that skiff to go back. This somewhat astonished Mr. Heberling, who argued the point with the watchman, but all the eloquence and logic used did not convince the man, who told the kind boatman to get back the best way he could, but that that skiff must remain. Mr. Heberling then wandered about the island looking for some mode of escape from the place, and finally spied a boat lying on the shore. He went to the cabin near by and aroused the owner, who took pity on the wandering boatman and took him across the bay. Such gross ingratitude is rare between men, but there are many men and women whom Jesus has rescued from eternal death who show deplorable ingratitude to Him by neglecting to work for Him in the world.

A Delicate Surgical Operation has Restored to health a railroad employé in Pennsylvania whose affliction led to strange wanderings. He was working in New York last summer, and during a brawl was stabbed in the head, the point of the knife penetrating the brain and breaking off. After his injury he wandered about in the neighborhood of New York unable to speak and with his memory impaired. He finally got on a train, on which he met a conductor who knew where he lived, and he was conveyed home. After lying in a comatose condition he was visited by a surgeon, who discovered the wound in his head, which had healed up. The skull was trepanned, and a small piece removed, with the point of the knife sticking in it. Gradually the power of articulation was recovered, and with his regained memory he was able to tell about the wound and his wanderings while unable to speak. He says that he must have crossed the ferry between New York and Jersey City at least twenty times, not having the power to ask where he was or to tell where he wanted to go. The man in his helpless condition is very much like the sinner wounded by the enemy of souls and ignorant of his way to God. Happy are they who are led by some Christian friend to the great Physician who is able to heal their souls.

The Lack of an Antidote Resulted in the death of a hunter in Arkansas lately. A correspondent of a Chicago journal, writing from Stone Co., Arkansas, says that a young man who had recently removed to that State from Texas was bitten by a large spider of the species known as the Tarantula while out on a hunting expedition. He had lain down before the fire for the night, and the insect crawled under his blanket and bit him in two places—the finger and the elbow. He was awakened by a tingling sensation in the limb, and succeeded in killing the tarantula, which he discovered near the spot where he had been lying. He was more than four miles from a house, but he set out immediately to procure assistance. As he walked he felt the poison spreading through his body, and before he reached the place he was beyond remedy and died the same night. Had he taken the precaution hunters in those parts usually take of carrying antidotes with them his life might have been saved. Thousands of men among us who have fallen under the curse of love of rum, or the still more irresistible fascination of opium, are in similar danger. But in those cases the peril is greater because they may suffer eternal death. But for them there is an infallible antidote provided if they will only apply it (1 Cor. 15 : 57).

A Successful Attempt to Found a Coffee-house as a rival to the liquor saloon is reported. The more ambitious scheme of the gentlemen who recently endeavored to organize a company for the purpose has not as yet prospered, but the ladies connected with the Bible and Fruit Mission have managed to establish a coffee-house which is self-supporting. It is at 416 East Twenty-sixth Street, a locality where such an institution is likely to be useful. A large number of free meals have been provided, but notwithstanding this liberality, the receipts have hitherto covered the expenditure. The ladies, we understand, are now endeavoring to add to the coffee-house a lodging-house where a poor man may have a bath, a clean bed, and access to a reading room, on payment of the modest sum of one dime. To do this they need assistance for the purchase of a building and furnishing it.

CHASTENED HAPPINESS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.*

"They shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it."—JEREMIAH 33 : 9.

Blessings Surely in Store for the Jews—All Believers the Seed of Abraham—One Source of Prosperity—The Proper Order of Temporal Blessings—God's Wisdom Toward His People—I. He Tones down Great Joys—Unmixed Delight Dangerous—Sunstrokes of the Mind—Contiguity of Super-Spirituality and Sensuality—Unmixed Joys Fallacious—Unnatural—Birds of Paradise without Feet—II. The Feelings by which a Sobering Effect is Produced—A Holy Awe of God's Presence—Repentance for Past Sin—Sense of Unworthiness—Fear of Abusing God's Goodness—Conscious Need of Watchfulness—III. Personal Experience—The Untempted in Great Danger—A London Speaker's Warning—The Undiminished Grain of Musk.

GOD's ancient people sadly provoked Him with their idolatries from age to age. He was long-suffering to them to the last degree, but at length He grew weary of them, and according to His own words "He abhorred His own inheritance." He caused them to be carried away into captivity, and their land became a desert, or the heritage of strangers. Israel became a people scattered and peeled, and on the brink of national extinction, for their iniquities had hidden the face of the Lord from them. Yet the Lord, even Jehovah, had entered into a covenant concerning them with Abraham his friend, which covenant He had afterwards renewed with His servant David. This latter covenant the Lord is said by the prophet Jeremiah to remember even when Jerusalem is desolate.

We read in the twentieth verse and onward these words : "Thus saith the Lord ; If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season ; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne." Even in Israel's worst days, when her representative man was the weeping prophet Jeremiah, and when her sorrows were greater than even he could express, yet the Lord revealed His love, and promised that blessed days should dawn for the seed of Abraham. These days have not yet come, but they shall surely arrive, for God hath not cast away His people whom He did foreknow.

THERE IS YET A HISTORY FOR ISRAEL ; her sun is clouded, but it has not set. As surely as stands the covenant with day and night, so surely shall the chosen people return from their captivity and possess the land which the Lord has given unto them. In those days the Lord will build them as at the first, and cleanse them from all their iniquities. Then they shall not be proud or arrogant, for His goodness shall startle and astound them and they shall be amazed even unto trembling when they see what great things Jehovah has done for them. The memory of their great national offences, and especially of their long rejection of the Messiah, shall cause them to wear their high dignity without pride ; they shall be subdued by love to a childlike fear of again offending, they shall tremble as they see the Lord God of their fathers glorifying all His grace in them.

Thus much for the strict connection of the text. At this time we shall loosen the verse from its stall and bring it forth to our own pastures. We may use this promise in reference to all the Lord's people, for the promise is sure to all the seed. Paul, in his epistle to the Galatians, has well said, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Let me, then, read the text again, and let us appropriate it to ourselves : "They shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it." Such honor and blessing have all the saints.

Our text suggests at the outset the remark that all the good things which make up prosperity are to be traced unto the Lord. Woe unto us if we receive good and perfect gifts, and yet forget the

* The first sermon he delivered after his return from the South of France.

Father of lights from whom they come! These benefits are not from beneath, but from above; let them not be passed by in ungrateful silence, but let us send upward humble and warm acknowledgments. He who forgets mercy deserves that mercy should forget him. God grant we may never be such practical atheists as to receive daily bounties from God, and not return a daily song.

Remark next, that temporal mercies are always best when they come in their proper order. I have no doubt our text includes both temporal and spiritual good; but certainly the temporals are arranged in the second rank, for the eighth verse runs: "I will cleanse them from all their iniquity, whereby they have sinned against me; and I will pardon all their iniquities, whereby they have sinned, and whereby they have transgressed against me;" and after this we have mention of goodness and prosperity. After pardon, peace and plenty are golden blessings; without it they might prove a curse.

The text speaks of goodness and prosperity procured for us, and then tells us that all danger which might arise out of it is averted by a gracious work upon the heart. The Lord sends a chastened joy—"they shall fear and tremble." Instead of unduly exulting in their possessions, and becoming high-minded and vain-glorious, the Lord's people are kept lowly and self-distrustful, and thus their happiness brings glory to God, and the Lord's word is fulfilled: "It shall be to me a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good that I do unto them."

This then is our subject, the sanctifying and mellowing of our joy. We shall try to see the Lord's loving wisdom in this matter, that we may the more wisely love Him, and the more intelligently estimate His prudent conduct toward us. We shall first notice this toning down of our joy; and then, in the second place, we shall observe the feelings by which this chastened effect is produced; and, thirdly, we shall look to the measure in which most of us can enter into this experience of a joy, toned and tinted by fear and trembling.

I. Let us think a little about of our great joys. In the cup of salvation there are drops of bitterness, and so must it be, for unmixed delight in this world would be dangerous. Unbroken prosperity in worldly things has proved perilous to many Christians. It is no theory, but a matter of sad fact, that many men, as they rise as to one world sink as to another. I am even afraid that long-continued health of body is not always for the health of a man's soul; and that to be without care and trouble, is not the readiest way to soul-prosperity. When the sea is smooth the ship makes poor sailing. We are apt to lose our God among our goods. Is it not so?

THE TONING DOWN

If the world's roses had no thorns should we not think it paradise, and forego all desire for the gardens above? If Israel in Egypt had dwelt luxuriously, would a cry for deliverance have ever gone up to heaven? and had Pharaoh been content to ease their burdens, would they ever have marched for Canaan? Alas, we are apt to chill in our desires for heaven when we get to the warm side of the hedge, and hear the smooth side of the world's tongue. When the flowers of earth charm us we cast our eyes downward and forget the stars of heaven—at least, the danger lies that way.

Wise men dare not ask for unmingled prosperity, for they are not sure they can bear it. When first we travel to the south and escape this land of fog we delight without measure in the sunshine, and are anxious to bask in it throughout the livelong day. Do you wonder? Yet before long experience suggests a sunshade, for the stranger finds that his head cannot endure the full rays of the sun. In the same way many a man has suffered a sunstroke in his mind, and heart, and character, by making money too fast and prospering too much.

There is a danger of another kind in a spiritual experience which is all smooth and pleasant. You all remember the fate of Moab who had been at ease from his youth, and had become settled upon his lees; may it never be ours. Yet I have seen professors lose their balance while filled with delight. I am not one of those who would speak evil of excitement in religion; men get excited about politics, why should they not be excited about eternal things? Still, there is a kind of delirious religion abroad which I would have men avoid. Its joys are not calm and quiet, but fanatical and noisy. Be ye sober. Do not give up the reins of your judgment and permit your feelings to run away with you.

Some Christians have been so uniformly joyous that they have grown elated and self-conceited, even as Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked. A few have even supposed themselves to be absolutely perfect while in the flesh—a mere supposition, disproved by their own want of modesty. We have seen brethren carry their heads so high that they could hardly understand a poor believer who was wrestling against sin, and in the strength of God overcoming his corruptions; they have become censorious, and had condemned their brethren as if they had been appointed to be judges in Israel to set up whom they would, and put down whom they chose.

Ecclesiastical history will tell you that some who have boasted of their high spiritual delights have gone far in vain imaginings, and have ended in the worst forms of immorality. It is an extraordinary fact that super-spirituality has often been found to dwell next door to sensuality, and men have turned the wine of holy love into the vinegar of lust. I need not go to ancient chronicles to prove this; a word to the wise suffices. Even spiritual joy needs a dash of salt, if not of wormwood, to be mingled with it. Holy delight needs to be coupled with sacred grief; repentance must go with faith, patience with hope, humility with full assurance, and conscious self-emptiness with a sense of the all-sufficiency of Christ.

I would remind you next, that

UNMIXED JOY

would be fallacious, because there is no such thing here below. If a man should become perfectly contented with the things of this world, it would be the result of a false view of things. This is an error against which we should pray; for this world cannot fill the soul, and if a man thinks he has filled his soul with it, he must be under a gross delusion. What is the best thing of earth—but a bubble, tinted with rainbow hues, but unsubstantial as a dream? Every earthly joy hath within it the seeds of its own destruction? Oh man, if thou didst but know thyself, much more thy God, thou wouldst be assured that visible things can never satisfy the desires of a spiritual being.

As to spiritual joy, I say that in no man's experience can it be long without admixture and yet be true. Never at any moment can a Christian be in such a position that he has not some cause either for dissatisfaction with himself, or fear of the tempter, or anxiety to be faithful in service. Our streams of joy blend with currents of fear. Blessed be God, my sin is forgiven me; this joy calls up its balancing thought—Oh that the Spirit of God may help me not to sin again. Again I sing—Blessed be God, I have gotten the victory over an evil habit; but my song is followed by the prayer—Lord, enable me to conquer all evils, even those which as yet I know not. Thus joy and fear hang like the two scales of a balance—I mean not the fear which love casts out, but the filial fear which love fosters.

If God has preserved His servant in the day of battle, he has no room to boast, for here comes another enemy. Temptations come wave after wave, and, having breasted one, we prepare for another. We cannot yet shout the victory, for, lo, the foes advance squadron upon squadron; their routed battalions are succeeded by new armies, and it behoves us to quit ourselves like men. We dwell where in our God we have the utmost reason for delight, but where in all things we perceive the most weighty arguments for solemnity. Rejoice evermore, but cease not to fear and tremble for all the goodness and all the prosperity that the Lord has procured for you.

Once more, unmixed delight on earth would be unnatural. We are not in heaven yet, and perfect bliss lives not beneath these cloudy skies, nor within the pale sway of the moon. While we are in this body we groan, though we have the firstfruits of the Spirit, for we are in a creation which groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. Our years must have their winters while the world revolves. When the Dutch had the trade of the East in their hands they were accustomed to sell birds of paradise to the untravelled people of these realms. These specimen birds had no feet, for they had craftily removed them, and the merchants declared that the species lived on the wing and never alighted. There was so much of truth in the fable that had they been really and veritably "birds of paradise" they would not have found a place for their feet upon this globe. Truly, birds of paradise do come and go, and flit from heaven to earth, but we see them not, neither can we build tabernacles to detain them.

While you are here expect reminders of the fact that this is not your rest. If you could attain to perfect joy on earth you might be justified in saying, "I have no longing for heaven; I am perfectly clear of sin, and care, and trouble; I may as well stay where I am. What need to go further if I can fare no better?" Let no man dream that things will ever come to this with him. Ah, ye lovely flowers of spring, this year ye have looked forth too soon. It is strangely mild weather for December, but spring has not yet arrived. Possibly it is so with some of my hearers; because the Lord is smiling upon you, it is very mild weather with your souls, and you dream that the winter of trouble is ended and that your heaven has begun. Be not deceived, you are not yet

"Where everlasting spring abides
And never-withering flowers."

Perhaps a touch of frost may do you good by preventing your getting into an unnatural and unsound condition.

Thus much, then, upon the first point, the toning down of our joys, which is wisely managed by our Father's wisdom and prudence.

II. Secondly, we are to see how this toning down is done, and observe the feelings by which this sobering effect is produced: "They shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it."

WHY FEAR AND TREMBLE?

Is not this in part a holy awe of God's presence? Remember that text, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure." The argument for fear and trembling is the work of God in the soul. Because God is working in you there must be no trifling. If the eternal Deity deigns to make a workshop of my nature, I too must work, but it must be with fear and trembling.

So, then, the blessed presence of God is the believer's joy, and the very fact that He has worked it in him, is a cause for the fear and trembling which comes over the spirit of the joyous believer, and that I think is the first meaning of our text. God has been very good to me, unspeakably good to me, and I have plainly seen the traces of His fatherly hand in my life. So has it been with you, dear friends. When God has come very near to you in a blaze of mercy, when He has done things that you looked not for; when your mouth has been filled with laughter, and your tongue with singing because of His goodness, have you not at the same time felt overcome by the excess of His favor? Have you not been able to sympathize with Peter when, at the sight of his boat full of fish, he cried "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." A common providence would have charmed you, but an extraordinary providence has overwhelmed you; you have lain in the dust at Jesus' feet, feeling yourself to be but dust and ashes, and yet every particle of dust has been full of wondering love to God. This is one way in which God keeps His people right in the days of their joy.

But next to that there rises up in the mind of every favored Christian a deep repentance for past sin. He asks himself this question, "How could I have lived as I have done when God has entertained such love towards me?" When I discovered the election of God's grace, and when I saw at what a price I had been redeemed by our Lord Jesus, I was ashamed of all my evil ways. Have you not felt the same? Have you not felt ashamed and confounded at the memory of your former life? Have you not felt as if you could never open your mouth any more because of all your unkindness to your heavenly friend? Such penitent reflections keep the Lord's people right, by creating a fear and trembling in the presence of his overflowing goodness.

Let me ask you another question. Has not your deepest sense of unworthiness come upon you when you have been conscious of superlative mercy? When the Lord has scourged and chastened you, you have seen your sins in your sorrows and have been ashamed; but, by the memory of His great goodness, you have been far more corrected and humbled. When our secret sins are set in the light of God's countenance, it is a light indeed! Love makes the crimson of sin more red than ever. Blood-bought pardon makes sin look black as sackcloth of hair. I tell you, sirs, it is not the flames of hell, but the glories of heaven, that most of all fill us with trembling before the Lord. Nothing touches the heart like undeserved and unexpected love. Love's glance flashes to the very core of the heart, and makes the offender, like Peter, go forth and weep bitterly.

Have you never noticed how the Lord brings His people to their bearings, and keeps them steady, under a sense of great love, by suggesting to their hearts the question, as becometh one who has been favored like this?" Have you not felt as if you dared not speak till you had prayed, "Lord, open Thou my lips." You have been afraid to look for fear your eyes should glance on evil; and therefore you have prayed, "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity." There has been such a fear, such a caution, such a holy jealousy upon you, that, instead of being uplifted by favor, you have been humbled thereby. Grace never makes a man vain. When a soul is adorned with glory and beauty, and made to shine like the star of the morning, it owns its borrowed comeliness and brightness, and is mildly radiant with reflected rays.

"HOW CAN I LIVE

And have you never felt a fear lest God's goodness should be abused by you? I have been smitten to the very heart as with a secret blow in moments of delight, when I have thought, "And suppose, after all, I should not serve God faithfully in my favored position, and should not be approved of Him at the last?" What if I should seem to be an apostle, and prove to be a Judas? What if I should speak of Christ, and yet be nothing better than a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal? That heart-piercing fear will wound pride if anything will. Have you never been thus put to the question by your conscience?

Have not other questions arisen of a similar character? You have seen your children around you, and you have been happy with them, but have you not thought, "How if I should not train them aright, and they should grow up to be a sorrow to me, and a dishonor to the church of God?" When prospered in business, have you never said to yourself, "What if I should become a worshipper of the golden calf? What if, covetousness should eat out the heart of my devotion? What if when my Master calls me to account for my talents, He should cast me away for having hid them in a napkin?" Have you never been tried by such thoughts?

If you have never thus examined yourself, you had better do so at once. He who has never questioned his own condition had better make an immediate inquiry. He who has never felt great searchings of heart needs to be searched with candles. It is idle to take things for granted, for all of us must be tried by fire, and even "the righteous scarcely are saved." No man's hell shall be more terrible than that of the self-confident one who made so sure of heaven that he would not take the ordinary precaution to ask whether his title-deeds were genuine or no.

One more thought may also occur to the most joyous believer. He will say, "What if after rejoicing in all this blessedness I should lose it?"

"What," cries one, "do you not believe in the final perseverance of the saints?" Assuredly I do; but are we saints? There's the question. Moreover, many a believer who has not lost his soul has, nevertheless, lost his present joy and prosperity, and why may not we? The good man has shone as a star of the first magnitude, but suddenly he has dwindled into darkness; he has been unwatchful, and in consequence he has had to go softly in the bitterness of his soul.

We have known fathers in Israel who have stepped aside, and though they have by deep repentance found their way to heaven, they have gone sorrowing thither. Look at David's history. Who happier all the early part of his life? Note that one sin with Bathsheba, and ask who more tried and troubled than David throughout the rest of his pilgrimage? The doctrine of final perseverance was never intended for the comfort of any who are afraid of self-examination, or who are not watchful; for it is by no means at variance with the other doctrine that many who made sure of heaven in their own minds will never enter there, because Jesus never knew them.

Thus you see how the Lord, by working upon our innermost feelings, sobers us in the hour of joy, even as the text hath it: "They shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it."

PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

III. By way of practical application, let us now consider the measure in which you and I can enter into this experience. I thought to myself, if I begin to make individual applications I shall have before me a never-ending task, because every man has had a distinct experience of this truth if he has safely stood upon the high places of joy. We have hundreds of us perceived the benefits of the dark lines and shadings of life's picture, and we see how fit and proper it is that trembling should mingle with transport.

To my mind there is no temptation so bad as not being tempted at all. The worst devil in the world is when you cannot see the devil at all, because the villain has hidden himself away within the heart, and is preparing to give you a fatal stab.

"More the treacherous calm I dread
Than tempests thundering overhead."

This general statement may suffice, and as I cannot make an application to each one personally, I think I will apply the truth to this church as a whole. When this building was not yet ready for opening we held a meeting in it, and I remember among the speakers there was one who is now with God, Mr. Jonathan George, of Walworth, and he made use of this text in a little speech that he made: He said, "It would be well for us all to remember, when God blesses us with any measure of prosperity, that prosperity is very hard to bear. How is that? Cannot Christianity or the grace of God bear it? No, it is because of the extreme carnality and pride of our hearts. Here is a portion of Scripture we should all recollect: 'They shall fear and tremble for all the prosperity that I send.' It is a blessing when God has succeeded our poor efforts, and poured out a blessing upon us, if we are jealous of our own hearts, and fear and tremble. Oh God, how rich, how beneficent thou art! Let us not lose Thy full blessing by our own pride; by pointing to some second cause, and saying, 'It was I; it was ourselves; it was our ministers.'"

Verily I say unto you the words of the man of God have been fulfilled. How I have feared and trembled because the Lord's mercy to us has been so extraordinary. As a church we have enjoyed so many years of growth, and prosperity, and unity, and happiness, that one is apt to fear that it cannot last much longer. Certainly it cannot be perpetuated except by fresh power from the Lord who is wonderful in working. One begins to think, "Must not something happen to spoil our concord? Will power always continue with the word preached? Will not the candle burn low in the socket? Such holy jealousy, if faith be also active, will help to keep us right. Evils may be prevented by foresight. Through grace, by our fear of falling we may be helped to stand.

Brethren, we are just now in a critical time of our life as a church. Whatever of novelty there was about our movements has long since vanished, and those who came among us from curiosity know us no more. Your pastor's ministry cannot be expected to be as fresh and vigorous as it used to be, for upon his head the gray hairs far outnumber the darker ones, and perhaps gray hairs are stealing over his preaching too. If natural vigor fails, now is the time to see whether the power which has sustained us be of God or no. We know what the answer to the text will be—out of weakness we shall be made strong.

We are in the middle of the river now, and in the middle the river is deepest and hardest to ford. Now we need that underneath us there should be the everlasting arms. I am weaker than ever, you also are weaker than ever; but the eternal God fainteth not. We have the same old Gospel, and you will not grow tired of it, though it is preached by

THE SAME OLD SPURGEON.

The Holy Spirit will abide with us, and that will make up for the weakness of our spirit. You who have been earnest at prayer will not, I hope, lose your zeal, for the mercy-seat is still accessible.

To persevere is the difficulty. It would be easy to burn at a stake for five minutes; but to be surrounded with smouldering faggots of green wood, and to burn by slow degrees, would be torture indeed; yet such is the patience of saints. Keeping up your burning zeal, your personal holiness, your evangelizing efforts, and all your spiritual works after twenty-seven years is no mean test of your faith. He that endureth to the end the same shall be saved. Yes, brethren, these are the thoughts that come into my mind, and prevent my ever saying we have done well, and may rest on our oars. Far from anything like exaltation or self-congratulation, I feel more than ever inclined to lie low at the feet of my Master and kiss the very dust He stands upon.

You have heard of the ancient giant Antaus, who could not be overcome, because as often as Hercules threw him to the ground, he touched his mother earth, and rose renewed. Such be your lot and mine, often to be cast down, and as often to rise by that downcasting. "When I am weak then am I strong." Let us glory in infirmity, because the power of Christ doth rest upon us. Let us be content to decrease that Christ may increase; to be nothing that Jesus may be all in all. If we do fear and tremble for all the goodness that God has procured for us, it is not a fearing that He will change, or a trembling lest He should be defeated. The fear and trembling are for ourselves, and not for Him. I have no fear and trembling about the Gospel. I have preached it many years in this place, and its attractive perfume is undiminished.

I read the other day of a grain of musk which had been kept for ten years in a room wherein the air was perpetually changed; it scented that chamber from year to year, and yet when it was weighed by the most delicate scales no diminution of its bulk was apparent. So the Gospel continues to be as ointment poured forth, savoring the thousands that come hither year by year, and yet it is as full of fragrance and freshness as ever, and so shall it be even if for a thousand ages it should be our theme. Come we then with comfort back to the unalterable Gospel, to the undying Spirit, to the unchanging God; here is room for joy unspeakable and full of glory. Up with your banners, then! Forward to new victories! In the name of the God of Jacob let us be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON
—Psalm 103.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

An Appeal in a Cemetery.

The Last Night of the Concerts.—(See page 35).

THE SEQUEL OF AN APPEAL IN A CEMETERY.

(See Illustration.)

A CEMETERY is always a solemnizing place. Even the most frivolous minds are aved by these resting places of the dead. There is something so serious and strange in the thought that the forms we have loved when alive, that we would have shielded at any cost, at any pain to ourselves, we voluntarily consign to the damp, cold earth after the final change has passed upon them. A cemetery is a sermon in itself, for it brings us face to face with the most serious question of our being, "What shall come after this?"

Some time ago two visitors entered a certain cemetery and made their way to a newly made grave. One of them was a boy of about twelve years, and as he looked down on the grave his eyes filled with tears, for under those sods lay all that was mortal of his brother. Solemn, earnest words were then addressed to him by his companion, who urged him while he was still young to give his heart to Jesus, who said, "I am the resurrection and the life." The boy listened attentively and seemed almost persuaded, and the two walked away together in earnest conversation. An eminent minister of the Gospel thus describes the after events of that boy's life.

"He was the son and hope of pious parents, and the favorite of a large circle of acquaintances. He was my friend. We went together to the schoolroom, to the playground, to our chamber. I have seen him while listening to the pleadings of parental faithfulness, urging him to immediate repentance, and warning him of the danger of delay. He listened in silence and respectful attention, but the alluring pleasures of youth dazzled him, and he resolved to leave religion for a future day.

"One evening he met a party of youthful acquaintances. It was a gay circle, and a thoughtless one. In the midst of their mirth his eyes fell upon a hymn-book. He opened it and he told me afterward that he read—

" 'And must this body die—
This mortal frame decay?
And must these active limbs of mine
Lie mouldering in the clay?'

He laid down the book, and forgot its warning voice. Late that evening he came to my chamber, breathing short like one who had been walking fast, and lay down by my side. After some time he turned to me and said, 'Will you get up and give me a glass of water? I feel unwell.' I arose and called the family. He was manifestly ill, but not apparently in immediate danger. The next morning he was worse.

"A physician was called, but did not understand his case. Search was at length made, and it was found that, by mistake, he had taken a dose of deadly poison. The hand of death was then upon him.

For three hours his body was writhing in agony, but that was forgotten in the more excruciating agony of the soul. I heard his minister tell him of a merciful Saviour. I heard his father, kneeling by his bedside, pour out to God the most agonizing prayer for him that language could express. I heard his mother exclaim, 'O my son, my son!' till she swooned and sank upon the floor. I heard him, as he tossed from side to side, cry out, 'O Lord, have mercy upon my soul! O my God, have mercy upon me, mercy, mercy!' and then reaching out his hands to his father, he exclaimed, 'I am lost! I am lost! am I not, father?'

"His breath grew shorter, and his voice fainter, until, raising his hands as if he would cry, 'Mercy!' once more, he expired. Fifteen years have rolled away since I heard those cries of dying agony, but they ring in my ears now as if it were but an hour ago. That look of fierce despair is now in my eye, and my ears echo with the cry, 'I am lost! I am lost! am I not, father?'" How can I forget them?

They came from the death-bed of my friend, and that friend my own beloved brother.

Reader, by my brother's dying groans, by the tears which fall upon this paper while I think upon him, and by the amazing sacrifice on Calvary, I beseech you, remember and lay to heart the truth you are here taught: "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." (2 Cor. 6: 2.)

THE RING THEATRE IN VIENNA.

(See illustration.)

WE give this week a picture of the exterior of the Ring Theatre in Vienna, the scene of the fatal catastrophe of December 8th. It was built about the year 1873, when a large number of people from all parts of the Austrian Empire and from other European countries were expected in Vienna, attracted by the great exhibition. It was thought an excellent opportunity for increasing the theatrical accommodation. The site of the theatre was in the Ring, the liveliest and most brilliant part of the city, consisting of a series of broad streets, planted with trees, which almost encircle the old city of Vienna. The most important public buildings are on the Ring, which occupies the site of the former fortifications. There are about nine theatres in the city, the chief ones being the Hofburg, the Karthnerthor and the Theater an der Wien.

The Ring Theatre was opened under the name of the Comic Opera House. At first it was not a financial success but recently it has been under the management of Herr Jauner, who is well known to foreign play-actors, and who changed its name to that of the Ring Theatre, and made it a success. It was considered one of the most handsome theatres in Europe, immense sums having been lavished on its internal decoration. But the arrangements for exit were of the most inadequate description. The passages leading from the interior of the house to the street being narrow, tortuous and intricate. Mr. Brown, of the firm of Brown Brothers & Co., bankers of New York, who with his wife and the entire family visited the Ring Theatre on Thursday afternoon, and left the theatre about an hour before the catastrophe, says that the stairways leading from the lobby to the seats, were scarcely wide enough for two persons to pass, and that he had vowed after arriving in the open air never to take his family into such a death-trap again. The calamity, overwhelming as it is, is by no means an isolated instance of its kind. The catastrophe in Brooklyn is still fresh in our recollection, and there have been many similar occurrences with various degrees of fatality.

Considering, says the Pall Mall Gazette, what a mass of combustibles in the shape of oil and oil paint and painted canvas is kept in the scene painter's room and in the rooms where scenes are stored away, considering, too, the danger from gas explosions, it is strange that theatres are not burned down a little oftener than they really are. Destruction by fire is

THE NATURAL END of all play-houses, and the insurance offices know this well enough and recognize the fact in the extra premiums they charge on the policies granted to theatrical managers.

Probably the only opera house which ever escaped the usual fate of such establishments was the one occupied by the French Académie Royale de Musique from the first years of the Revolution until the assassination of the Duc de Berri on the steps of the building some thirty years afterward, when, in consequence of the sacrament having been administered to the dying prince in one of the rooms of what the Church regarded as a most unholy edifice, it was demolished.

The Académie Royale was burned out of its theatre in the Palais Royal in 1763, on which occasion even the infidel Voltaire remarked that "the performances had been bad enough to insure, sooner or later, some manifestation of divine wrath." It was again burned out in 1781, and a few years ago the same mishap once more occurred to it. The Académie de Paris has had three opera houses burned under it.

The well-known operatic manager, Colonel Mapleson, said to a reporter in connection with the rapid spread of the fire in the Ring Theatre: "It is a wonder to me that they do not have more such fires than they do. Certainly five-sixths of European theatres are constructed in just such fashion—perfect traps in case of panic. I have such a personal horror of fire in most of our London theatres it spoils the performance for me, and I usually go home."

It is plain from these facts that people who attend theatrical performances incur a serious risk to life and limb; many thousands, however, do go in spite of these repeated warnings and yet escape physical injury. It is nevertheless certain that few of them escape mental and spiritual injury. The effect of theatrical representations on the mind and the soul is uniformly pernicious. Even the least objectionable plays produce unnatural temporary excitement which is followed by as unnatural a depression; they cause the ordinary avocations of life to appear dull, prosaic, and insipid, while the burlesques, comic operas, and spectacular plays have a directly immoral effect. Few men lead virtuous lives who habitually attend theatres where the ballet forms a prominent feature of the performance, and the associations which almost invariably cluster around the theatre show that those people who subsist on the vices of others find there the most eligible ground for their abominable traffic.

The Ring Theatre in Vienna, Burned December 8, 1881.

Country visitors to our great cities are frequently tempted to attend such places, and many of them have reason to regret it. Those who know most of the theatre have good reason to give the advice which under far different circumstances the Christians of Ephesus pressed upon Paul (Acts 19 : 31) "desiring him that he would not adventure himself, into the theatre."

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton. (Continued from page 30.) A Dumb Man's Grief.

THE winter fogs which made London so gloomy did not leave the country sky clear and bright. All the land lay under a shroud of mist and vapor; and even on the uplands round old Marlow's little farmstead the heavens were gray and cold, and the wide prospect shut out by a curtain of dim clouds.

The rude natural tracks leading over the moor to the farm became almost impassable. The thatched roof was sodden and damp, and the deep eaves shed off the water with the sound of a perpetual dropping. Behind the house, the dark, storm-beaten, distorted firs, and the solitary yew-tree blown all to one side, grew black with the damp. The isolation of the little dwelling-place was as complete as if a flood had covered the face of the earth, leaving its two inmates the sole survivors of the human race.

Several months had passed since old Marlowe had executed his last piece of finished work. The blow that Roland Sefton's dishonesty had inflicted upon him had paralyzed his heart—that most miserable of all kinds of paralysis. He could still go about, handle his tools, set his thin old fingers to work; but as soon as he had put a few marks upon his block of oak his heart died within him, and he threw down his useless tools with a sob as bitter as ever broke from an old man's lips.

There was no relief for him, as for other men, in speech easily, perhaps hastily uttered, in companionship with his fellows. Any solace of this kind was too difficult and too deliberate for him to seek it in writing his lamentations on a slate, or spelling them off on his fingers; but his grief and anger struck inward more deeply.

both by day and night, her affection for him was tortured by these hoarse and stifled cries of grief mingled with rage.

There was a certain sense of the duties of citizenship in old Marlowe's mind, which very few women, certainly not a girl as young as Phebe, could have shared. Many years ago the elder Sefton had perceived that the companionless man was groping vaguely after many a dim thought, political and social, which few men of his class would have been troubled with. He had given to him several books, which old Marlowe had pondered over. Now he felt that, quite apart from his own personal ground of resentment, he had done wrong to the laws of his country by aiding an offender of them to escape and elude the just penalty. He felt almost a contempt for Roland Sefton that he had not remained to bear the consequences of his crime.

The news of Roland's death brought something like satisfaction to his mind; there was a chill, dejected sense of justice having been done. He had not prospered in his crime. Though he had eluded man's judgment, yet vengeance had not suffered him to live. There was no relenting toward him, as there was in Mr. Clifford's mind. Something like the old heathen conception of a divine righteousness in this arbitrary punishment of the evil-doer gave him a transient content. He did not object therefore to Phebe's hasty visit to Mrs. Sefton at the sea-side, in order to break the news to her. The inward satisfaction he felt sustained him; and he even set about a piece of work long since begun, a hawk swooping down upon his prey.

The evening on which Phebe reached home again he was more like his former self. He asked her many questions about the sea, which he had never seen; and told her what he had been doing while she was away. An old, well-thumbed translation of Plato's Dialogues was lying on the carved dresser behind him, in which he had been reading every night—instead of the Bible, he said, "It was him, Mr. Roland, that gave it to me," he continued, "and listen to what I read last night: 'Those who have committed crimes, great yet not unpardonable—they are plunged into Tar-

Phebe saw his sorrow, and would have cheered him if she could; but she, too, was sorely stricken, and she was young. She tried to set him an example of diligent work, and placed her easel beside his carving, painting as long as the gray and fleeting daylight permitted. Now and then she attempted to sing some of her old merry songs, knowing that his watchful eyes would see, the movement of her lips; but though her lips moved her face was sad, and her heart heavy. 'Sometimes too she forgot all about her, and fell into an absorbed reverie, brooding over the past, until a sob or half-articulate cry from her father aroused her. These outcries of his troubled her more than any other change in him. He had been altogether mute in the former tranquil and placid days, satisfied to talk with her in silent signs; but there was something in his mind to express now, which quiet and dumb signs could not convey. At intervals, tarus, where they go who betray their friends for money—the pains of which they undergo for a year. But at the end of the year they come forth again to a lake, over which the souls of the dead are taken to be judged. And then they lift up their voices, and call upon the souls of them they have wronged to have pity upon them, and to forgive them, and let them come out of their prison. And if they prevail they come forth, and cease from their troubles; but if not they are carried back again into Tartarus, until they obtain mercy of them whom they have wronged. But it seems as if they have to wait until they have wronged are dead themselves."

The brown crooked fingers ceased spelling out the solemn words, and Phebe lifted up her eyes from them to her father's face. She noticed for the first time how sunken and sallow it was, and how dimly and wearily his eyes looked out from under their shaggy eye-brows. She buried her face in her hands, and broke down into a passion of tears. The vivid picture her father's quotation brought before her mind filled it with horror and grief, that passed all words.

The wind was wailing round the house with a ceaseless moan of pain, in which she could almost distinguish the tones of a human voice lamenting its lost and wretched fate. The cry rose and fell, and passed on, and came back again, muttering and calling, but never dying away altogether. It sounded to her like the cry of a belated wanderer calling for help.

She rose hastily and opened the cottage door, as if she could hear Roland Sefton's voice through the darkness and the distance. But he was dead, and had been in his grave for many days already. Was she to hear that lost, forlorn cry ringing in her ears forever? Oh! if she could but have known something of him between that night when he walked beside her through the dark deserted roads, pouring out his whole sorrowful soul to her, and the hour when in the darkness again he had strayed from his path and been swallowed up of death! Was it true that he had gone down into that great gulf of secrecy and silence, without a word of comfort spoken, or a ray of light shed upon its profound mystery?

The cold wind blew in through the open door and she shut it again, going back to her low chair on the hearth. Through her blinding tears she saw her father's brown hands stretched out to her, and the withered fingers speaking eagerly.

"I shall be there before long," he said; "he will not have to wait very long for me. And if you bid me, I will forgive him at once. I cannot bear to see your tears. Tell me, must I forgive him? I will do anything, if you will look up at me again, and smile."

It was a strange smile that gleamed through Phebe's tears; but she had never heard an appeal like this from her dumb father without responding to it.

"Must I forgive him?" he asked.

"If ye forgive men their trespasses," she answered, "your heavenly Father will also forgive yours; but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive yours." It was our Lord Jesus Christ who said that; not your Socrates, father."

"It is a hard saying," he replied.

"I don't think so," she said; "it was what Jesus Christ was doing every day He lived."

From that time old Marlowe did not mention Roland Sefton again, or his sin against him.

As the dark stormy days passed on he sometimes put a touch or two to the outstretched wings of his swooping hawk, but it did not get on fast. With a pathetic clinging to Phebe he seldom let her stay long out of his sight, but followed her about like a child, or sat on the hearth watching her as she went about her household work. Only by those unconscious sobs and outcries, inaudible to himself, did he betray the grief that was gnawing at his heart. Very often did Phebe put aside her work and, standing before him, ask such questions as the following on her swiftly moving fingers.

"Don't you believe in God, our Father in heaven, the Father Almighty, who made us?"

"Yes," he would reply by a nod.

"And in Jesus Christ, His Son, our Lord, who lived, and died for us, and rose again?"

"Yes, yes," was the silent, emphatic answer.

"And yet you grieve and fret over the loss of money!" she would say, with a wistful smile on her young face.

"You are a child; you know nothing," he replied.

For without a sigh the old man was going forward consciously to meet death. Every morning when the dawn awoke him he felt weaker as he rose from his bed; every day his sight was dimmer and his hand less steady; every night the steep flight of stairs seemed steeper, and he ascended them feebly by his hands as well as feet. He could not bring himself to write upon his slate, or to spell out upon his fingers, the dread words, "I am dying;" and Phebe was not old or experienced enough to read the signs of an approaching death. That her father should be taken away from her never crossed her thoughts.

It was the vague, mournful prospect of soon leaving her alone in the wide world, that made his loss loom more largely and persistently before the dumb old man's mind. Certainly he believed all that Phebe said to him. God loved her, cared for her, ordered her life; yet he, her father, could not reconcile himself to the idea of her being left penniless and friendless in the cold and cruel world. He could have left her more peacefully in God's hands, if she had those six hundred pounds of his earnings to inherit.

The sad winter wore slowly away. Now and then the table-land around them put on its white familiar livery of snow; and old Marlowe's dim eyes gazed at it through his lattice window, recollecting the winters of long years ago, when neither snow nor storm came amiss to him. But the slight sprinkling soon melted away, and the dun-colored fog and cloudy curtain shut them in again, cutting them off from the rest of the world, as if their little dwelling was the ark, stranded on the hill's summit, amid a waste of water.

Phebe's nearest neighbor, except the farm-laborer who did an occasional day's labor for her father, was Mrs. Nixey, the tenant of a farmhouse, which lay at the head of a valley running up into the range of hills. Mrs. Nixey had given as much supervision to Phebe's motherless childhood as her father had permitted, in his jealous determination to be everything to his little daughter. Of late years, ever since old Marlowe, in the triumph of making an investment, had communicated that important fact to her on his slate, she had indulged in a day-dream of her own, which had filled her head for hours, while sitting beside her kitchen fire busily knitting long worsted stockings for her son Simon.

Simon was thirty years of age, and it was high time she found a wife for him. Who could be better than Phebe, who had grown up under her own eyes, a good, strong, industrious girl, with six hundred pounds and Upfold Farm for her fortune? As she brooded over this idea, a second thought grew out of it. How convenient it would be if she herself married the dumb old father, and retired to the little farmstead, changing places with Phebe, her daughter-in-law. She would still be near enough to come down to her son's house at harvest-time and pig-killing, and when the milk was abundant, and cheese and butter to make. And the little house on the hill was built with walls a yard thick, and well lined with good oak wainscoating; she could keep it warm for herself and the old man. The scheme had as much interest and charm for her as if she had been a peeress looking out for an eligible alliance for her son.

But it had always proved difficult to take the first steps toward so delicate a negotiation. She was not a ready writer; and even if she had been, Mrs. Nixey felt that it would be almost impossible to write her day-dream in bold and plain words upon old Marlowe's slate. If Marlowe was deaf, Phebe was singularly blind and dull. Simon Nixey had played with her when she was a child, but it had been always as a big, grown-up boy, doing man's work; and it was only of late that she had realized that he was not almost an old man. For the last year or two he had lingered at the church door to walk home with her and her father, but she had thought little of it. He was their nearest neighbor, and made himself useful in giving her father hints about his little farm, besides sparing his laborer to do them an occasional day's work. It seemed perfectly natural that he should walk home with them across the moors from their distant parish church.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

The Going Forth of the Three Unclean Spirits.
By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 31.)

The Alliance between Popery and Mohammedanism—The Strife producing Evil Spirit—Its Work in France in 1848—Its Aid to Louis Napoleon—Its Future Work in producing Dissension between France and Germany—Its Work in the Churches—The Three Frogs on the Escutcheon of France—Its Work in America—Its Goal—The Outpouring of the Seventh Vial.

THE Church of Rome will at that time be seated as ecclesiastical mistress and State Church over the Mahometan countries of Egypt, Syria, and Turkey, as well as over the rest of the ten kingdoms, she must therefore have formed an ecclesiastical confederacy between popery and Mahometanism. And this is fully confirmed by the emblem of the two-horned wild beast, representing this Papal-Mahometan hierarchy at a later stage, after the scarlet woman shall have been dismounted and despoiled by the ten kings, and stripped of her wealth and temporalities (Revelation 17:16).

Hence a strife-producing evil spirit going forth from the False Prophet, or two-horned wild beast, denotes a spirit of crusading fanaticism and propagandism from the papacy and Mahometanism. Now, it is singular that the year 1848 was the marked epoch of the outburst, not only of the first and second spirit of Spiritualism and Revolutionary Democracy, but also of this third spirit of Jesuitical crusading intrigue and conspiracy, for the Jesuit Ultramontanes were openly asserted to have fomented the revolution in France in 1848, which so suddenly overthrew Louis Philippe's monarchy. The Roman Catholic Weekly Register has said: "During Louis Philippe's reign the Catholic Church in France was in absolute bondage. The bishops were constantly snubbed, the cathedrals and churches were suffered to go to decay, and the utmost indulgence was given and the warmest friendship shown to the violent literary revilers of the Church and enemies of religion. Louis Philippe invaded the Pontifical States and seized Ancona, in order to oppose the Austrians, who had entered Italy at the Pope's desire to suppress a Carbonaro insurrection."

The Jesuits perceived that King Louis Philippe would never promote their interests, and so they encouraged the revolutionary movement of 1848, which overthrew him, and then they are asserted to have powerfully aided in securing the election of Prince Louis Napoleon as Republican President of France in December, 1848, in return for his promise to further their ends and aims. The Catholic priests led their flocks like sheep to the polls to vote for Louis Napoleon. The result of this was seen in Louis Napoleon sending French troops in 1849 to suppress the Republican revolution in Rome, which had caused the pope's flight from that city, and afterward upholding and protecting the pope in Rome by French bayonets, although nothing could be more inconsistent than for a French republic to overthrow an Italian republic, in order to restore the despotic temporal sovereignty of the pope over Rome.

One great manifestation of the Ultramontane crusading spirit we may look for in the future predestined war of Catholic France against Protestant Prussia, by which France must regain the Rhine frontier of ancient Gaul, and therefore must conquer and annex to its territory Luxemburg, part of Holland, Belgium, Rhenish Prussia, Switzerland, and also Baden, Wurtemberg, and part of Bavaria, unless the three latter are added to Austria. Reverses and defeats in any quarter will only intensify the desperate energy of Ultramontan-ism and clericalism, and make it ally itself with Communists, Socialists, or any party that will promote its ambitious schemes.

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders," By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, $1.

Jesuitical Propagandism has also gone forth since 1848 with fresh energy and strength in other forms. It has especially appeared in the Protestant Established Church of England in the extraordinary movement of many of her clergy to assimilate their teachings and ritual as nearly as possible to those of the Church of Rome, in fact to Romanize the Church of England. This movement is known as Ritualism, Tractarianism, Puseyism, or Ultra-High-Churchism. It has introduced into Protestant sanctuaries popish ceremonies and vestments; incense ascends and censers are swung where they have not been for three hundred years since the Reformation. Hymns are sung to the Virgin Mary; the Communion table is called an altar; the clergyman, a sacrificing priest; the Lord's Supper, a sacrifice, and alleged to be the veritable body and blood of Christ. Confession to the priest is enjoined, and forgiveness alleged to be conveyed by absolution, and penances are prescribed.

The Rev. Dr. Cumming has well said: Jesuitical popery grows in all soils—it is an upas tree that flourishes in all climates. It calls for repeal in Ireland, and tries to crush liberty in France—it is a democrat in America, and an autocrat in Russia—it tolerates no other faith when it has power. It whines and weeps that it is persecuted when it has lost that power. It is heard in royal cabinets and in republican congress; its hands touch the sceptre, and arrange the ballot-box. It gives tutors to the children of the great, and opens free schools for the children of the poor. It enters universities, academies, asylums—it finds access to the hospitals, and gives prescriptions from the Vatican to be blended with the prescriptions of the physician. It lives in all climes—it breathes all airs—it drinks all streams—it makes any sacrifice—it assumes any shape—sleeps or springs—its consuming and absorbing aim is dominion over soul and body—its effort is to contaminate the one and crush the other, and to make captive to itself the energies and influence of both. Its progress and ravages are recorded in every journal—its croakings are heard in every corner of the land, and the foul traces of its trail are seen wherever toleration has opened a pathway for its presence."

The Rev. B. Slight has also justly observed, "Of late years the spirit of popery has been without doubt very energetic. There has been a renewal of miracles. Nunneries and monasteries have been multiplied; the Jesuits have been revived. It does its work craftily with the higher powers, besetting statesmen with tenacious application and with a croaking cry. Its agents have insinuated themselves into the government affairs of Ireland, Canada, and other colonies; into France, and several nations of the continent of Europe. They have associated their operations with agitators, as in Ireland, and in many other places. It is doing the work of democracy; and indeed there is a union of the three spirits of Infidelity, Democracy, and Romanism, in action."

"The pope saw that the spirit of democracy was prevalent in Europe, and accordingly he allied himself with the democrats of France, and other places. The priests are remarkable for appearing to act in coincidence with any popular feeling. In several places the balance of power has been with the papist party; and they have been courted by statesmen to secure a preponderance. Governments have run a mad race for the honor of patronizing Romish bishops and priests; and France has lent the aid of its ships and influence to palm them upon the weak inhabitants of the South Sea Islands. All this has raised their hopes, and they have triumphantly boasted that all nations will soon submit to the pope. 'It is thought by many that France will be the great advocate of Romanism, and will prove the chief secular power employed by the three spirits to take the lead in gathering the kings of the earth to the war of the great day of Almighty God. It is remarkable that three frogs is the old coat of arms of France; that three each, in two divisions, were on the armorial shield of Clovis; and that three were on the banner of Clovis."

The singular heraldic fact that France's old national insignia and escutcheon, or coat of arms, were three frogs, remarkably agrees with the circumstance that of all the ten nations France is the chief seat and propagandist centre of infidelity, democracy, and ultramontane superstition which are to "gather the nations to the war of the great day of God Almighty toward Armageddon" (Rev. 16: 14).

The spirit of Romish Propagandism has also been vigorously operating in the United States and Canada during the last twenty years; it has largely increased the number of Romish ecclesiastics, churches, schools, and convents, and has predominated so as to exclude the Bible altogether from many of the public schools. In England, according to the "Roman Catholic Directory," the Romish clergy in the last ten years have increased from about 700 to 1300—nearly double; and its churches from about 700 to 900; and 100 convents have been added to those previously existing. In Ireland the Ultramontane spirit is very active, and is endeavoring to get the direction of the educational institutions in that country.

As regards the spirit of Mahometan crusading fanaticism, it went forth powerfully in India in 1857, stirring up the formidable Sepoy Mutiny, and assuredly it will go forth again in bringing to pass the predicted legislative separation of India from England; and during the expiring throes of the Turco-Mahometan empire the Sherif of Mecca will doubtless proclaim a jihad, or so-called holy war, against Giaour heretics, just as Ultramontan-ism will proclaim a holy war against Protestants.

The appropriate comparison of these three evil spirits to frogs is strikingly illustrated by their great swelling utterances, ceaseless clamor, garrulous loquacity, prolific multiplication, intrusive pertinacity, slimy contamination, and amphibious politico-ecclesiastical nature. Frogs are bred in stagnant pools, and croak chiefly in darkness; and so infidelity, in its modern forms of scientific philosophic rationalism and German neology, denying the divine inspiration and miracles of the Bible, has been justly defined by a French author, Guizot, as "a noxious spawn bred in the stagnant marshes of corrupted Christianity."

And thus the frogs of Infidelity, Spiritualism, Democratic Demagogueism and sedition, Jesuitical priestcraft, and Ritualism croak loudly and clamorously, and, like the Egyptian frogs, creep in swarms into houses, as a pestilence that walketh in darkness. They are evidently preparing the way for the predicted apostacy or falling away, and wide-spread "departure from Christian faith," out of which the latter-day Man of Sin or Personal Antichrist is to arise and reign over all nations for three and a half years (2 Thessalonians 2: 3; 1 Timothy 4: 1). And as the croaking of frogs in tropical climates is loudest at midnight, so must we expect the croaking of these frog-like spirits to wax loudest as we approach the world's hour of midnight, which, in the parable of the Ten Virgins, is placed just before the bridegroom's coming, and which is the darkest hour preceding the dawn of the unsetting Sun of Millennial Righteousness that shall soon arise with everlasting healing in his wings.

THE WAR OF ARMAGEDDON

(in Greek polemon, not battle) is the goal toward which the three unclean spirits are to gather the nations; and this, in the year-day fulfilment of the sixth vial, signifies the terrible revolutions, agitations, and politico-religious wars which will accompany the formation of the countries of Cæsar's Roman empire into the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy in its three successive forms, and which will extend, moreover, to other parts of the world.

The second advent of Christ to remove to Heaven His waiting people takes place at the end of the year-day sixth vial in accordance with His personal announcement, "Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth" (Rev. 16: 15). Then follows the year-day seventh vial which is fulfilled during the remaining final five years of this dispensation. Its being poured out into the air denotes the world-wide universality of its action. This will follow the descent of Christ into the air to take up His people to meet Him and to cast Satan out of those aerial regions, and therefore this Vial of Judgment is poured out into the air as the special seat of Satan, "the prince of the power of the air."

The outpouring of the Seventh Vial will cause "a great earthquake such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great, so that every island shall flee away and the mountains shall not be found." In the figurative year-day fulfilment, this denotes an unparalleled world-wide revolution—a violent convulsion and overwhelming demolition of all settled governments far surpassing the French Revolution of 1793, which latter is called in Rev. 11: 13, only "A great earthquake."

This tremendous revolution will take place about two years and a half after the covenant, and will give birth to the second form of the ten-kingdomed confederacy, when all the ten kingdoms become atheistic and red-republican, and permit the Church of Rome, then become socialistic and red-republican likewise, to be seated upon them in ecclesiastical supremacy as prefigured in Revelation 17, by the Scarlet Uncrowned Ten-horned Wild beast covered with blasphemous titles, and ascending from the bottomless pit, carrying the Scarlet Woman.

At present deadly hostility exists between the Radical Republicans and the Ultramontane Jesuits—the "reds" and the "Blacks" as they are termed. The Republicans believe that the Jesuit priests secretly influence the people in churches, schools, and the confessional against the republic and in favor of a monarchy. But in due time the Jesuit priests will make a compact with the republicans zealously to teach and preach communistic republican doctrines in return for their support, so that the scarlet wild beast will uphold the scarlet woman.

The above-mentioned events will be closely connected—the Coming of Christ into the air, the pouring of the Seventh Vial into the air, the casting down of Satan from the air on to the earth (Rev. 12: 7), the mighty and great earthquake or revolution, and the consequent red-republicanizing of the nations, and elevation over them of the Babylonish harlot.

OBSERVATIONS ADDED TO FOURTH EDITION IN 1880.

Since the first publication of this book in 1866, the first spirit of infidelity and Spiritualism has gone forth increasingly, and the rising flood of scepticism has registered its tide-mark high on the door of the British House of Commons by their admission of the avowed atheist, C. Bradlaugh, as member for Northampton. Yet amid multiplying signs of the predicted "falling away" (2 Thess. 2: 3) and activity on the part of Satan's hosts, there is an unwonted counter activity on the part of God's people in spreading abroad a knowledge of the Gospel. While the wicked are growing worse, the good are becoming holier and more earnest in Christian work. The aggregate income of benevolent and religious societies was never larger; the number of home and foreign missionaries, ministers, evangelists, open-air preachers, and of religious services, and the circulation of religious literature, was never greater than now.

The extraordinarily successful labors of the Rev. W. Booth's Salvation Army among the lower classes in Britain, and the great revival meetings held since 1875 by Messrs. Moody and Sankey in Britain and America, and the unprecedented works of faith and prayer carried on by such men of God as Mr. George Müller of the Bristol orphanages, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Dr. Barnardo, Mr. Grattan Guinness, and others, are a few out of many manifestations of Christian energy in these last days. Nevertheless, the Christian Church, as a whole, is slumbering and sleeping in comparison with the marvellous awakening it will experience for about two years during the period of the midnight cry before the Second Advent of Christ (Matt. 25) to translate the Wise Virgins to heaven.

(To be continued.)

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Efforts are being Made to Induce the British Government to release Mr. Parnell and the other imprisoned members of Parliament in time to attend in the House of Commons when it assembles; but it is believed that the application will be refused. Discoveries are being made continually which show that there is a widely organized plot to employ force in Ireland against the British Government. A member of the Land League recently arrested has made important disclosures, and acting on his directions a large party of police proceeded to the north side of the city of Cork, where they discovered a case buried six feet under ground, which contained a large number of Snider rifles, a quantity of dynamite, gun cotton, and ammunition. This seizure is but the beginning of more extensive captures. There have also been extensive seizures of arms and ammunition at Tralee and Clonmel. The gross total of outrages committed in Ireland in December is 574. The largest number of cases occurred in Munster. Kings county has been proclaimed.

Mr. Gladstone has Endeavored to Reassure English landowners who feared he might introduce into England an act similar to that granted to the Irish tenants. Speaking at a meeting of his own tenants on January 13th, Mr. Gladstone deprecated the idea of introducing the principle of the Land Court bill into England, but it was necessary, he said, to cheapen and facilitate the transfer of land. The reform of Parliamentary procedure, he said, was the first question Parliament would have to consider, after which there was nothing to prevent the endeavor the Government intended to make in dealing with county government.

A Gloomy Prospect for Ireland is Sketched by newspaper correspondents in that country and by philanthropists who have endeavored to allay the hostile feeling of the people toward England. The correspondent of the New York World, commenting on the failure of the Land Act to conciliate the peasantry, writes: "The main defect of the act, and one which can only be remedied by the State purchase of estates, is that it does nothing to relieve the surplus population that is trying to keep body and soul together upon patches of land which would be wholly inadequate for its support, even if they were rent free. There is the emigration clause, to be sure, but forced exile is no remedy. It is certain, however, that even if the Land Act were perfect there would be no peace. The people are, to put it mildly, opposed to all English law simply because it is English. The disease, in short, can only be cured by repeal, and repeal is out of the question. Mr. Gladstone may tinker and amend, and Lord Salisbury may do likewise, but the only measure that can allay Irish discontent is the dismemberment of the empire, and that being impossible, we must make up our minds to have the Irish problem always with us."

Mr. Francis Murphy is Holding Temperance meetings in Dundee, Scotland, and a large circus, which is estimated to hold more than 3,000 persons, is reported as crowded every evening. Between five and six thousand have put on the Blue Ribbon, many of whom never signed a temperance pledge before. The enthusiasm among all classes is immense. Daily prayer-meetings are conducted by Mr. Murphy, in the rooms of the Y.M.C.A., and special addresses are being given to ladies with the most gratifying results.

Anxiety about the Arctic Explorers of the Jeannette expedition has not been allayed by recent intelligence. The following telegram from St. Petersburg was received on January 12th: "A telegram from Irkutsk says that on December 18th, Lieutenant Danenhauer, with five sailors, had reached Yakutsk. The other six persons rescued with Engineer Meville will arrive at Yakutsk shortly. All the arrivals are comfortably lodged and supplied with all they need. As soon as they feel disposed to continue their journey to Irkutsk they will be supplied with money and all the necessities for the journey. Captain De Long and the persons with him had not been discovered up to noon on the 16th of November, the date of Lieutenant Danenhauer's departure from Bolonenga for Yakutsk. According to the reports which have reached St. Petersburg the Jeannette would appear to have been caught amid the icebergs on the 1st of October, 1879, and to have drifted at the mercy of the winds and currents for twenty-one months until June 23d, 1881, when the crew abandoned the vessel for terra firma." In explanation of the delay in receiving news it may be stated that the telegraph wires do not go further north than Irkutsk, and Engineer Melville and his comrades were last heard of at Yakutsk, eighteen hundred miles from Irkutsk.

A Political Crisis in France is Imminent. The famous Scrutin de Liste project advocated last year by M. Gambetta has been again introduced by that statesman, and he has announced his resolution to resign if it is not passed by the chambers. It is significant that in this scheme he is not supported by the Republicans, who usually vote in harmony with him. They distrust his motives in this case, and believe that if the measure is passed Gambetta will be virtually dictator of France, and will hold power dangerous to the stability of the Republic. The principal features of the bill are as follows: The election of life senators by both Chambers, voting separately, instead of by the Senate alone; instead of the senatorial delegates being chosen by the communes, one to be elected by each 500 electors. The Senate to be deprived of the power of restoring items struck from the budget by the Chamber of Deputies. The final clause of the bill provides for the discontinuance of prayers at the opening of the Legislature.

The Marquis of Lorne, Governor General of Canada, sailed from Liverpool on January 11th for Canada. His wife, the Princess Louise, accompanied him on board the vessel. On their arrival in Liverpool they were received by the Mayor, and lunched at the Town Hall, and then proceeded on board the Allan line steamer Parisian, where the Princess took leave of Lord Lorne. In replying to a toast at the luncheon Lord Lorne said that the Princess remained behind at his request until she had sufficiently recovered her health, and that she had consented to remain only under the advice of her physicians. This statement is significant in connection with certain calumnious reports circulated in the British press.

A Census Paper was Sent to the Vatican, the palace of the Pope, by the Italian Government some weeks ago, but the correspondent of the London Standard says: "The Pope declined to comply with the law requiring him to fill it up; one of his officers, however, filled up the return, showing that there are five hundred persons living in the Vatican, one-third of whom are females."

The Emperor of Germany is Apparently Determined to resist any attempt to abridge his power. On January 4th he issued a rescript countersigned by Prince Bismarck in which he said: "It is my will that in Prussia and also in the legislative bodies of the empire no doubt will be allowed to attach to my constitutional right or that of my successor to personally direct the policy of the government. It is the duty of my ministers to support my constitutional rights by protecting them from doubt and obscurity, and I expect the same from all officials who have taken the oath of loyalty to me. I am far from wishing to restrict the freedom of elections, but the functionaries intrusted with the execution of my official acts are bound to support the policy of my government, even at the elections. I shall acknowledge the discharge of this duty, and expect all officials to hold aloof from all agitation against my government."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have had another week of evangelistic labor and divine blessing in Edinburgh, Scotland. The Children's meeting, on December 24th, was one of unusual interest, the youthful congregation, acting on a suggestion previously made by Mr. Moody, having brought with them a number of Christmas gifts to be distributed among the destitute of the city. The evangelists' work among the "lapsed masses" has been crowned with manifest tokens of success. Thousands of that class assembled in the Corn Exchange, four evenings in the week. The ordinary meetings in the Free Church Assembly Hall, have also been much enriched with God's benediction. According to their previous arrangements that was to be their last week at Edinburgh, and the following week they were expected to commence their labors in the large commercial city of Glasgow, the population of which is 477,156.

One of the Egyptian Pyramids has been opened for the first time in modern days. M. Maspéro, the director of the Egyptian museums, has been greatly interested in a pyramid called the Meydoun, the entrance to which no one had been able to discover. It is situated on the borders of the Libyan Desert, and of all the pyramids is considered the most mysterious. The following account is from the Paris Journal des Debats, and was written by M. Maspéro's assistant. "The pyramid has long been the subject of curiosity, and Ibrahim Pacha even endeavored to effect a breach in its walls with artillery, in the hope of finding a treasure concealed therein. By removing some of the ground on the north side of the artificial mound which surrounds the pyramid, M. Maspéro has succeeded in uncovering all the points where an opening might be revealed, and the result has shown that his calculations were well founded. Thirteen days of active labor, with skilled workmen, have sufficed for the discovery of a secret which was believed to be undiscoverable. The spades of the fellahs have exposed to view the opening, which is situated nearly at the top of the artificial mound. On entering the pyramid the visitor passes through a corridor, admirably constructed, which takes him about forty yards in a gentle decline, as is the case in the great Gizeh Pyramid. Here, for the moment, he is stopped by the debris, which is being rapidly cleared away. M. Maspéro has already found two sacred inscriptions, in the style of the Twentieth Dynasty, giving the names of two scribes who had visited the pyramid."

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

By THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, 1882.

16th Year. No. 4.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF THE REV. J. HUDSON TAYLOR, MR. G. F. EASTON, and MR. J. CAMERON (Missionaries to China), and TWO SCENES IN THEIR HISTORY.

INGERSOLL FURTHER ANSWERED. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday morning.

SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story by Henry Martin author of "Felicia Cuffe" (Continued).

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter.

CURRENT EVENTS: Debates in Congress—Secretary Kirkwood's Indian Scheme—The Cause of the Railroad Disaster—The Assassin's Address to the Jury—Where a Mayor-elect Was Found—College Student in a Laundry—A Pirate's Haunt Demolished—A Lad Killed on Her Way to a Ball etc. PICTURE OF POETS' CORNER IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

SARAH AND HER DAUGHTERS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

How Mrs. Milner Spent Christmas-Day (Illustrated). PICTURE OF A MARTYRDOM IN MADAGASCAR.

Christ and His Disciples. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. Baxter. COBWEBS AND CABLES. By Hesba Stretton (Con).

FOREIGN TOPICS: The English Newspapers on American Diplomacy—A Defection in Mr. Gladstone's Followers—A Great Slav Rising etc.

MR. G. F. EASTON.

THE REV. J. HUDSON TAYLOR, M.R.C.S.

MR. JAMES CAMERON

THE CHINESE FORTUNE TELLER BURNING HIS BOOKS.

MR. CAMERON AND HIS PARTY SNOWED UP.

PORTRAITS AND SCENES CONNECTED WITH THE CHINA INLAND MISSION.

THE REV. J. HUDSON TAYLOR, Founder of the China Inland Mission.

Birth in 1832—Conversion—Early Interest in China—Dangers Encountered on His Travels—Returns to England—Founds China Inland Mission—Serious Illness and Manifold Labors.

THE operations of the China Inland Mission have become so important and so interesting that, although a portrait and life of its founder appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 22d, 1879, no apology is needed for the re-introduction of a subject presenting so many claims upon public attention, and forming an eminently noteworthy and memorable chapter in the annals of Christian enterprise.

Mr. Taylor was born at Barnsley, Yorkshire, England, in the year 1832. He was consecrated by his Christian parents to God from his birth, and at a very early age it was evident that a work of grace was begun in his heart. When but a boy the needs and claims of China took hold of his mind, and appear never to have wholly left him. Youthful studies and amusements, however, for a time occupied his attention, and the affairs of his soul were neglected.

At the age of fifteen, by God's mercy he regained a sense of the Divine favor, and the spiritual need of China powerfully affected him, and from that time he began to direct his attention and studies to the subjects which would best fit him for missionary work in that vast empire. So decided was he upon going to China, that he said he would go if he had to work his passage out as a common sailor. He gained some knowledge of medicine in the store of his father, who was a chemist and druggist, and afterward continued medical studies in Hull and London, during which time he also availed himself of opportunities for Christian work.

In September, 1853, he sailed for China as a missionary in connection with the Chinese Evangelization Society. After three or four years' residence in China, he was led by a combination of circumstances to resign his connection with this society and to pursue that life of faith in God for temporal supplies which he has since continued.

In 1858 he was married at Ningpo to a lady of remarkable devotedness to mission work, and of uncommon mental ability, Maria Jane, second daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Dyer, of the London Missionary Society.

A PERILOUS JOURNEY IN CHINA.

Most interesting details of his mission work during these early years in China are given in his pamphlet on "China; its Spiritual Needs and Claims."

In April, 1855, in company with the Rev. J. S. Burdon, of the Church Missionary Society, now Bishop Burdon, he visited the island of Tsung-ming, and the north bank of the Yang-tse-Kiang, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel and distributing copies of the New Testament. As narrated in that pamphlet, they both narrowly escaped with their lives, being arrested by the Chinese police and followed by a howling mob, and at last only released through the friendliness of a Mandarin. But this was only one of many perils encountered by Mr. Taylor.

HIS RETURN TO ENGLAND.

In 1860, broken down in health by incessant labors, he was compelled to return to England. But though unable to continue active labor in the field, his heart was in the work and he could not be idle. He was oppressed by the spiritual destitution of China, which at that time had not one missionary to three millions of its people. He was anxious for more laborers to go out, and the following extract from a letter written in January, 1860, when read in the light of subsequent experiences, shows the intensity of his devotion and the spirit which has guided his subsequent efforts. He wrote to a friend in England thus:

"Do you know of any earnest, devoted young men, desirous of serving the Lord in China, who, not wishing for more than their expenses, would be willing to come out and labor here? Oh, for four or five such helpers! They would probably preach in Chinese in six months. In answer to prayer the means would be found."

"Throughout our voyage," he says, in the pamphlet already referred to, "our earnest prayer to God was that He would overrule our return to England for good to China, and make it instrumental in raising up at least five helpers to labor in Ning-po and the province of Cheh Kiang."

These simple extracts reveal to us

THE ORIGIN OF THE MISSION,

though indeed it was not formally inaugurated till 1865. What was the result of these prayers? Several young men offered and were sent out. Let Mr. Taylor tell the story of what followed in his own words:

"Coming home to England, with little hope of ever returning—being told that it was improbable that I should ever be able to return there—I was occupied for some time in the preparation of an edition of the New Testament for the British and Foreign Bible Society in the vernacular of that part of China in which I have latterly labored—Ningpo. And while engaged in that work, spending day after day with a beloved and honored friend of the Church Missionary Society in the work of revision and translation, the Lord laid more heavily upon my heart than ever before the need of the whole Chinese empire.

"At the end of the year 1864 and the beginning of 1865 I found that there were only 97 missionaries in China. There had been as many as 115, but they had gone down to 97; and surely there could be no question that there was a needs-be for some further effort on behalf of China. I found that in eleven of the eighteen provinces there was not a single Protestant missionary; and I felt that, without interfering with the work of those existing agencies which God was then and is still largely blessing, there was abundant room for additional effort; and not only abundant room, but a loud call for it.

"And recognizing that God means what He says—that He loves to hear and answer prayer—I was led, after a good deal of prayerful conference with some friends interested in China, to sketch out the plan of the China Inland Mission, and to attempt its formation, and not without success.

"There was a little difficulty attending it. I was very anxious that what we did should not appear for a moment to conflict with the work of any of the older societies, and still more that it should not actually divert any help of any kind from channels already existing, because that would have been no gain to China or to the cause of God; but that we should have such a method of working given to us as should draw out fresh laborers, who probably would not otherwise go, and should open fresh channels of pecuniary aid which otherwise, perhaps, would not be touched.

"After a good deal of thought and prayer, I was led, in addresses on China, to lay its needs before the hearts of God's children as I was able, in England and Scotland and Ireland, and to make it known that I should be glad to enter into correspondence with any persons who felt desirous to go out to labor in an Evangelical and in China, and who were prepared to go out without guaranteed support. For having no single denomination at our back, and being anxious not to interfere with existing channels of communication, I felt it best just to leave one's self open to receive such remittances through the mails as God might lay on the hearts of His children to send; in this way interfering with no collections made in places of worship, nor with any collections made in other ways.

UNDENOMINATIONAL MISSION

"Well, forty or fifty persons entered into correspondence with us, and fifteen or sixteen were selected and came up to London from various parts of Great Britain, and had a short period of preliminary testing—testing rather than training—training in some measure, but rather testing than training. In the May of 1866 we found ourselves in this position, that we had full confidence that here were men and women who desired to go and live and labor for God, leaning on Him for grace and strength and support, and prepared to trust to Him indeed, in whatever circumstances they might find themselves.

"But, of course, their going out involved a considerable outlay. There were matters of outfits and passage-money to be met, and we saw that not less than a sum equivalent to ten thousand dollars would be needed to launch the mission." Mr. Taylor then tells how, in answer to prayer, the whole of that sum was received without appeals for money, and before the paper, stating that so many persons were ready to go, which he had prepared, was received from the printer.

The work from this time rapidly increased. Men and women impressed with the need of China; of the vast opportunities offered there for earnest work in the service of the Master, offered themselves to Mr. Taylor as missionaries. People who heard of the work and who could not go themselves gave money, and so at intervals various parties of missionaries were despatched. It was remarkable that in every case no sooner was a company prepared by education and training for work and ready to embark than without direct appeal for funds God provided a sufficient sum to pay their expenses out.

During all this time Mr. Taylor was laboring at home for China, and though unable to witness the work performed, his heart was gladdened by the reports sent home by those who had gone out under his direction. But in 1878 the desire to see with his own eyes the work going forward filled his heart, and after making it the subject of prayer he determined at the risk of his health and life on

ANOTHER VISIT TO CHINA.

He started early in 1879, but no sooner had he landed than he was prostrated by a prolonged and painful illness. Through the mercy of God he ultimately rallied, and has been enabled to render invaluable service in the supervision of the work of the mission, and in the encouragement of laborers beset with difficulties. His devoted and gifted wife has just returned to England, and is the bearer of cheering tidings respecting the great work in which her husband is engaged.

CONVERSION OF A CHINESE FORTUNE-TELLER.

(See Illustration on Frontispiece).

Among many interesting cases of conversion in the records of his missionary labor is that of Ah Sing, the native preacher at Shing-hien. He had been an astrologer and fortune-teller, and held a conspicuous position in the city temple of that place, where he daily plied his art. He had purchased a copy of St. Luke's Gospel from a colporteur, but the cares and anxieties of life choked whatever good impressions he received from it. At last he was instructed by Mr. Yen, a native helper, in charge of the gospel hall at Shing-hien, that in order to understand the Scriptures aright he must pray to be enlightened by the Holy Spirit. He did so, and soon began to have some sense of the divine meaning of Luke 15.

With increasing light he saw that his profession was unlawful, and that he was, in fact, fast in the snare of the devil. Resolving to tamper with evil no longer, he pulled down his sign, made a fire, and burned his books. He was now consciously washed from his pollutions and made a new man in Christ. He immediately followed Mr. Yen, preaching the doctrine of the Cross. "Some fancied," he says, "that I had grown suddenly richer by preaching Jesus than by telling fortunes, and so had given it up. Some friends tried to provoke me and to induce me to make good speed to quit that way. Some grossly slandered me and tried to frighten me, and some threatened to take my life and stamp the Gospel of Jesus out of Shing-hien city. The adversaries were very much divided in opinions and guesses about me, but by God's grace I was enabled boldly to preach Jesus, the Lord. I was not afraid of their faces, and I held fast to the peace which I was unwilling to lose."

MR. G. F. EASTON.

MR. G. F. EASTON, whose portrait on our frontispiece represents him in his Chinese costume, is one of the missionaries sent out under the auspices of the China Inland Mission. It may be here remarked that Mr. Taylor, recognizing the objection the Chinese entertain for foreigners, makes the stipulation with all who offer themselves for the work of the mission, both men and women, that

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1882.

16th Year. No. 5.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS OF THREE EMINENT CHRISTIAN JUDGES, with Sketches of their Lives.
THIRD REPLY TO MR. INGERSOLL. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday morning.
SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story by Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Cuffs" (Continued).
Christ's Foes and Friends. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter—Lina's Mite.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Cont'd).
CURRENT EVENTS: Anti-Polygamy Legislation in the Senate—The House of Representatives and Re-apportionment—An Unbroken Wall of Rum—Munificence of a Baltimore Bank President—Touching Story of a San Francisco Child—A Novel Account—Book Eaten—A Scheme to Evade a License, etc.
PICTURE OF JOHN BUNYAN PREACHING IN THE OPEN AIR.

MEN WITHOUT HEART, SIGHT, OR HEARING. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
WALTER BURN'S STEADFASTNESS. (With Illustration.)
COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).
FOREIGN TOPICS: British Political Movements—Gambetta's Resignation—The Russian Jews—A Newspaper Scrap—Mr. Gladstone at the Tabernacle.

THE LATE LORD HATHERLEY.

LORD SELBORNE.

THE LATE JUSTICE LUSH.

THREE CHRISTIAN JUDGES:—Lord Selborne and His Bible Class—Justice Lush Addressing a Prisoner Convicted of Murder in the First Degree.

THREE EMINENT CHRISTIAN JUDGES.

It has long been the fashion to speak of members of the legal profession as irreligious men. There have been many unprincipled wicked lawyers, as there have been bad men in other professions; but in no other case has public opinion been so ready to condemn a whole class on account of the wrong-doing of a few, as it has in the case of the legal profession. Few people know how many conscientious, upright lawyers there are, so well as those who have had much to do with them. In every country there are men who have made the law their study, who have led consistent Christian lives and have scrupulously abstained, even under fierce temptation, from wrong-doing, even when such abstinence involved loss of money and reputation.

We hope that we may in some measure assist in correcting the prevalent misapprehension by publishing the portraits and lives of three English lawyers. One of them was a most distinguished and philanthropic Christian gentleman, highly honored by his colleagues, and justly held in high esteem in the Christian community, and the other two, while active Sunday-school teachers and energetic workers for Christ, yet were honored by having confided to their charge the highest judicial office in Great Britain—that of Lord High Chancellor.

Their portraits appear on our frontispiece in the horsehair wigs, which, according to ancient custom, the English judges still wear when sitting in court. It is only necessary to add in explanation that in England judges are not elected. When a vacancy on the bench occurs, the Cabinet select from among the barristers one whom it appoints to the vacant place. The judge so appointed receives $25,000 a year salary and holds his position for life. With the Lord High Chancellor the arrangement is different. He is ex-officio a member of the Cabinet, and it is necessary that he should belong to the same political party as the one in office. He receives $50,000 a year salary, and when his colleagues in the administration resign he resigns too. The Lord High Chancellor must be a member of the House of Lords, and therefore when he is appointed he is at the same time made a peer. When he resigns he retains his seat in the House of Lords and receives for life a pension of $25,000 a year; in return for which he is expected to sit with other ex-Chancellors and adjudicate in cases sent to the House of Lords, which is the ultimate court of appeal in Great Britain.

THE RT. HON. LORD SELBORNE.

Lord High Chancellor of England.

His Birth at Mixbury Rectory in 1812—Obtains a Scholarship at Oxford in 1830—Graduates as "a First Class" in 1834—Becomes a Barrister in 1837 and a Q.C. in 1849—His Marriage in 1848—Elected as Liberal-Conservative Member for Plymouth in 1847—Knighthood in 1861, and made Solicitor-General—Becomes Attorney-General in 1863—Poetry of Selborne—His Efforts at Law Reform—The Geneva Arbitration—His "Notes on the Liturgy" and "Book of Praise."

LORD SELBORNE, the present Lord High Chancellor of England, whose portrait we present this week, as a companion picture to those of the late Lord Justice Lush and Lord Hatherley, is a man of pre-eminent mental acquisitions and sterling moral worth.

The noble lord is the second son of the late Rev. William Jocelyn Palmer, who for many years was rector of the small rural parish of Mixbury, Oxfordshire. It was as Roundell Palmer that he fought his earliest and severest battles, and gained his greatest laurels. He is now in the full maturity of his ripened powers and varied experience, having been born on the 27th of November, 1812, at Mixbury Rectory, and is consequently in his sixty-ninth year.

After study at Rugby and Winchester Schools, he gained, in the year 1830, when only seventeen years of age, an open scholarship at Trinity College, Oxford. But this was only the early dawn which heralded the brilliant day. Prize after prize was won, and in the Easter Term of 1834 he graduated as a "first-class" in classics. Among his trophies up to this point were the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse in 1831; the Newdigate prize for English verse in 1832; and the prize for the best Latin essay in 1835. He secured the Eldon Law Scholarship in 1834, and in the same year was elected to a Fellowship at Magdalene College, Oxford. In 1837 he graduated Master of Arts, with distinction, and on the 9th of June in the same year was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn, London.

The Chancery Bar being determined upon as the theatre for the exercise of his talents, his career was rapid and distinguished, and in April, 1849, he was created a Queen's Counsel, and elected a Bencher of his Inn. In 1848 he married Lady Laura, the second daughter of the Earl of Waldegrave, and in her companionship has enjoyed the rich fruits of domestic felicity.

Parliamentary life now began to exercise its natural attractions upon his sanguine mind, and at the general election of July, 1847, he was returned as Member for Plymouth, in company with Viscount Ebrington. His political programme was that of a Liberal Conservative. He was favorable to free trade, but friendly also to the restrictive navigation laws, and was conscientiously opposed to the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy. He continued to represent Plymouth until July, 1852, when he was beaten by his opponent, and lost his seat. In June, 1853, he regained it, and retained it until March, 1857, when he did not re-offer himself as a candidate.

In 1861 Mr. Palmer received the honor of knighthood. In July of the same year, though without a parliamentary status, he was appointed, successor to Sir W. Atherton, as Solicitor-General, in Lord Palmerston's administration. He was almost immediately elected M. P., for Richmond, a borough in which the Earl of Zetland's paramount influence secured his return. In October, 1863, on the death of Sir W. Atherton, he became Attorney-General. When in 1868 the Liberal party again acceded to office, under the leadership of the present Premier (Mr. Gladstone), he was offered the Lord Chancellorship, but he knew that Mr. Gladstone had pledged himself to disendow and disestablish the Irish Church, and he regarded such a proposal as sacrilegious spoliation, and though the prize offered him is the summit of an English lawyer's ambition, he preferred to obey his conscience, and declined the honor. He continued, however, to be an independent supporter of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet on some of the public questions of the time.

In consequence of this difference of opinion Mr. Gladstone conferred the Lord Chancellorship on Sir William Page Wood (subsequently Lord Hatherley), instead of Sir Roundell Palmer, who, however, succeeded to the office when Lord Hatherley retired owing to a failure of sight. It was upon this occasion that he was raised to the peerage and received the name of Baron Selborne, of Selborne, in the County of Hants. In 1874 he necessarily vacated the Woolsack upon the displacement of the Liberal Government by the Conservative. Lord Selborne has proved himself to be the very genius of law reform, and in that respect has rendered services of very high value.

In the Geneva Arbitration between England and America, regarding the claims by the latter for compensation for the ravages committed upon the high seas by the Alabama, which was constructed by Mr. Laird, of Birkenhead, for the Southern Confederacy, he acted as counsel for the British Government.

His labors have not been confined to mere official routine. He has gone through a considerable amount of work as a public man, more especially in his efforts, hitherto unsuccessful, to establish a "Legal University," which shall be an examining body, exclusively for law students, and for the conferring of Legal Degrees. After Lord Selborne was elected Lord Rector of St. Andrew's University in 1877, he gave to the world in the following year his thoughts in a book, entitled "Notes on some Passages in the Liturgical History of the Reformed English Church." This work indicates his strong attachment to the Established Church.

In 1862 he edited, with taste and judgment,

"The Book of Praise," which contains some of the finest hymns in the language, and fittingly followed his previous works on "The Connection of Poetry with History," and "English Church Hymnody."

Like the late Lord Hatherley, Lord Selborne has long been distinguished by his deep and practical interest in Sunday-schools. Not only has he aided them by wise counsels and able addresses, but even in the busiest portions of his distinguished career has been himself an indefatigable and exemplary Sunday-school teacher. In one of the illustrations of our frontispiece he is represented acting in that capacity, surrounded by his class. His lordship has recently passed through a painful and prolonged illness, but is now reported to be convalescent.

THE LATE RIGHT HONORABLE LORD JUSTICE LUSH.

Birth in 1807—Marriage in 1839—Called to the Bar in 1840—Made Q.C. in 1857—Queen's Bench Judge in 1865—His Great Popularity—A Member and Elder of Dr. Landels' Church—Kindness to Ministers—Missionary Zeal—A Memorable Scene—His Last Words—His Funeral Sermon and Interment.

AMONG the English worthies called to their rest and reward during last year, one of the best and noblest was the distinguished judge, whose removal has so recently cast a gloom over the extensive circle to which he was known.

Lord Justice Lush was born October 25th, 1807, and died on Tuesday, December 27th, 1881. He was the son of Robert Lush, Esq., of Shaftesbury, England. He received his early education in his native place, and having spent some time in preparing to enter the legal profession he was called to the Bar in 1840. In the previous year he had married Elizabeth Ann, the daughter of the Rev. C. Wollacott, of London, a well-known Baptist minister. He practised with considerable success, his power as a special pleader being recognized by the profession generally. He was not only a fluent but an able speaker; and sound knowledge of law was always the basis of his most eloquent appeals. The books that he has published are deemed of great value by the legal profession, and are frequently referred to as authorities on the subjects of which they treat.

In 1857 he was made Queen's Counsel, and having subsequently become Serjeant-at-Law, he was, in 1865, appointed Puisne Judge of the Queens Bench at a salary of $25,000 per annum. On this occasion he had the distinction of knighthood bestowed on him. He was one of the three judges before whom the Tichborne "claimant" was tried in 1873, the late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Justice Mellor being the other two.

He was in 1880 elevated to the Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court of Judicature next to the House of Lords, and the satisfaction with which the appointment was regarded was as widespread as it was unalloyed.

Among the qualities which led to Lord Justice Lush's elevation and popularity, the one which underlay all the others, was the thorough and conscientious manner in which he ever did the work which came to his hand. He had the reputation of having been diligent, painstaking, conscientious, and thorough during his career as a student as well as at the Bar, and on the Bench. His clients often tell how completely he made himself acquainted with the details of the cases intrusted to him; and when he was in the full swing of his practice at the bar, to do this must have involved an amount of attention and labor of which few are capable. "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men."

Such are the leading facts in the professional history of Sir Robert Lush, but for many years his religious history bore witness to the truth that while a man may be diligent in business he can be fervent in spirit, and bear his part in the varied work of the Christian Church. He was, for some years a member of the Baptist Church, Regent's Park, London, under the pastoral care of Dr. Landels, and he continued his connection with that dition to this, Sylph was gone from the city; but whither Doctor Bolus could not say, only he had heard to some relatives of Doctor Gilbert's in Ireland.

Thither Miles immediately went, determined to trace Sylph if possible.

(To be continued.)

CHRIST'S FOES AND FRIENDS.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 12, Mark 3 : 20-35. Golden Text, Matt. 12: 30. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN relation to Christ, neutrality is impossible. A man may maintain a position of utter indifference with regard to a stranger of whom he knows nothing; but it is otherwise with regard to his own father, his own wife, his own child. A man who is not for his own wife is unfaithful to her; a father who is not for his own child is an unnatural father, a child who is not for his own parents has no sense of his filial responsibilities. And a sinner who is not for the Saviour who died for him, who was made sin for him, who was even made a curse for him, is not maintaining neutral ground, he is altogether against Him. "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad." Hence we see that if we are not so actively with Jesus as to gather with Him, we are absolutely scattering from Him.

WHAT DID JESUS GATHER

when on earth? Riches? When a question arose about the tribute money and He sought to teach a lesson from the image and superscription which it bore, He had to ask for somebody else's penny, for He had not one of His own. Did He seek after honor? Listen to Him: "I receive not honor from men" (John 5 : 41). Look at Him; they seek Him by force to make Him a king, what does He do? He departs again "into a mountain Himself alone" (John 6 : 15). Did He seek houses? "The Son of man hath not where to lay His head" (Luke 9 : 58). What then did He seek? Precious immortal, but lost souls; and he that gathereth not souls with Him is an active agent of the enemy in scattering souls away from Him. O it is not enough to be with the doctrines of grace, to be with a Christian church. He that is not with Him in person, with Him in spirit, with Him in word, with Him in action, with Him in business, with Him in family life, with Him everywhere—scattereth souls from Jesus. Converted people if they are not out and out for God, do more to drive away souls from Christ than any of the ungodly do.

Reader, are you a child of God, and are you with Jesus to the extent of accepting His forgiveness for your past sins? have you made use of Him to obtain your soul's salvation, and are you nevertheless living for yourself, carrying out your own plans, doing your own will, consulting your tastes as though you were your own property, and as though He had never bought you for His own? Then whatever may be your doctrine, your life is against Him. He died for us "that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him that died for them, and rose again." "If any man will come after me," He says, "let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me" (Matt. 16 : 24). To be with Him is to deny every claim of self; in fact to have to resign ourselves away with every member of our body, every detail of our business, every movement of our will, and to believe, until it becomes a conscious experience, that He has accepted, and is in possession of the self which we have renounced. Thus, and thus only, can we be filled with the Holy Ghost, become His agent, and gather, both consciously and unconsciously, with Jesus.

NO SELF BUT JESUS;

There is a gathering with Jesus by testifying of Him: "When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand;" "They overcame him by . . . the word of their testimony" (Ez. 3 : 18; Rev. 12 : 11). It is a terrible thing to bear no witness for Christ, but it is even more terrible to be like Lot, who was "as one that mocked unto his sons in law" (Gen. 19 : 14). The unhappy man had no holy life, no witness of unworldliness and unselfishness to back up his words, and thus they fell powerless. When the seven sons of Sceva "took upon them to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure you by Jesus, whom Paul preacheth, . . . the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, and overcame them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded" (Acts 19 : 13-16). The Spirit of God would not witness to the name of Jesus on such lips; these were not with Jesus, and therefore could only scatter from Him. It is an awful fact that every living man is actively engaged in furthering either the salvation or the damnation of immortal souls.

Our subject treats of the friends and the foes of Jesus; we read, "The multitude cometh together again, so that they could not so much as eat bread. And when His friends (or kinsmen) heard of it, they went out to lay hold on Him: for they said, He is beside Himself." O how many of their friends think God's children are mad when they let God's work take the first place in their lives, and give business, health, food, clothing and social status a secondary place! How little Jesus was understood, how little those are understood who follow Him now: "the world knoweth us not because it knew Him not" (1 John 3 : 1). A young man is told not to carry his fanatical ideas so far as to injure his business prospects. A young lady is warned that if she seeks first the kingdom of God and His righteousness in her whole life and conversation, her prospects of being well settled in life are ruined: so little do men in general believe in the reality of things eternal that all is sacrificed by them for the seeming advantages of things present. And they who profess to be our friends say to us, like Peter to the Lord, "Pity Thyself" (Matt. 16 : 22, margin), are often the worst enemies of those who set out to "follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth" (Rev. 14 : 4).

THE ENEMIES OF JESUS,

the scribes which came down from Jerusalem went yet farther and said, "He hath Beelzebub, and by the prince of the devils casteth He out devils." The representatives of the religion of the day were always among the Lord's greatest foes. Possessing, as they did, a form of godliness but denying the power thereof; drawing nigh to God with their lips while their hearts were far from Him, the might of Christ's words and works revealed what an empty sham their religion was, and they saw before them only one of two alternatives: either they must acknowledge and abandon their unreality, and become disciples of the despised Nazarene, or they must establish proofs of His imposture, and put down the movement. They chose the latter. It is even so in our own day; in all denominations there are a number whose whole life seems to be an attempt to serve God and mammon; and these are they who are the bitterest enemies of those who live in the power of God; they hate the reality which shows up their unreality, they hold up their hands in horror at the idea of any man saying that God has given him a clean heart, they "compass sea and land" to prove some unholy thing against those who witness for God's holiness in His people, try to disprove cases of healing where the hand of the Lord alone has been at work, or try to hinder those who have been healed from telling that which the Lord has done for them; such are acting in the spirit of Christ's enemies.

The Lord Jesus was above any personal feeling, there was none of the smallness of self-justification about Him. He entered upon the subject as though it had been altogether apart from, and outside Himself. He said, "How can Satan cast out Satan?" and went on to prove that a kingdom or a house divided against itself cannot stand. "And if Satan rise up against himself, and be divided, he cannot stand, but hath an end." He showed them how foolish and untenable were their arguments, without anything of strife or debate in His own spirit. How small they must have felt when this Man, who stood alone in His mighty power over the souls and bodies of men, who read, as they had proved, their very thoughts, could afford to reason with them quietly as One utterly untouched by personal pique, even when they accused Him of being in league with the devil, so little did He esteem the opinion of men.

But He applied His argument to them, "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out? therefore shall they be your judges. But if I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you" (Luke 11 : 19, 20). There were exorcists among the Jews, as we see in the case of the sons of Sceva; if Christ cast out devils by Beelzebub, it was the strongest proof possible that the Jewish exorcists were doing the same; if He was using supernatural power which was of God, they, the scribes, were brought face to face with the kingdom of God, and were rejecting it; they could not get away from the responsibility. He added, "When a strong man armed (i.e., Satan) keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace; but when a stronger than he (i.e., Jesus) shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armor wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils" (Luke 11 : 21, 22). The only real method of expelling Satan is to let the blessed Master come in.

Our Lord then uttered those words which the enemy has made the means of troubling many souls, "All sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies whithersoever they shall blaspheme: but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation; because they said He hath an unclean spirit." From these last words it is clear that the sin against the Holy Ghost is to speak of the work of God's anointed, anointed with the Holy Ghost, as though that anointing were possession of the devil.

Again the kinsmen of the Lord Jesus stood without, calling Him; the multitude told Him they were there. But Jesus had another, a nearer, an eternal kindred; and He answered them, "Who is my mother, or my brethren? And He looked round about on them which sat about Him, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother." The world's consists in men doing their own will, "fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (Eph. 2 : 3). God's family likeness consists in men living with a self denied, a will renounced, their centre out of themselves in God. "He that doeth the will of God abideth for ever" (1 John 2 : 17). The principle of self is corrupt; all which it touches tends to ruin; it decays friendships, it destroys love, it pollutes truth, it spreads a blighting influence wherever it is. Christ in us, His nature, which seeks not its own, which denies itself, which "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things" is just the contrary. It establishes truth, brings love with it, renders friendships immortal, because it is the very divine nature of which we are made partakers if we escape the corruption which is in the world through lust (2 Pet. 1 : 4). But let us not deceive ourselves; it is not simply the acceptance of Christ as our Saviour which makes Him claim relationship with us, it is not the possession of much knowledge of God, but the doing of His will.

FAMILY LIKENESS

A Juvenile Temperance Union in Japan

under Mrs. A. Viele is composed of both girls and boys, who wear as badges little five-pointed stars very neatly covered with blue canton crape. In a letter to Miss Colman, of the Our Union office, New York, Mrs. Viele sends specimens, and suggests that similar ones be adopted by the boys and girls of our temperance unions. Any one can make them by cutting a five-pointed star out of cardboard a little over two inches in diameter. Cover this with soft blue silk, paste a white paper lining on the wrong side and insert a little loop of narrow blue ribbon, to pin it on by, in one of the interior angles between the lining and the pasteboard. Our contemporary says that in these "high art" days it is quite the thing to take our fashions from Japan.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Bill for the Suppression of Polygamy in Utah was agreed upon by the Senate Judiciary Committee on January 23d. It embodies the main features of the plans advocated respectively by Senator Edmunds and Senator Logan. It provides for the more expeditious conviction of polygamists by making the fact of bigamous relations sufficient evidence of a violation of the statute against polygamy, and thus relieves the prosecution of the necessity of producing proof of the marriages. Hitherto, owing to the secrecy in which these ceremonies have been performed, actual proof of guilt has been difficult to obtain, and many criminals have in consequence escaped conviction. The bill also provides for the exclusion of polygamists from juries, and debars them from the privileges of voting and holding office. Should such a bill become law it will arm the executive with sufficient power to deal effectively with the shameful sin, and the responsibility for the continuance of the scandal will rest with the government.

Still Another Investigation of Financial scandal is reported from Washington. Certain members of the Senate Military Committee are engaged in an examination of the affairs of the Soldiers' Home. Among the allegations made against the Board are the following: That certain officers of the army have received regular supplies of vegetables, milk, etc., from the Home without paying therefor; that portions of the funds of the institution have been invested in securities which yield no income and are virtually worthless; that through extravagance or mismanagement, or both, the income of the Home has been inadequate to its maintenance, and that the managers have been obliged to pledge a large amount of the securities belonging to it in order to procure funds to meet current expenses; and charges of a personal character against a relative of the President of the Board of Commissioners. As an instance of extravagance, it is alleged that to cultivate forty acres of ground during the last season there were employed a farmer, an assistant farmer, and a number of laborers, who absorbed in wages over three hundred dollars per month.

The Question of Apportionment is now squarely before the House. On Friday the House Committee on the Census directed its chairman to report the McCoid bill in its amended form to the House. This bill gives the House 320 members, which would make the ratio of representation 154,285. As the bill now stands one extra member would be given to each of the following States: Arkansas, California, Georgia, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Carolina, Virginia and West Virginia. Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, and Pennsylvania gain two members each; Kansas gains three members; Texas gains four members; Florida, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Vermont lose one member each. This calculation is based on the supposition that the old system of apportionment will be adopted. Under that system a division of the populations of the States by the number 154,285 would result in the assignment of 302 members. One member each would be then assigned to Delaware and Nevada, neither of which have sufficient population to secure them a representative. There would then be sixteen representatives still to be assigned according to the largest remainders. A new system for apportioning the sixteen members has, however, been devised by Colonel C. W. Seaton, the Superintendent of the Census, which it is expected will supersede the old method and avoid some glaring anomalies that system is liable to produce.

The Publication Recently of a Private Despatch sent last March by the editor of a New York journal for communication to President Garfield has caused a sensation in the Republican Party, and has widened the breach between the Stalwarts and the Half Breeds. Mr. Whitelaw Reid, the writer of the despatch, urged the President to remain firm on the question of the Robertson nomination, and informed him that Democratic Senators could be secured "to offset Conkling." He also advised the President to be on his guard against Mr. James's soft insinuating way, and recommended "stern sharp admonition," to be administered to the Postmaster-General to "bring him to his bearings." He also said, "Whenever pressure on Platt or James is wanted, let us know." It is plain that President Garfield's short term of office could not have been a happy one, and that between the stalwarts on the one hand, and the half breeds on the other, he must have had some difficulty in determining his proper course.

The Verdict of the Coroner's Jury in the case of the Spuyten Duyvil disaster rendered January 25th, censures the brakeman, the conductor, and the two enginemen of the Chicago train; the engineman of the Tarrytown express; and the superintendent, officers, and managers of the Hudson River Railway Company. To these seven findings the jury added the following emphatic expression of opinion: "The jury further find that each and every one of the persons named is responsible in his own individuality, no one sharing the responsibility with another. And, as a further expression of their opinion, the jury affirm that, with the experience of fifty years of railroad management, and with the appliances in general use for the prevention of like disasters, there appears to be no palliation whatever for the criminal carelessness and disregard for human life exhibited by the employés of the company. The conduct of these employés removed this calamity from the chapter of accidents, making the result of destructive agencies at work as much a certainty as the discharge of a piece of artillery. The only surprise is that the slaughter was not greater. It could not well have been less." The jury also condemned the system of giving free railroad passes during the session of the Legislature. To the surprise of the public, the jury made no remark as to the conduct of the idiotic joker who applied the brake to the Chicago train.

The Conclusion of the Trial of the Assassin of President Garfield will render last week one long memorable in our national history. The unanimous verdict of the jury rendered on the evening of Wednesday, January 26th, commands the general approval of the country. Judge Porter commenced his speech to the jury on Monday, January 23d, and concluded it on Wednesday amid the abusive interruptions of the prisoner. Then Justice Cox delivered a charge strictly impartial and lucid, and at 4.40 P.M. the jury retired to consider their verdict. In half an hour they had decided, and on the court reassembling they pronounced the prisoner guilty as indicted. A bill of exceptions has been filed by Mr. Scoville which may have the effect of delaying the execution until after July, but it can scarcely be expected to reverse the verdict of the jury. Thus, exasperating as was the crime, the criminal has had a fair trial. The forms of law have all been complied with, unusual liberty has been accorded to the prisoner, and his counsel have been heard in his defence. This mode of procedure has brought upon us the animadversion of ignorant foreign critics, who would have been still more ready to blame had the course of justice been more summary; but it has served a noble purpose. It has proved that even a criminal so universally abhorred as Guiteau is, and a crime that bowed the nation in sorrow so poignant as did the suffering and death of President Garfield, could not overcome the national respect for the majesty of the law. If there has been any deviation from the ordinary methods, it has been in favor of the prisoner, and the patience with which he has been allowed to urge in his own defence and in his own despicable manner every plea he could devise, shows that passion and vindictiveness have not the hold over the American people they are popularly believed to have.

The Statistics of Immigration for the Past year are unprecedented in the history of the United States. The figures for New York alone are as follows: 188,255 immigrants from Germany, 62,406 from Ireland, 36,552 from England, 35,335 from Sweden, 13,895 from Norway, 13,208 from Italy, 11,068 from Switzerland, 10,507 from Scotland, 9226 from Bohemia, 9147 from Russia, 8721 from Denmark, 8035 from the Netherlands, 5964 from Hungary, 4029 from Austria, 4000 from Wales, 3908 from France, 1965 from Belgium, 1556 from Spain, 507 from Luxembourg, 339 from China, 78 from Portugal, 58 from Turkey, 49 from Japan, 26 from Roumania, 21 from the British East Indies, 14 from Greece, 9 from Malta, and 495 from other countries. Making a total of 432,635. Beside these large numbers landed at Boston and Philadelphia.

An Anti-Mormon Movement has been commenced by the Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati. The clergymen of the city have taken up the question with vigor, and petitions are being prepared asking Congress to take immediate and energetic means to blot out Mormonism. These petitions will be circulated for signature by committees of ladies who have already been selected, and who expect to make thorough work of it. It would be well if other denominations would follow this example. If Congress became satisfied that the churches of the country were in earnest in this matter, decisive steps would soon be taken to wipe out the plague spot.

A Munificent Gift to the City of Baltimore was presented last week. A letter was received by the mayor and city council from Mr. Enoch Pratt, the President of the National Farmers' and Planters' Bank, in which Mr. Pratt offered to establish and endow a free library for the benefit of the whole city at a cost of one million dollars, providing the city will grant a perpetual annuity of $50,000 toward its support. Mr. Pratt, in his letter to the mayor, says he has already, in pursuance of his plan, contracted for the erection of a fire-proof building, on his own property, capable of holding 200,000 volumes, which will be completed in the summer of 1883, at a cost of $225,000. This he will transfer by deed to the city, and he will give in money the additional sum of $833,000 on the condition mentioned. He proposes that a board of nine trustees be incorporated for the management of the Pratt Free Library. No trustee or officer, he stipulates, is to be appointed or removed on religious or political grounds.

Attorney General Brewster's Scarred Face does not occasion remark in Pennsylvania where he is well known, and where the cause of the scars is understood. When President Arthur nominated Mr. Brewster for the Attorney-Generalship, however, his portrait appeared in the illustrated journals and then inquiry was made by strangers as to his remarkable appearance. The following explanation was then given. "Those are honorable scars he wears, since they were got when he was a child in saving the life of his little sister. Her apron caught fire on the nursery hearth, and the boy, hardly more than a baby himself, rushed at her and pressed out the fire, saving her at a fearful cost to himself."

An Unbroken Wall of Rum Could be Formed around the city of New York, says the annual report, just issued, of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, if the liquor places in the city were iced in a line with a frontage of only twenty feet each. This fact shows the appalling extent to which the death-dealing traffic has extended. It is gratifying to learn from the same report that a long effort is to be made in the coming summer to free passengers on excursion boats from the joyance of rum-selling and its attendant dangers.

A Farewell Meeting was held at the Calvary Baptist Church on Friday last, on the occasion of the setting out of Rev. George N. Thomssen, his wife, and Mr. F. D. Phinney, who were to sail the following day for India, where they hope to engage in missionary work. The Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Thomssen will go to Angole to work among the heathen people, while Mr. Phinney will take charge of the mission press at Rangoon, Burmah. The Rev. Mr. Thomssen is a German by birth, and was lately pastor of a church in Hoboken. Mr. Phinney is a recent graduate of Rochester University.

The Revival Services in Cincinnati, conducted by Mr. Thomas Harrison, "the boy preacher," are thus described by a local journal: "At the opening of the meetings in St. Paul's church, although aisles and lobbies are thronged with those who remain standing all evening, there is no jostle, no talking, no noise; but a deathlike stillness. When the meetings are drawing to a close, no persons leave the seats. The audience seems transfixed. Not a stir is seen. Not a sound is heard among the people, but all intently gaze on the youthful evangelist and the crowded altar."

Penurious Man's Trick to Save the Post-office his letters is described in a Kentucky journal.

A wealthy farmer in that State noted for his early habits, whenever he had a letter to write, would drop in at the bank where he kept his account and borrow a sheet of paper. Having finished the letter he would ask the cashier to put it in an envelope and direct it for him, and then give it to the post office himself. This occurred often that, although the matter seemed of a trifling character, the cashier grew tired of it and complained, but he was still more annoyed when he learned that the farmer never stamped his letters, knowing that the postmaster, recognizing the farmer's handwriting and the bank's name in the letter, would courteously prepay them and send the bill to the bank. A trick of this character would certainly be discovered some time and exposed. It is like the plan adopted by some unscrupulous men who join a church in order to gain respectable references and a reputation for integrity. When exposure comes, the church suffers, and the man cannot serve at the last when God demands something more than the indorsement of a church when it has not been fraudulently obtained.

Touching Story of a Little Girl's Dream comes from San Francisco. In one of the stores in the city there is a bakery, grocery, and liquor store. Into this store entered a poorly dressed child of ten years. "How's your mother?" asked the boy who came forward to wait on her. "Wful sick, and ain't had anything to eat all day." The boy was just then called to wait upon a man who entered the saloon, and the girl sat down. Wearing out she fell asleep holding her head in her hand. One of the men saw her as she came to the bar, and after asking who she was, said: "Say, you drunkards, see here. Here we've been pouring down whiskey when this poor girl and her mother want bread. Here's a two dollar bill that says I've got some feeling left." And I can add a dollar," observed one. "And give another." They made up a purse of an five dollars, and the spokesman carefully put the bill between two of the sleeper's fingers, drew it away, and whispered to his comrades: "Look at that—the child's dreaming!" So she awoke. A big tear had rolled out from her closed eyes, but the face was covered with a smile. She then tiptoed out, and the clerk walked over and touched the sleeping child. She awoke with a laugh, and cried out: "What a beautiful dream! Ma wasn't sick any more, and we had lots to eat and to wear, and my hand burns yet where an angel touched it!" When she discovered that her nickel had been replaced by a bill, a dollar of which loaded her down with all she could carry, she innocently said: "Well, now, but ma won't hardly believe me that you sent up to heaven and got an angel to come down and give me all this."

A Farmer's Sentence on Four Students of a Wisconsin college, caused some amusement in the neighborhood. The Youth's Companion says that a certain farmer had one of his gates stolen, and found that it had been removed as a practical joke by four college students. He made his complaint to the faculty, and the four students being proved guilty were given the alternative of leaving the college or undergoing such punishment as the farmer might inflict. They chose the latter, and the farmer condemned them to chop four cords of his wood, and carry it themselves to a poor widow. The affair was the subject of public talk, and on the appointed day when the students slunk off to do their punishment they found a large gathering of spectators assembled. A band of music also had been brought along and played appropriate melodies while the chopping and carrying was done. If the farmer's principle were adopted by our legislators the jails would be compelled to support the poor houses, which in some States would involve a striking change in the prison life of criminals.

A Novel Account Book was Eaten by Pigs at Newburyport, Mass., recently. A firm of masons in that city employed a hod-carrier, whose novel method of keeping account of his time was brought to light by a droll circumstance. He went one evening to his employer's home with the sad intelligence that he had lost his account-book. He said the pigs had got in and eaten it up. "What sort of an account did you keep?" asked the employer. "I had a keg, and when I worked a whole day I put in a potato, and when half a day a half potato, and the pigs ate 'em intirely." Happily for the man his employers kept his account in a more business-like way, and were able to furnish him with the missing figures from their books; but there are many who having given their lives to the pursuit of wealth and having kept their own account of their labors in their own way, will find after death that account swept away and in the book of life, kept in heaven, no record of their names (Rev. 20: 15).

A Cunning Scheme to Evade the Licensing laws is described by the Springfield Republican. There is a spot in New England where there is a junction of the boundary lines of the States of New York, Massachusetts, and Vermont. The peculiarity of the location suggested to the mind of a crafty liquor dealer the thought that he might use it to defraud the revenue. He carefully studied the exact boundary, and then erected a shanty placed so that an equal space should be in each of the three States. His bar followed the same plan, and in the centre was a large flat stone which covered the precise point of junction. Then he commenced selling without a license. The Bay State constable was the first to visit him, but the liquor dealer conversed with him safely from the Vermont corner of the bar. The next time the Massachusetts man called he was accompanied by a Vermont constable. Then the dealer took his stand in the Empire State. At last a New York constable was found, and the three moved on the store together. So cornered, the dealer stood upon the stone, and invited each man at his peril to take his third. But he happened to be partially intoxicated, and his footing being unsteady he fell off into the State of Massachusetts, and was duly captured by the Bay State officer. It was a crafty scheme, but like most of such schemes it failed at last. There are many men trying by regular attendance at church and by liberal gifts to charities to atone for evil practices who might advantageously ponder this event. Their fellow-citizens are puzzled to know whether they belong to the church or the world; but a day is coming when all such devices will fail, and every man will be stripped of his disguises. (Job 5: 12).

MEN WITHOUT HEART, SIGHT, OR HEARING.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Yet the Lord hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day."—DEUTERONOMY 29: 4.

A Dreary Existence—No True Life Without the Natural Senses—The Spiritual Senses—Wealthy Paupers—Learned Ignorance—I. A Mournful Fact—The Blind Nation One Specially Favored—One that had Witnessed God's Wonders—Passed Through Remarkable Experience—Received Remarkable Instruction—Associated with Remarkable Characters—II. Mournful Reasons for the Fact—They Did not Know They were Blind—Never Asked for Sight—Resisted Light—III. Mournful Result—They Missed a Happy Portion—A Glorious Destiny—They Went on Sinning—Often Suffered—Ended Terribly—A Day of Revelation.

FEELING, sight, hearing! What wonderful things these are. If we could exist without them what a wretched condition ours would be. The outer world would be unknown to us if the gates of the senses were shut, and the soul would be famished, like Samaria when it was straitly shut up, and there was no going in nor coming out. Take away from us the power of perception by touch, smell, taste, sight, and hearing, and it would be of small account to us that the world was beautiful, for to our consciousness there would scarcely be a world at all. The dreariest dungeon of the Bastille would be liberty compared with such a state.

Perhaps the mind might exist, but certainly it could not live; it would be a misuse of language to call it life. When any one of the senses is gone it involves great deprivation, and subjects the person enduring it to the pity of his fellows, but if all were absent what wretchedness must ensue. Loss of sight or hearing creates among us a large number of sufferers who deserve our sympathy, but what mourning would suffice for those, if there were indeed any such, who physically had neither heart to perceive, nor eyes to see, nor ears to hear!

Transfer your thoughts now from these external senses by which we become conscious of the external world to those by which we perceive the spiritual world, the kingdom of heaven, the Lord of that kingdom, and all the powers of the world to come. There is a heart which should be tender, by which we perceive the presence of God and feel His operations, and even behold the Lord Himself, as it is written, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." There is a spiritual eye by which the things invisible are discerned, blessed are they to whom the Lord has given to see the things of His kingdom, which to the unrenowned remain hidden in parables. There is a spiritual ear by which we hear the gentle whispers of the Spirit, which frequently come to us internally, without the medium of sounds that can affect the ear.

SPIRITUAL SENSES

Blessed are those who have the ear which the Lord has purged, and cleansed, and opened, so that it listens to the divine call. But there is no blessedness in the case of men devoid of spiritual feeling, sight, and hearing. There is a miserable plight. Just what the blind man, and the deaf man, and the man who is destitute of feeling would be in the outer world, that many men are as to the spiritual world. Alas, there are among us in this congregation this day, and all around us in myriads, poor souls of whom this text is true, "The Lord hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day."

What a sad thing it is that so many are rich in all things except the one thing needful. God has given them abundance of earthly possessions, but he hath not given them eyes to see His bounty, nor ears to hear His voice of love, nor a heart to perceive His presence in the mercies which they enjoy. Such see the harvest, but not the Great Husbandman; they enjoy the fruitful seasons, but take no delight in the giver of the rain and the sender of the sunshine. What a sad condition to be in! Alas, poor rich man! He has so much and yet so little!

And what a lamentable sight is the educated man of this world who is learned in all the lore of the ancients, and versed in all the science of the moderns; who has pried into the secret chambers of knowledge, and has observed the skill of the Eternal in the starry heavens and in microscopic life; and yet with all his attainments has no knowledge of his Maker, and will not accept the evidence of His presence. How sad that we should have to say to such. "Yes, you know all the facts, and yet cannot see beneath their surface; you allow prejudice to blind your eyes to the plain teaching of creation and Providence. You walk through the studio and admire the pictures, and deny the artist's existence, whereas if you were candid you would believe in him from his works, and then go on to spell out his character from them. Alas, you have not a 'heart to perceive, nor eyes to see, nor ears to hear unto this day.'" Well spake the apostle when he said, "Not many great men after the flesh, not many learned are called."

I. First, we shall think upon

A MOURNFUL FACT.

Here was a whole nation, with but very few exceptions, of whom their leader, who knew them best and loved them best, was obliged to say, "The Lord hath not given you a heart to perceive unto this day." The mournful part of it was, that this was the nation that had been specially favored of God above all others. Almost all the light then given was focussed upon Israel, and yet they had not eyes to see. "God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not for want of ears which can hear." Is not this a dreadful thing? I can understand the other nations being blind and senseless, for they were in the dark, and "the times of their ignorance God winked at;" but for this nation, upon whom the sun of righteousness had risen, to choose darkness and abhor the light is a horrible thing. By the preciousness of the privilege the sin of its rejection was greatly enhanced.

This is sad, sad to the uttermost degree of sadness; but is it not the case with some of you? Are there not among you those who have the clearest light, and yet choose the ways of darkness? My dear hearers, be honest with yourselves and answer. Born of godly parents, singled out to be carefully instructed in the things of God, attending a faithful ministry from your youth up, reading your Bible, and being thoroughly versed in its contents, and yet, after all, without godly feeling and gracious perception. I grieve that you should have such privileges, and yet remain strangers to salvation. Will it be so for ever? Shall it always be said of you, "The Lord hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day?"

Note again, that not only were they a highly favored people, but they had seen very wonderful acts performed by the Lord Himself. Moses says, "Ye have seen all that the Lord did before your eyes in the land of Egypt unto Pharaoh, and unto all his servants, and unto all his land, the great temptations which thine eyes have seen, the signs and those great miracles." Does it not seem deplorable that they could see God lifting His hand against Pharaoh with plague after plague, and yet not acknowledge Him to be the only living and true God?

And that Red Sea! Was not that marvel enough? Could men stand there and see that, and yet not perceive that the gods of the heathen are idols, and that only Jehovah is the living and true God; and could they shake off the fear and dread of this mighty God from their souls, and turn to worship a golden calf which their own hands have made? Yes, such is the deplorable wickedness of man that if God were to work over again all the miracles of Egypt in the sight of those of you who are unbelievers you would not thereby be converted to His fear. You would be staggered by the wonder, but you would not be converted by the witness.

Something else is wanted over and above all miracles or ever the blinded eye will care to see, or the hardened heart will begin to feel. You also have witnessed great deeds of grace in our midst, and yet you are not convinced. You even believe in all the miracles of Scripture, and in the death and resurrection of our Lord Jesus, and yet you do not trust in Him. Ah me, what can I say? What can I do but mourn over you?

In addition to this, these people had passed through a very remarkable experience. They had been brought out of Egypt by miracle, and by the same power they had passed through the depths of the sea as on dry land. Moses thus describes their wilderness history. "And I have led you forty years in the wilderness: your clothes are not waxen old upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot. Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink: that ye might know that I am the Lord your God." All these forty years they lived by miracles, and yet they neither feared, nor loved, nor trusted Jehovah their God who wrought all these signs among them. As a nation they did not receive the spiritual teachings which the Lord set before them.

Do you blame them? Look at home. Are they the only people who have thus offended? May I not be addressing some to-day whose experience has been singularly full of mercy and love? God has been strangely gracious to you, my friend. He has led you by a way that you knew not, and, if you could but see it, His hand has been conspicuously with you from the time when you left your father's house unto this day.

I know not to whom I may be speaking, but I am persuaded that there are some here whose career has been specially marked by the providence of God. Yours has been no common journey of life. You have been preserved in accident and restored from sickness. The stars in their courses have seemed to fight for you, and the stones of the field have leagued to defend you, and yet you do not observe the hand of the Lord in all this. The Lord has girded you though you have not known Him; He has guided you, restrained you, delivered you, instructed you, even though you have not deigned to think of Him. Yea, He has saved you from the consequences of your own folly, or you would long ere this have been a beggar, or a mass of sores, or a prisoner in the last dread dungeon.

He has interposed to save you from your own folly; and here you are where mercy pleads, and grace holds out her silver sceptre. Alas, even to this day you have not a heart to perceive the long-suffering of God, nor eyes to see your obligations, nor ears to hear the wooings of His love; but you are going on still in rebellion against God. Shall it always be so? It is grievous that it has been thus so long; is there no turning? Is there no relenting? Must you die in your sins?

In addition to all this sight and experience the Israelites had received

REMARKABLE INSTRUCTION.

In the wilderness the Lord taught them by Moses and Aaron. The tabernacle was pitched in their midst, according to the pattern which Moses had seen on the mount, and there a worship was instituted, every part of which was singularly rich in instruction, as we all know to this day. There was not a lamb slaughtered, nor a lamp kindled, nor a handful of incense burned on the altar, nor a curtain folded up, nor a silver socket set in its place without some moral and spiritual significance; but they had no heart to perceive, nor eyes to see, nor ears to hear; and so the whole apparatus of teaching was lost upon them.

Ah, dear hearer, you may enjoy the most lucid instruction, you may have line upon line, precept upon precept, you may read God's Book itself, and you may observe the experience of Christians, and you may have all their love and affection to help you to understand the things of God, and yet for all that you may remain without spiritual perception. All the external processes of holy teaching may spend themselves in vain upon you for forty, or fifty, or sixty, or even seventy years, and you may remain still blind and unfeeling. Does your present condition prove this assertion? Are ye also without understanding? Are ye still untaught in the things of God? O that the Holy Spirit may now create in you a new heart, and bestow both spiritual eyes and ears upon you.

One thing else is worth notice, that these people had been associated with remarkable characters. They were not all blinded, there were a few among them who were gracious, and so were made to perceive. Caleb and Joshua were there, and Aaron and Miriam; but chiefly there was Moses grandest of men, true father of the nation. It was something to have lived in a camp where you could speak with such a man as Moses, who had seen God face to face, so that upon his brow there rested the glow of Deity when he came down from the mount.

You, too, my friends, have met with those whose conversation has been in heaven, and whose lives are bright with communion with the Lord. If we do not see and will not see where another sees so clearly, we stand condemned. A man who counts himself highly intelligent stands with me upon the hill and looks abroad upon a fair landscape, over which hangs a wonderful sky bedecked with fleecy clouds, while at our feet blooms a wealth of lovely flowers; he tells me that in all this he sees no evidence of God. Is he not blind? As for me, I feel myself surrounded by the all-embracing Deity, and His presence is the greatest fact of my consciousness:

"God hath a presence, and that ye may see

In the fold of the flower, the leaf of the tree;
In the sun of the noon-day, the star of the night;
In the storm-cloud of darkness, the rainbow of light;
In the waves of the ocean, the furrows of land;
In the mountains of granite, the atom of sand;
Turn where ye may, from the sky to the sod,
Where can ye gaze that ye see not a God?"

Now, either I am a liar or else my neighbor is sadly dull of perception; and as I know that I speak the truth I know also that he is blind.

Ah me! This is sad, most sad; but I fear that in this congregation we have a number who are in like case. Years have not brought them grace nor has a lifetime yielded them wisdom. They have seen God's wonders of grace upon their friends and relatives, they have also tasted of the Lord's goodness in their own lives, and they have heard His voice in the preaching of the Gospel, for Jesus Christ has been set forth evidently crucified among them, and yet they have not seen the Lord and do not hear Him even unto this day. This is no new thing, but it is none the less a grief of heart to those of us who fear the Lord and feel love for souls.

Brethren, remember that these Jews in subsequent generations had great prophets among them and what was the success of their labor? Did they not cry, "Who hath believed our report?" At length they saw the Son of God among them, and how did He speed? Jesus Himself, with all His miracles of grace and words of love, came unto His own people and they received Him not, but cried, "Crucify Him, crucify Him." How true it is that nothing can bless men till almighty grace renews them. If one should rise from the dead he would not repent unless they were renewed. There is no miracle that God can do, there is no marvel that omnipotence itself can perform, which can make men see who have no spiritual eyes. The Gospels represent our Lord Himself as baffled by man's refusal to believe, as is written, "He could not do many mighty works there because of their unbelief." Oh the wretchedness of this state of things; who shall deliver men from it? Who can attempt the task but God only?

II. We will now hasten to spend a few minutes in descending into a still lower depth. Let us note for all this. The reasons for their incapacity to see and perceive lay, first, in the fact that these people never believed in their own blindness. They had no heart to perceive, and they did not perceive their absence of perception; they had no eye wherewith to detect their own dimness of vision. They were such fools as to dote on their own wisdom, so poor as to think themselves rich, so hypocritical as to profess to be sincere. They were wise in their own conceits, and hence it was that they could not see. Pride is the great creator of darkness, like Nahash, the Ammonite, it puts out the right eye. Men seek not the light, because they boast that they are the children of the day and need no light from above.

THE MOURNFUL REASONS

More than this, these men never asked for a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear. No man hath ever asked for these things and been refused; no soul has cried in its blindness and darkness, "Open thou mine eyes," but what a gracious answer has always come. It is the prerogative of the Lord Jesus to open the blind eyes; but this He is ever ready to do whenever men call upon His name. Rightly are those left in darkness who will not ask God to give them light, or to open their eyes. Is not this the case with some of you? O my hearers, I must be plain and personal with you—is it not true that some of you are prayerless, Christless, graceless? What will become of you? Your case is all the more to be lamented because you are without excuse.

Then, moreover, what little light they did have they resisted. When they were forced to see, it was only for a moment that they would be instructed, and then they shut their eyes again. "When He slew them, then they sought Him: and they returned and inquired early after God. And they remembered that God was their rock, and the high God their redeemer. Nevertheless they did flatter Him with their mouth, and they lied unto Him with their tongues." When He sent fiery serpents among them, or otherwise smote them, then they perceived His presence for a while, but anon they turned back and dealt deceitfully. Oh sinners that love not God, is it not because you love that which is evil? Oh, you that never see Him or seek after Him, is not the cause of your blindness to be found in your love of sin? "He that doeth evil hateth the light." This wilfulness of yours, this desperate bent of your hearts towards evil, how will you answer for it? Our fear for you is great; we are afraid that you will perish through your hardness of heart.

Jesus stands here this morning, and He cries, "How often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." He waits to be gracious. Do you doubt this? He has given you all manner of good things; do you think He would have refused you eyes to see, and a heart to feel, if those had been sought? "He giveth liberally and upbraideth not." If we, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto our children, how much more will our heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him? But no; men choose their own delusions; they abide in their darling sins; they perish by suicide. Like Saul, every unbeliever falls upon his own sword.

Blessed be the Lord, many of you have eyes to see and ears to hear. Let all such adore the sovereign grace which has given these boons to them. Let them worship the love which has sweetly conquered their stubborn will, leading their captivity captive, and giving them to feel and know and taste of spiritual things. Not to you be the glory, but to the Lord alone. To those who know not the Lord there is shame and confusion; but to those who have known Him there is no self-glorification; for, as the wise man saith, "The hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord hath made even both of them." To be blind of heart is our sin; but to be made to see is the gift of grace. Our misery is our own work, but our salvation is of the Lord.

III. I conclude by noticing what was THE MOURNFUL RESULT of these people being so highly favored and privileged, and yet not seeing nor discerning their God. The result was, first, that they missed a happy portion. I can hardly imagine how happy the children of Israel might have been. They left Egypt with a high hand and an outstretched arm, their ears were hung with jewels, and their purses were filled with riches, while around them inanna dropped from heaven, and cool streams flowed at their side. They might have made a quick march to the promised land, and at once entered their rest, for their God who had sent the hornet before them would soon have driven out their adversaries. In the land of promise they would have dwelt securely, and God would have given them rest. They would have known no invading enemy, and felt neither blast, nor blight, nor mildew; in fact, they would have been the happiest nation under heaven. They flung all this on one side; they would not have God, and so they could not have prosperity. They walked contrary to Him, and He walked contrary to them; they would not obey Him, and therefore His anger smoked against them.

Think, moreover, what a glorious destiny they threw aside. Had they been equal to the occasion, by God's grace they might have been a nation of kings and priests, they might have been the Lord's missionaries to all lands, the light-bearers to all peoples. Every arrangement was made to enable them to live a godly, holy, joyous, sanctified life. They ate angels' food, and they might have lived angels' lives, acting as heralds, to tell out to others what wonders God had wrought for them. Alas, they could not see the moral grandeur of so high a calling, and they thought more of eating flesh than of honoring the Lord and teaching His law.

I would like to say to some of you that God has been setting before you an open door, and yet you have not perceived Him, nor loved Him. He would make saints of you and you are content to be money-grubbers. You have judged yourselves unworthy of the prize which He has set before you. You do not know what a happy lot you have declined. So lately you were a young man—you are getting to middle life now—and you do now know what golden opportunities you have wasted. As Cleopatra melted pearls and swallowed them at a draught, so have you drunk down the possibilities of glory as if they were common things. What might not God have done with some of you if your hearts had been given to Him years ago. By this time you might have achieved a lifework, glorious to God, honorable to yourself, and happy to your friends.

Nor does the waste end with yourself, you are causing damage to many others.

YOUR CHILDREN.

are growing up to follow your follies, wasting their lives as you have squandered years! Oh, had you yielded to Jesus years ago your sons might have been your honor and comfort, and your daughters your joy and delight. You have flung away such opportunities as could not be bought for gold. Happy are God's people, but wretched are they who, being placed where they could see God's hand yet will not see it, where they could hear God's voice yet will not hear it, but refuse the kingdom of heaven which hath come so near unto them.

Another result was that while they missed so high a position, they went on sinning. As they did not learn the lesson God was teaching them, namely, that He was God, and that to serve Him was their joy and their prosperity, they went from one evil to another, provoking the Lord to jealousy. From repining and murmuring they went on to rebelling. "Let us make a captain," said they, "and let us return into Egypt." So they went from one sin to another because they had not a heart to perceive, nor ears to hear their God.

Hence they frequently suffered. A plague broke out at one time, and a burning at another; at one time they were visited with fever, and anon the earth opened beneath them; one day the Amalekites smote them, another day fiery serpents leaped up from the sand, and they died by thousands, being poisoned by their bites. They suffered much and often, and in all their trials they did but reap what they had sown. A man does not know what he is doing when he sins. We tell our naughty children that we have rods in pickle for them; and this is assuredly the case with the great Father, who hath chastisement laid up for the people who wilfully revolt from Him. Ah, my hearers, how many of you are this day reaping what your own hands have sown.

At last this evil ended terribly. The Lord lifted His hand to heaven, and swore that the rebellious generation should not enter into His rest, and they began to die by wholesale till Moses cried, "We are consumed by Thine anger, and by Thy wrath are we troubled." Not one of the men that came out of Egypt, save only Joshua and Caleb, reached the promised land. Whenever they pitched their tents at eventide the first thing was to celebrate the funerals of the day. The tribes marched on, and on the march they stumbled into their graves, till the whole of that peninsula in which they had to wander up and down for forty years became one vast cemetery, wherein the thousands of Israel were all buried. Who slew all these? Not by the sword of the enemy nor by the arrow of the foe were they destroyed; but sin laid them in heaps as in the day of battle.

They could not enter in because of their unbelief. The land that flowed with milk and honey lay smiling in the calm sunlight, on the other side of Jordan, but they could not enter in because they had no heart to perceive, nor eyes to see, nor ears to hear the Lord and His Word. And this is the main misery of your condition, O ye careless ones, that you will not be able to enter into God's rest either here or hereafter. This is the misery of it to me, that I must set Christ before some of you and you will never have Him; that I must extol His atoning blood, but you will refuse to be washed in it; that I must go on declaring my Lord's message as long as this tongue can move, and bidding you believe in Jesus Christ and find eternal life, but still of some of you I shall have always to say, "The Lord hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day." Alas, one day, in another sense. "The rich man seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom." Who was that? That was a Jew of the kind I have described, who had everything in this life, being clothed in purple, and faring sumptuously every day, but he had no heart to perceive nor eyes to see. "In hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments." Oh, my hearers, hell's torments will open your eyes. Will you wait till then? O ye ungodly ones, you will think then. I pray God you may have sense enough to think now, while thinking will be of use to you. If there be a heaven, seek it; if there be a hell, escape it; if there be a God, love Him; if there be a Christ, trust Him; if there be sin, seek to be washed from it; if there be pardon, rest not till you have it.

YOUR EYES WILL BE OPENED

O do not mock your Saviour! Do not make game of eternal realities! Be in earnest about this, and in earnest at once. If you must play the fool, trifle with something less precious than your souls. Procure toys less expensive than your own immortal destinies. Oh, that God would bless this word to you careless ones, that you may feel at once that you do not feel as you should, and begin to cry to God to give you feeling; that you may see that you do not see, and begin to cry, "Lord, open my eyes;" that you may hear this morning a voice which shall make you feel that you do not hear as you ought to hear, and therefore must never cry to God to give you hearing.

Remember that spiritual life is from God only. It is His gift, and it is not bestowed according to merit, but is given by pure grace to the unworthy. Seek it, and you shall have it, for so it is written, "He that asketh receiveth, he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."

Will your ears again refuse the language of His grace? Will you still go to your farm and to your merchandise, to your labor and to your amusement, and reject the voice that calls you to glory and immortality? Will you trample upon the bleeding love of Jesus? Oh, then, what shall I do, and to whom shall I turn? I must go back to my Master, mourning with Isaiah, "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Lord, reveal Thine arm, and then they will believe the report. Amen and Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Deuteronomy 29.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

John Bunyan Preaching in the Open Air.

JOHN BUNYAN PREACHING IN THE OPEN-AIR.

THE world-wide fame of Bunyan as a writer has somewhat thrown into the shade his character as a preacher, but it is not less true that in the latter capacity he was distinguished by rare gifts and extraordinary success. When Charles II. once asked Dr. Owen (one of the greatest divines of that age), "How a learned man, such as he, could sit and listen to an illiterate tinker?" Dr. Owen replied, "May it please your Majesty, could I possess that tinker's gift for preaching, I would most gladly relinquish all my learning."

Bunyan often preached in the open air, for the very good reason that the only available buildings were much too small to accommodate the crowds that flocked to hear him. His friend, Charles Doe, says: "When Mr. Bunyan preached in London, if there were but one day's notice given, there would be more people come together to hear him than the meeting-house would hold. I have seen, to hear him preach, by my computation, about twelve hundred at a morning lecture by seven o'clock on a working day, in the dark winter time. I also computed about three thousand that came to hear him one Lord's day in London, at a town's end meeting-house, so that half were fain to go back again for want of room, and then himself was fain, at a back door, to be pulled almost over people to get upstairs to his pulpit."

Even during his twelve years' imprisonment in Bedford jail he was not altogether debarred from preaching. By the favor of the jailer he was allowed to leave the prison, not merely to visit his family, but to undertake longer journeys to London, Reading, or elsewhere. It is said that during this period he visited the latter town and preached, disguised as a carter with a whip in his hand. Once when absent from jail he became so uneasy, that though the time had not arrived at which he had promised the jailer to return, he resolved to do so at once. As the hour was late, the jailer was surprised to see him and complained of being called out of his bed to re-admit him. But one of his enemies, suspecting the lenity with which Bunyan was treated, arrived shortly after, and demanded to know whether the prisoners were all safe. Being assured that they were, he went on to ask whether Bunyan was in custody. "Yes," was the reply. "Let me see him." Bunyan was called and appeared in reply to the summons. When the inquisitor had departed, the jailer said to his prisoner: "You may go out when you will, for you know better when to return than I can tell you."

Scenes such as that depicted in our illustration were by no means uncommon after Bunyan's release from his long imprisonment in 1672. On such occasions he held his large audiences spell-bound. His vigorous Anglo-Saxon words, his intense earnestness, his command of Scripture illustration, his graphic descriptions of the terrible consequences of sin, and his eloquent setting forth of the peerless glories and attractions of the Saviour of sinners, gave him, under God, ready entrance to the hearts of his hearers. "Whoso can speak well is a Man," said Martin Luther, and seldom has the saying been more finely exemplified than in the case of Bunyan.

WALTER BURN'S STEADFASTNESS.

(See Illustration.)

"THERE'S so much on hand to-morrow, Walter, that I'm afraid you must give up your place of worship just for once, to help me with these few sheep." These words were addressed by a stout energetic cattle-dealer to Walter Burn one Saturday after a morning of bustling work.

After carefully considering the request, Walter answered quietly but firmly: "I am sorry I cannot give you the help you want to-morrow, sir."

"Do you think I'm going to have a psalm-singing, canting hypocrite, standing up to face me like this?" he burst out, "Obey my order to-morrow, or you will leave my service, and your house as soon as I have the power to bundle you out of it."

The color left Walter's face, for before his mind's eye rose the picture of the neat, pretty cottage and garden where he had so long dwelt; of a well-loved wife and child who had never known hardship, and the thought of the change was indeed a trial.

After a few moments of silence, Walter said: "Master, have you ever found me neglecting your interests during all the years I have served you?" Appeased by this tone and manner, Mr. S— answered promptly: "I am bound to say you have not neglected my interests, Walter; no man could have acquitted himself better, and I have not been backward to show my sense of your worth." "Indeed, you have not, sir," said Walter; "and my desire has been to remain with you while you needed any one. To please you, I am willing to do the utmost my conscience will allow, and I have shown this by giving extra time to my work all this week. What you ask for to-morrow is a different thing, and I should feel I was bringing God's curse on me for the rest of the week if I were to do it." "Please yourself, and take the consequences," was the brief but decided answer. With a heavy heart Walter went home, but was unable to reply to the kindly greeting he received on reaching it. God's word was preached the next day at the service he attended with more than ordinary power, but poor Walter could not give his attention to it, and thus it proved quite insufficient to remove the weight from his spirit.

That same evening as the little family sat round the fire, Walter's wife said, "What a blessed and instructive sermon we had this afternoon." "It was thoroughly so," he answered, "but I was a little wearied with my long hours on Saturday, and had not as much enjoyment as usual. I just remember that the subject related to the three Jews who were cast into the fiery furnace for not worshipping the golden image." "And did you not follow our minister," said the wife, pleased to speak about a discourse she had enjoyed, "when he dwelt so strongly upon the words, 'but if not?' The captives had no doubt God would deliver them, but were fully resolved, even if their hopes should be disappointed, not to do violence to their consciences."

Looking round the bright and comfortable cottage, Walter said, "Suppose we knew that perseverance in a course which we felt to be right would lead to the loss of these blessings which have given us such comfort, how should we feel then?" By this time his wife, with woman's quick perception, had reached the conclusion that Walter had some secret of which he had not told her, so she at once said, "Tell me, dear, just what is wrong, for I know something is. I am one of the weakest of women, but am confident that the grace which has long been in my heart will sustain me through whatever comes." Walter then told her the worst, and had the deep joy of finding that she entirely approved of the course he had taken. Kneeling down together they told their trouble to Him for whose sake they were willing to bear it, and rose strengthened and refreshed.

They did not leave their house after all. Mr. S., though a stubborn man, who hardly ever went back from his word, said no more about Walter's refusal to work.

He knew that he had an active, industrious employe, and he was too good a judge of his own interests to discharge him because he would not violate his conscience to save his situation. Beside this he, a blunt, rough man, had an instinctive admiration for the man he could not overawe. He "admired his pluck," he said, and Walter and he had no quarrel afterward. Not only this, but the cattle-dealer was heard to say among his boon companions afterward, when silly jests about religion were made, that "there was something in it that nerved a man," and then he would tell the story of Walter Burn's refusal to work on Sunday.

LINA'S MITE.

By the Rev. John Dooly.

OUR Lina was born December 19th, 1875. Although she was the seventh child born in the family, like all other parents we considered this the sweetest babe of all. She was slow in learning to talk; at four years of age she could speak but few words plainly, among these were "Ma-ma," "Papa," "Jesus." But she had a vocabulary of her own by means of which she expressed herself. A few of these words were as follows: "Woo-da," for look at; "Pe-da," for lump of sugar; "La-hay," for upstairs; "Da-hay," for downstairs.

Young as she was, she went in fair weather to the Sunday-School of the Central Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, and when she returned from the school, she would sit and hum over the tunes she had heard, and try very hard to tell us what she knew of the school. It was at this most interesting period in child-life, when, for the second time in our family history, that dread disease, diphtheria, visited us.

Six years before, in one week, we laid to rest Kittie aged four, and Eddie aged five years. The stroke fell heavily on our hearts; it was the first great sorrow that had come to cast a shadow over the joy of our home life. But the precious sympathy of friends, and the firm assurance of God's loving purpose, now hidden, to be revealed in the future of His glory, when He shall make all things plain to His children, were to us means of comfort, yea, even holy joy, in the time of our bereavement.

A Question of Conscience.

Our boy Johnnie came in from his play, saying, "Mamma, I do believe I am going to be sick, for I feel cold." Well-defined symptoms of diphtheria soon followed. We feared the worst, but it pleased God to spare him. Just as he was pronounced safe, our Lina earnestly pleaded "Lahay" (upstairs), repeating it quickly, as she caught in her mother's eye the look of consent.

Before going upstairs she carefully collected all her playthings, she put them in her little trunk, and then eagerly hastened up to see Johnnie. She never opened her little trunk again. The infection of the disease was already in her system, from previous exposure. She had been upstairs but a few hours when she began to complain, and the disease rapidly prostrated her. From the first there was no symptom favorable to recovery. She spoke frequently of Jesus, and of going to be with Jesus.

A few hours before her death she was trying to amuse herself with a little savings bank, given by a friend, and in which she had deposited her pennies. It was a box covered with shells, the variety of which greatly pleased her. She called her mother to her side, and, handing her the box, told her, in her own child-language, that she was soon going to be with Jesus, and would give the box and the pennies to the Sunday-School. Soon after, uttering the words, "I want to see Jesus," she died.

Lina's father had been away from home in a distant State engaged in an effort with a view to the good of others. Being notified of her dangerous condition, he had started homeward, and a few hours after her death he stood by her side, a sorrow-stricken yet comforted mourner. The same day, November 29th, 1879, we laid her little body to rest in Cypress Hills Cemetery.

The little box and her savings were given to the pastor she so greatly loved, the Rev. Thomas H. Burch, who presented it to the Sunday-School at a missionary meeting, and told its history. Those present were so much impressed that they resolved, in response to a motion, to make this the basis of a fund to be called "Lina's Mite." Immediately a collection was taken to increase this fund and $32 was realized. Early steps were taken for the disposition of this fund, and it was decided it should be used for the support and education of a youth in India, with a view to his entering the missionary field. The business was conducted through the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 805 Broadway, New York.

What shall be the outgrowth of Lina's gift of a few pennies, who can tell?

The friends having the business in charge desire to increase the interest in Lina's Mite so that it may be a means of blessing to the missionary cause.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 62.)

A Rejected Suitor.

THE next few days were a strange and bewildering time to Phebe. Neighbors were coming and going, and taking the arrangements for the funeral into their own hands, with little reference to her. The clergyman of the parish, who lived three miles off, rode over the hills to hold a solemn interview with her. Mrs. Nixey would not leave her alone, and if she could have had her way would have carried her off to her own house. But this Phebe would not submit to.

But Mrs. Nixey walked beside her, next the coffin, when the small funeral procession wound its way slowly over the uplands to the country churchyard, where the deaf-and-dumb old wood-carver was laid in a grave beside his wife. It was almost impossible to shake her off on their return, but Phebe could bear companionship no longer. She must walk back alone along the familiar fields, where the green corn was springing among the furrows, and under the brown hedgerows where all the buds were swelling, to the open moor lying clear and barren in an unbroken plain before her. Their homestead lay like an island in a sea of heather and fern, with no other dwelling in sight; but, oh, how empty and desolate it seemed!

It was late in February, and though the fern and heather and gorse were not yet in bud, there was a purple tinge upon the moor foretelling the quickly coming spring. The soft west wind, blowing over many miles of moor and meadows and kissing her cheek, seemed like the touch of a dear old friend, and the thin, gray cloud overhead appeared only as a slight veil scarcely hiding a beloved face. It would not have startled her if she had seen her father come to the door, beckoning to her with his quiet smile, or if she had caught sight of Roland Sefton crossing the moor, with his swift, strong stride, and his face all aglow with the delight of his mountain ramble.

"But they are both dead," she said to herself. "If only Mr. Roland had been living in Riversborough he would have told me what to do."

She was too young to connect her father's death in any way with Roland Sefton's crime. They two were the dearest persons in the world to her; and both were now gone into the mysterious darkness of the next world, meeting there, perhaps, with all earthly discords forgiven and forgotten more perfectly than they could have been here. She remembered how her father's dull, joyless face used to brighten when Roland was talking to him; talking with slow, unaccustomed fingers, which the dumb man would watch intently, and catch the meaning of the phrase before it was half finished, flashing back an eager answer by signs and changeable expressions of his features. There would be no need of signs and gestures where they had gone. Her father, perhaps, was speaking to him now.

Phebe had passed into a reverie, as full of pleasure as of pain, and she fancied she heard her father's voice, that voice which she had never heard. She started and awoke herself. It was growing dusk, and she was faint with hunger and fatigue. The wintry sun had sunk some time since behind the brow of the hill, leaving only a few faint lines of clouds running across a clear amber light. She stepped down from the horse-block reluctantly, and with slow steps loitered up the garden-path to the deserted cottage.

It might have been better, she thought, if she had let Mrs. Nixey come home with her; but, oh! how tired she was of her aimless chatter, which seemed to din the ear and drive away all quiet thought from the heart. She had been very weary of all the fuss that had made a Babel of the little homestead since her father's death. But now that she was absolutely alone, the loneliness seemed awful.

It was quite dark before the fire burned up and threw its flickering light over her old home. She sat down on the hearth opposite her father's empty chair, in her own place, the place which had been hers, ever since she could remember. How long would it be hers? She knew that one volume of her life was ended and closed; the new volume was all hidden from her. She was not afraid of opening it for there was a fund of courage and hope in her nature, of which she did not know all the wealth. There was also the simple trust of a child in the goodness of God.

She had finished her tea and was sitting, apparently idle, with her hands lying on her lap, when a sudden knock at the door startled and almost frightened her. Until this moment she had never thought of the loneliness of the house as possessing any element of danger; but now she turned her eyes to the uncurtained window, through which she had been so plainly visible, and wished that she had taken the precaution of putting the bar on the door. It was too late, for the latch was already lifted, and she had scarcely time to say with a tremulous voice, "Come in."

"It's me—Simon Nixey," said a loud, familiar voice, as the door opened and the tall ungainly figure of the farmer filled up the doorway. He had been at her father's funeral, and was still in his Sunday suit, standing sheepishly within the door, and stroking the mourning-band round his hat, as he gazed at her with a shamefaced expression, altogether unlike the bluntness of his usual manner.

"Is there anything the matter, Mr. Nixey?" asked Phebe. "Have you time to take a seat?"

"Oh, ay! I'll sit down," he answered, stepping forward readily and settling himself down in her father's chair, in spite of her hasty movement to prevent it. "Mother thought as you'd be lonesome," he continued; "her and me've been talking of nothing else but you all evening. And mother said your heart 'ud be sore and tender to-night, and more likely to take to comfort. And I'd my best clothes on, and couldn't go to fodder up, so I said I'd step up here and see if you was as lonesome as we thought. You looked pretty lonesome through the window. You wouldn't mind me staying a half-hour or so?"

"Oh, no," said Phebe simply; "you're kindly welcome."

"That's what I'd like to be always," he went on; "and there's a deal about me to make me welcome, come to think on it. Our house is a good one, and the buildings they're all good; and I got the first prize for my pigs at the last show, and the second prize for my bull the show before that. Nobody can call me a poor farmer. You recollect painting my prize bull for me, don't you, Phebe?"

"To be sure I do," she answered.

"Ay! and mother shook like a leaf when I told her you'd gone into his shed, and him not tied up. 'Never you mind, mother,' I says, 'there's neither man nor beast 'ud hurt little Phebe.' You'd enjoy painting my prize pigs, I know; and there'd be plenty o' time. Wouldn't you now?"

"Very much," she said, "if I have time."

"That's something to look forward to," he continued. "I'm always thinking what you'd like to paint, and make a picture of. I should like to be painted myself, and mother; and there'll be plenty o' time. For I'm not a man to see you overdone with work, Phebe. I've been thinking about it for the last five years, ever since you were a pretty young lass of fifteen. 'She'll be a good girl,' mother said, 'and if old Marlowe dies before you'r wed, Simon, you'd best marry Phebe.' I've put it off, Phebe, over and over again when there's been girls only waiting the asking; and now I'm glad I can bring you comfort. There's a home all ready for you, with cows and poultry for you to manage, and get the good of, for mother always has the butter money and the egg money, and you'll have it now. And there's stores of linen, mother says, and everything that any farmer's wife could desire."

Phebe laughed, a low, gentle, musical laugh, which had surprise in it, but no derision. The sight of the gaunt embarrassed man opposite to her, his face burning red, and his clumsy hands twisting and untwisting as he uttered his persuasive sentences, drove her sadness away for the moment. Her pleasant, surprised laugh made him laugh too.

"Ay! mother was right; she always is," said Nixey, rubbing his great hands gleefully. "There'll be scores of lads after her," says mother, 'for old Marlowe has piles o' money in Sefton's Old Bank, everybody knows that.' But, Phebe, there aren't a many houses like mine for you to step right into. I'm glad I came to bring you comfort to-night."

"But father lost all his money in the Old Bank nine months ago," answered Phebe.

"Lost all his money!" repeated Nixey slowly and emphatically. There was a deep silence in the little house, while he gazed at her with open mouth and astonished eyes. Phebe had covered her face with her hands, forgetting him and everything else in the recollection of that bitter sorrow of hers nine months ago; worse than her sorrow now. Nixey spoke again after a few minutes in a husky and melancholy voice.

"It shan't make no difference, Phebe," he said; "I came to bring you comfort, and I'll not take it away again. There they all are for you, linen and pigs, and cows and poultry. I don't mind a straw what mother'll say. Only you wipe away those tears and laugh again, my pretty dear. Look up at Simon and laugh again."

"It's very good of you," she answered, looking up into his face with her blue eyes simply and frankly, "and I shall never forget it. But I could not marry you. I could not marry anybody."

"But you must," he said imperiously; "a pretty young girl like you can't live alone here in this lonesome place. Mother says it wouldn't be decent or safe. You'll want a home, and it had best be mine. Come now, you'll never have a better offer if you've lost all your money. But your land lies highest to my farm, and it's worth more to me than anybody else. It wouldn't be a bad bargain for me, Phebe; and I've waited five years for you besides. If you'll only say yes, I'll go down and face mother, and have it out with her at once."

But Phebe could not be brought to say yes, though Nixey used every argument and persuasion he could think. He went away at last, in dudgeon, leaving her alone, but not so sad as before. The new volume of her life had already been opened.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 63.)

The Five Results of the Russo-Turkish War of 1876-7—The Third Wonder—Nebuchadnezzar's Image—Meaning of the Seven Times—The Four Parts of the Image—Our Present Position—The Ten Toes—The Western Five Kingdoms—Changes Required for their Formation.

THE victorious war of Russia against Turkey in 1876-7 resulted in five distinct fulfilments of prophecy.

1. It advanced by several stages the drying up of the mystic Euphrates or Turkish Empire, which thereby lost Kars and adjacent territory in Asia to Russia, and had to surrender Bosnia and Herzegovina to Austria, and was stripped of all authority over Bulgaria and Servia.

2. The resulting formation of Bulgaria into an independent kingdom was an extraordinary fulfilment of prophecy, because it is the very event that was virtually predicted by Dr. Tregelles and Dr. Kelsall in 1846 and B. W. Newton in 1849, in their respective treatises. Their predictions are quoted in our Fourth Appendix. They distinctly showed that according to Daniel 8:8, 9, 22-3, the four ancient horn kingdoms of Alexander's successors, viz., Greece, including Thessaly, Epirus and Macedonia, and Egypt and Syria, and Thrace-with-Bithynia, must be revived as separate and independent kingdoms before the final crisis, and before the personal Antichrist arises out of one of them as the Little Horn. And as they also mentioned that the whole of the Eastern Roman Empire must before the final crisis become exactly divided into Five Kingdoms, of which these revived kingdoms would be four, therefore it necessarily follows that Bulgaria with part of Servia must form the fifth kingdom, because it constitutes all that remains of the territory of the Eastern Roman Empire after Greece, Egypt, Syria and Thrace-with-Bithynia are divided off from that Eastern half.

3. The reproduction of the Balkan Mountains as the northern boundary line of Thrace, which has thus begun to reappear, is another result of the separation of Bulgaria from Turkey. The Balkan Mountains were originally the northern boundary of Thrace, and in 1877 they were made the boundary line between Bulgaria and European Turkey, which therefore now is practically the same as ancient Thrace as far as its northern limits are concerned. It only remains for Macedonia to be taken from Turkey on the west and added to Greece, and then European Turkey will be the same size as ancient Thrace.

4. The predicted enlargement of Greece to its ancient dimensions, so as to include Thessaly, Epirus, and Macedonia, has been promoted by the Russo-Turkish War of 1876-7 to this extent, that the Berlin Congress, which adjusted matters after the war, strongly recommended Turkey to cede Thessaly and Epirus to Greece; and now in 1880 Greece is threatening to carry this recommendation into effect. Prophecy shows that it cannot be much longer delayed.

It is remarkable that in Britain the Beaconsfield administration, which steadily opposed the fulfilment of God's prophecies regarding the drying-up of the Turkish Empire, and the cession of Thessaly and Epirus to Greece, was to the surprise of every one signally overthrown and superseded in 1880 by the Gladstone Government, the "bag and baggage" policy of which decisively favors the overthrow of the Turkish despotism and the enlargement of Greece, and would view with satisfaction the predestined separation of Syria from Turkey.

5. The Russo-Turkish War of 1876-7 issued in a European Congress held at Berlin. This is the first approach for many years to any European

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders." By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, 5s.

Concert of the Powers, and is a beginning of successive Congresses which will be rendered inevitable by momentous events in Europe until they issue in the predicted Ten-kingdomed Congress and Confederacy, as prefigured by the Ten-horned Wild beast in Daniel 7.

THE THIRD WONDER.

(Now advancing toward its fulfilment, which will be completed shortly before the Jewish seven-years' Covenant.)

Daniel's, or rather Nebuchadnezzar's, Prophetic Image of a Man in Daniel's second chapter is universally admitted to be the Sacred Calendar of Prophecy. It represents the history of the four successive Gentile Empires, to which sovereign supremacy in the earth was to be transferred from the Jewish Nation when the latter became unfaithful. The consecutive duration of these four empires is revealed to be 2520 years, after which sovereign supremacy in this earth will once again be delegated to the Jewish Nation under the personal government of Christ the Son of David during the millennium of 1000 years.

The predicted 2520 years of the whole length of this Image, from its golden scalp to its clay-iron feet—in other words, of the four empires symbolized by it—commenced at King Nebuchadnezzar's era about 625 to 630 before Christ, and therefore ends about A.D. 1890 to 1895, when the ten kings and their kingdoms denoted by the Ten Toes of the Image will be shattered by Christ, "the Stone cut out without hands," descending upon them in judgment. The 2520 years is the double of the notable period 1260 years, i.e., the time, times, and half-time in its year-day fulfilment (Rev. 12 : 14). It is indicated in Daniel 4 : 16, 23, 32, by the seven times or seven years of Nebuchadnezzar's derangement when "a beast's heart was given to him."

This typified the derangement and heathen aberration from God of the four successive Gentile Empires represented by the four wild beasts of Daniel 7 and by the four parts of Nebuchadnezzar's Prophetic Image for a period of seven prophetic years, which is 2520 years, i.e., 7 multiplied by 360 years, as each day signifies a year in the year-day fulfilment. The same seven times is also mentioned in Leviticus 26 : 18, 28, as the period of the Jewish chastisement by the Gentile Empires.

The four parts of the Prophetic Image—1. the golden head; 2. the silver breast; 3. the brass loins; 4. the iron legs—were explained to mean the four universally supreme empires of 1. Babylon, 2. Medo-Persia, 3. Greece, and 4. Rome, which in turn succeeded each other, so that we are now living at the close of the history of the Roman Empire. Nebuchadnezzar saw these empires prefigured by the Image of a stately man, but Daniel saw them in a truer aspect under the vision of four destructive, irrational wild beasts, namely, 1. a lion, corresponding with the golden head of the Image; 2. a bear, tallying with the silver breast; 3. a leopard, coinciding with the brass loins; and 4. a ten-horned wild beast, answering to the

TEN-TOED IRON LEGS.

The two iron legs of this Prophetic Image are universally admitted to mean the Eastern and Western halves of Cæsar's Roman Empire, which was bisected into an Eastern Empire and a Western Empire in the reign of the conjoint Roman Emperors Valentinian and Valens in A.D. 394—the dividing line being near Belgrade and Tunis. And the five toes on each foot show that each half is to be divided toward the close of the history of the Image into five kingdoms. This will involve quite a reconstruction of the Map of Europe, and it is most remarkable that whereas in the Eastern half there are in 1866 (at the date of the first edition of this book) only three toes or horns, which of course will have to be increased to the number of five, yet in the Western half there are sixteen toes or horns, and they will have to be diminished to become only five.

Our present chronological position is near the middle of the feet of the Prophetic Image. The history of the four empires in its onward course has passed through all the periods of the Babylonian Empire from B.C. 625-30 to 538—the Medo-Persian Empire from B.C. 538, when Darius conquered and slew Belshazzar (Dan. 5 : 31) to 331—the Grecian Empire from B.C. 331, when Alexander the Great conquered the Persians, to A.D. 31—the Roman Empire, when Augustus Cæsar conquered Greece in A.D. 31, to the present time, and now we have arrived at the period of the clay-iron or democratic monarchic feet just before the development of the ten clay-iron toes.

We are living, in fact, close to the terminating extremity of the Great Image, the Calendar of Prophecy, and on the very borders of the terrible collision between the Metallic Image and the gigantic Stone representing Christ descending to judge the nations. The Stone is to smite the Image upon its Ten Toes, for they will be Antichrist's ten last confederate kings then found in active antagonism to Christ at the battle of Armageddon, "These shall make war with the Lamb; but the Lamb shall overcome them." "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed" (Rev. 17 : 14 ; Dan. 2 : 34, 44).

These will be Antichrist's ten kings, and not the earlier ten kings who will be reigning before Antichrist first arises as a Little Horn. The Stone, after destroying the Image, will "become a great mountain and fill the whole earth" (Dan. 2 : 35), for the Son of man will then reign personally over this entire globe for 1000 years, and there shall be "given to Him dominion and glory, and a kingdom that all people, nations and languages should serve Him" (Dan. 7 : 14 ; Rev. 20).

The same division of the ten kingdoms into two clusters or branches of five kingdoms, is zoologically discoverable in their representation as the ten horns of the Wild Beast, because however many antlers or horns a horned animal like a stag may have, there are generally two main branches or stems, one springing out of the left side, and the other from the right side of its head, and each of these two main branches afterwards forms itself into several smaller branches or horns. Thus presumably the wild beast would appear with five horns springing out of each side of its head, representing the five Western kingdoms and the five Eastern kingdoms.

THE TEN KINGDOMS.

There appears scarcely any doubt but that the five kingdoms in the Western half of the Roman Empire will be, in the main, Great Britain, France, Spain with Portugal, Italy, Sub-Danubian Austria; and the five in the Eastern half will be Bulgaria and the four kingdoms of the successors of Alexander the Great, namely, Egypt, Greece, Syria, and Thrace-with-Bithynia.

But some of these ten kingdoms must have their boundaries considerably altered in order to include all the other countries that fall within the Roman Empire; and also to exclude all countries that fall outside that empire. The boundaries of Cæsar's Roman Empire comprised nearly all the northern coast of Africa as far south as the Desert of Sahara, and it was bounded on the East by the river Euphrates—on the North by the Danube and Rhine, and a Roman wall running from Ratisbon on the Danube to Bingen on the Rhine—on the west by the Atlantic, and it included Great Britain, as far north as the Highlands. The boundary line between the Western and Eastern halves of the Roman Empire was near the city of Belgrade in Servia.

As long ago as the year 1800 the expositor J. Witherby remarked, "Respecting the division of the Roman Empire into ten kingdoms, as signified by the ten toes and the ten horns, was not the division of the Roman Empire into its Eastern and Western parts signified by the two legs; and in this case are we not to look for five of the toes in the East and five in the West?" And so far back as A.D. 1240, Eberhard, Bishop of Salisbury, gave his opinion at the Council of Ratisbon that the Ten Horns were England, France, Spain, Italy, Austria-with-Germany, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, North Africa, and Sicily, which practically approximates closely to the tenfold division marked out by the best modern expositors.

The following marvellous changes may be expected in order to form the whole of the geographical area of the Roman Empire into exactly ten kingdoms, five in the West and five in the East. And after their ten kings are united in a confederacy, a Napoleon will arise as a little sovereign over some small State in or near Greece, and subsequently make a seven years' covenant with the Jews.

(1.) Great Britain will be governmentally separated from Ireland, on account of the latter being outside the Roman Empire—at least to the extent of a separate legislature being granted to Ireland, so that it will be practically governed by an Irish Parliament, even if a nominal connection with Britain is still maintained. The Fenian organization, which is a far more serious matter than shallow journalists imagine, has discovered and developed a state of feeling which shows what inflammable elements are at hand for a Celtic revolution. It is difficult to conceive how this predestined secession of Ireland from England can take place without scenes of bloodshed and grave disaster to Great Britain. The fact that one-third of the British standing army consists of Irish Romanists may then be found to be a very serious one, as well as the presence of vast bodies of Irish Catholics in all the leading cities of Britain.

All the colonies included at present within the British Empire, such as India, Australia, New Zealand, the Cape of Good Hope, Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, the West Indies, etc., may similarly be expected to become practically governed by legislative assemblies of their own, if they are not so already, or else annexed to other countries. The union between them and Great Britain must become merely nominal, because they are geographically outside the limits of Roman earth. It is noticeable that Hanover in Germany, which is outside the Roman Empire, was separated from Britain in 1837. Dr. Tregelles and Dr. Kellsall in 1846, and B. W. Newton in 1849, pointed out in their prophetic treatises that Ireland never having belonged to the Cæsars' Roman Empire, would have to be separated from England before the ten kingdoms are formed. These predictions are quoted in our fifth appendix. All these considerations show that even several years before the Final Great Tribulation, Britain may have to experience great political troubles, just as the United States had to pass through severe internal troubles in 1860-64.*

(2.) France will push her frontier to the Rhine, and consequently swallow up within her enlarged boundaries Belgium, part of Holland, Rhenish Prussia west of the Rhine, Luxembourg, Switzerland and such parts of Baden, Wurtemberg, and the lower part of Bavaria as may not be united to Austria. It is difficult to see how these events can happen except by a great victorious war of France against Germany, or else by tremendous revolutions in Germany, leading to the surrender of these countries to France. Moreover there must be a moving cause for France and the rest of the ten kingdoms inside the Roman Empire allying themselves together in a confederacy. Must not their alliance be for mutual protection against a common foe? And that foe must necessarily be in the main some powerful neighboring nation outside the Roman Empire, like Prussia and North German States or Russia. The most probable causes leading to the ten-kingdomed confederacy will therefore be a gigantic conflict between France and Prussia, or a great war in connection with the Eastern Question.† Even the Crimean war of 1855 had the effect of producing a temporary alliance between Britain, France, and Italy.

(3.) Spain must have Portugal annexed to it, so as conjointly to form but one kingdom; otherwise there would be more than five kingdoms in the Western Roman Empire. It is this same reason which necessitates the addition of so much territory to France, as above mentioned.

(To be continued.)

* These remarks, published in the first edition of this book in 1866, have been confirmed by the subsequent Afghan and Zulu wars, and the disturbances caused in Ireland by Parnell and the Land League, which are paving the way for an Irish Parliament to sit in Dublin. [Note added in 1880.]

† The Franco-Prussian war of 1870 seemed of course to contradict these expectations, as France was defeated by Prussia and had to surrender to Prussia both Alsace and Lorraine. Nevertheless France before long will reverse that defeat and regain these provinces. [Note added in 1880.]

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Recent Election of a Member of the British Parliament for one of the Yorkshire districts, which caused so much excitement owing to Mr. Gladstone's indorsement of one of the candidates, has issued in a victory for the conservatives. This does not reduce Mr. Gladstone's majority in the House of Commons, as the late member was also a conservative. The result is important chiefly because the new member advocates the imposition of a duty on all grain imported from any countries except the British colonies, and also on account of his decided personal antipathy to Mr. Gladstone. In his election speech he said he was animated by an intense objection to Mr. Gladstone's government and personal dictatorship and to his measures of despoliation, and by a thorough detestation of the communistic and atheistic tendencies of the age. He had the support of the conservative party, also of many whigs who had been driven from under the liberal banner by Mr. Gladstone's generalship. He contrasted the state of Europe now with its condition when Lord Beaconsfield returned from Berlin. Referring to Ireland he said that Mr. Gladstone was throwing to revolutionists the sop of the wholesale confiscation of the property of the only loyal class in that country.

Two of the Thirty Men Arrested on Information supplied by Connell, alias Captain Moonlight, the Irish Land League leader who has turned informer, were tried on January 23d, at Cork, Ireland, and sentenced each to seven years' penal servitude. Connell, during the cross-examination gave startling evidence as to the system of terrorism and outrage in force in Ireland. He kept an order book which was produced at the trial. One of the entries is as follows: "On the 30th of December James Sullivan to be shot in the legs, his mother and daughter clipped for dealing with the Hagartys. John Linehan, story telling, to be clipped. Denis Coakley, for turning out his laborer, to be shot in the legs. Maurice O'Brien to be shot in the legs for paying rent." Judge Fitzgerald, who tried the case, said that he hoped that the sentence would have a good effect on the community, though from his experience he thought the trouble would not end.

The Movement Inaugurated by the English archbishops, bishops, and eminent philanthropists, to render aid to the persecuted Jews of Russia, has aroused the indignation of the Russian authorities and the newspapers. The Journal de St. Petersburg angrily comments on the movement. It says that though the agitation is carried on under the mask of philanthropy it has its mainspring in a feeling of hatred toward Russia, and in the displeasure with which political factions view the excellent relations between Russia and England which have existed since the accession of Mr. Gladstone. It declares that the accounts of riots are malevolently exaggerated. As the government is considering legislative measures in regard to the Jews the Journal begs the foreign press not to inflame a question already bristling with difficulties. We have heard what are the kind of measures the government is considering, and it is well known that they are grossly unjust. In saying the accounts of the riots are exaggerated the Journal de St. Petersburg propagates a wicked untruth, one half the cruelties perpetrated have not been published.

The Gambetta Ministry Tendered their Resignations to the President of the French Republic on January 26th. Their scheme of electoral reform was rejected in a full chamber by a majority of fifty-five. This sudden termination of a short reign is owing chiefly to M. Gambetta's advocacy of the scheme known as Scrutin de Liste, which we described at its first introduction. The members of the French chambers and a large portion of the public believe that it is a device to concentrate in the hands of Gambetta a power dangerous to the maintenance of republican institutions. The constitution of Gambetta's cabinet was also a disappointment to the nation. Gambetta surrounded himself with third-rate men almost unknown to the public, and seemed jealous lest even these should divide with him the public esteem. M. Freycinet, who was recently premier of France, succeeds Gambetta. He is a Protestant, and his wife and family are distinguished by their active work in charitable and philanthropic enterprises.

The French Capital was Last Week the scene of intense excitement in financial circles. In Paris, in common with other large cities in Europe and America, there has, for some time, been reckless speculation in stocks, and when on Thursday last a prominent speculator threw a large block of shares in the Suez Canal on the market, a general movement was made to realize and all stocks were offered at a heavy reduction in prices. Some alarm was manifested lest the panic should spread throughout the world.

The Elections to the French Senate have resulted in a Republican triumph. Of the seventy-seven elections for which the returns are complete, the republican party have carried fifty-five, winning so far thirty-one seats. The chief features of the struggle are the election of M. de Freycinet in three places—and the return of Colonel Labordère in the Department of the Seine. Both these events, but especially the latter, are significant as showing that the personal popularity of Gambetta with the people is waning.

The German Emperor's Rescript is Still Agitating political circles in that country. The uneasiness has not been allayed by a speech delivered by Prince Bismarck in the Reichstag on January 24th, in which he said the rescript did not aim to create a new constitution; the maxim "the king reigns but does not govern" did not apply in Germany; the expression "ministerial responsibility" was equally absurd. He declared that the rescript remained unshaken by the attacks upon it. He was fully aware of his responsibility in signing it, and that he was answerable for all the acts of the sovereign. It was to the sovereign, he said, and not to Parliament that Germany owed the position she enjoyed. Prince Bismarck then asked whether any one could reproach him with cowardice? The question produced great uproar and had the effect which Bismarck probably designed of diverting the debate to a personal issue. A prominent German newspaper says "the imperial rescript imperils the very existence of constitutional monarchy."

The Revolt of the Slavs of Austria, Mentioned last week, is attaining formidable proportions. A telegram from the commander at Sarajovo gives the details of numerous small skirmishes. The results were invariably unimportant, but the places mentioned show that the insurrection extends over a very large district, both of Herzegovina and Bosnia.

A Newspaper Scrap.—The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon relates in the Sword and Trowel for the current month an interesting incident. Mr. Spurgeon's son Thomas, in a letter recently written his mother from Auckland, New Zealand, incloses a portion torn off an old Australian paper, concerning which he says: "This scrap of newspaper I have given to me by a town missionary here, who regards it as a very precious relic. It came to him from a man who died in the hospital; he left it to his visitor as a great treasure. It is a portion of the Melbourne Argus, and contains a portion of father's sermon 'Loving Advice to Anxious Seekers.' The man found it on the floor of a hut in Australia, and was brought by its removal to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. He kept it carefully while he lived; it was discolored and torn when he found it, and on his death-bed he gave it to the missionary as the only treasure he had to leave behind him."

The Rev. William Taylor, the World's Evangelist, is doing in the Roman Catholic States of South America what we Protestants are unable to do in a considerable number of the public schools of our own United States. That is to say, in the articles of agreement by which he establishes his schools there, he inserts a clause requiring that daily sessions to be opened with the reading of the Holy Scriptures and with extemporaneous prayer. The patrons and pupils of these schools are Roman Catholics, and they pay the expenses of the schools, including the salaries of the teachers while the teachers are converted and consecrated Methodists, graduates from the colleges of the United States. In a letter to the Christian Standard Mr. Taylor writes: "In Concepcion, Chile, Lelia H. Waterhouse, besides her pianoforte teaching, has taught the students to sing with such effectiveness as to crowd her monthly concerts sacred song with upper-class Roman Catholics hear their children sing, 'Rock of Ages,' 'What a friend we have in Jesus,' and a hundred of our grand old hymns, so full of theology and Christian experience. With every hymn Lelia clinches the truth by her testimony for Jesus."

Among Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Hearers at the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Sunday evening, January 8th, were Mr. Gladstone and his eldest son. The prime minister of Great Britain was not only an attentive listener, but at the close of the service sought and obtained a private interview with Mr. Spurgeon. It may be hoped that Mr. Spurgeon's earnest evangelical preaching made an impression on Mr. Gladstone, and that the Holy Spirit will apply it to his heart. This would be a happy result not only for Mr. Gladstone personally, but for the Church of England, as he has the power to appoint the bishops of the Church, and his selections have not hitherto been such as evangelic Christians regarded with approval.

The Garfield is the Name Given to a New vessel launched at Belfast, Ireland, on January 9th. She is the largest steel sailing ship afloat, registering 2220 tons, and has just been built for Ismail Imrie & Co., managers of the White Star line. She will be employed in the Australian and Californian trades.

Vols. III. and IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, contain all the numbers for 1880 and 1881, with complete indexes. Price, $3 each volume, including postage ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

BY THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1882.

16th Year. No. 6.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:
 PORTRAITS AND LIVES of the Late DR. CUMMING and REV. D. MACLEOD and Picture of Crown Court Church, London.
 FOURTH REPLY TO MR. INGERSOLL. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday morning.
 SYLPH SOMERS (Continued). Parable of the Sower. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
 A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Continued).
 CURRENT EVENTS.
 PICTURE of AN INTERVIEW between Mary Queen of Scots and John Knox.
 THE TOUCH. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.
 WILLIAM HUNTER, the Martyr (Illustrated).
 THE OUTRAGES ON THE JEWS: Their Prophetic Significance.
 COBWEBS and CABLES (Con.).
 FOREIGN TOPICS.

for the text. I cannot tell what oppress got preach the sermon I prepar
 r. Mac play! At the close he opened the P een, 2:4, and read, 'Run, speak to th landy

The Late DR. CUMMING and his Successor, REV. DONALD MACLEOD—Crown Court Church, London.

THE LATE DR. CUMMING,

The Eminent Expositor of Prophecy.

Birth in 1810—Educational Advantages—Graduates M.A. in 1827—Appointed Minister of Crown Court Church, London, in 1833—His Great and Growing Popularity—Advocacy of Protestantism—Discussion with Mr. French—Opposes Cardinal Wiseman—Valuable Testimonial—His Prophetic Expositions—Views on the Second Advent—His Sermons Before Queen Victoria—Retires from the Pastorate—Death at Chiswick in 1881—His Services to Prophetic Truth.

EVERY student of prophecy is familiar with the honored name of Dr. Cumming. He carefully studied the inspired word, believing that the blessing promised to those that read and understand (Rev. 1: 3) would undoubtedly be bestowed. He gave to the world the results of his study, and even when he failed to convince his readers of the accuracy of his expositions he did good by inciting them, and encouraging them to study the Word for themselves. Dr. Cumming's works on prophecy have made his name universally known, but he had other claims on the loving recollection and gratitude of Christ's people. He has but recently gone to his reward, and our readers will doubtless be glad to learn some particulars of his life and work.

The late John Cumming was born at Aberdeen, Scotland, on the 10th of November, 1810, and died on July 5th, 1881. His father was a hard-working stonemason resident in Windmill Brae; and John Cumming might have had to labor all his life as a stonemason, too, had not God singled him out for His service and endowed him with acute intelligence and brilliant gifts. The possession of these was evident to those with whom young Cumming came in contact in his boyhood, and were joined with industry and a disposition to learn, and they especially attracted the attention of a benevolent gentleman, who provided the funds for his collegiate expenses.

John Cumming, therefore, was sent, at a very early period, to the Grammar School, and thence to King's College, Aberdeen, where he studied theology under Dr. Mearns, and was alike prominent in his classical and theological career. He took his M.A. degree in 1827, and left the university as a successful student of brilliant promise.

After the completion of his theological and general studies, he removed to the neighborhood of London, to discharge educational functions of importance. He made his appearance in London in the year 1833, just at the time when the meteoric career of his still more celebrated countryman, Edward Irving, the most intimate friend of the late Thomas Carlyle, was closing in disappointment.

MINISTER OF THE SCOTCH CHURCH.

He was ordained by the London Presbytery as the successor of Edward Irving to the pastorate of the Scotch Church in Crown-court, opposite Drury-lane Theatre, one of the busiest scenes in London, in the immediate vicinity of Covent Garden Market and the Central Police Court. This church—a picture of which in its altered and modernized form appears on our frontispiece—was built about the beginning of the present century, for the accommodation of the grossly unjust and unchristian riots are exaggerated the wretched and filthy localities propagated a wicked untruth.

Mr. Cumming at once became a powerful preacher in the pulpit, while he soon became a vigorous champion of the Protestant Reformation Society, in antagonism to Popery, as well as a staunch defender of the principle of National Church Establishments. At one time his congregations were so numerous that it was impossible for an occasional hearer to find accommodation, and even the aisles of the church were crowded with eager listeners.

In the celebrated Wardlaw-Chalmers controversy, on the State Church question, he took a decided part against the advocates of the "Voluntary Principle," and specially distinguished himself in that direction at a public meeting held in the Freemasons' Tavern, in 1837, presided over by Lord Ashley, now the Earl of Shaftesbury. For his exertions in this department of politico-theological controversy, Dr. Cumming received formal letters of thanks from the chief dignitaries of the Church of England, such as the then Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London.

HIS ADVOCACY OF PROTESTANTISM.

He was for some years connected with the British Reformation Society, and perhaps it was as the eloquent advocate of its claims that he became best known to a far wider circle than his own congregation. His lectures all over England were always hailed with delight, and, whatever stir Romish advocates might have made in a neighborhood, the friends of Protestantism had no reason to be afraid of their principles being either ridiculed or misrepresented if John Cumming could attend as their exponent. In those days some did not see any great danger to be apprehended from the spread of Romanism, and the earnest warnings which Dr. Cumming proclaimed, not only on the platforms of the British Reformation Society, but wherever his voice was heard, were deemed improbable if not visionary. The events of late years, however, have amply proved that he was not a moment too soon in bidding his countrymen beware of the devices of the subtle foe, to the treacherous advances of which many were so blind.

In the year 1839 Dr. Cumming's anti-Romanist polemics had excited so much attention that he was induced to engage in an oral discussion on the subject at Hammersmith, a suburb of London, with a learned barrister, Mr. David French. It was a most brilliant illustration of Dr. Cumming's power and equipment as an advocate of Protestant principles. Some can remember the intense interest excited by it. There were selected for discussion five great subjects; and there were two chairmen at each meeting, George Finch, Esq., M.P., on the Protestant side, and C. Weld, Esq., on the Romanist side. The audiences, half Protestant and half Roman Catholic, were admitted by tickets.

The discussion lasted eleven nights, and it is universally allowed to be the most masterly examination of the whole subject in modern times. Mr. French displayed greater learning and acuteness than any controversialist on the same side for upwards of a century; but nothing could have been more powerful and complete than the replies of his opponent, whose perfect command of himself and his language contrasted most favorably with Mr. French, who occasionally displayed a lamentable want of temper, and would even condescend to the use of the coarsest personalities in argument.

After the close of the discussion his congregation presented him with a complete edition of "The Fathers," and a service of plate worth $1250; while from the Protestants of Hammersmith he received, as an acknowledgment of his services in the cause of Protestantism, a Bible in nine languages, most elegantly bound, as an expressive recognition of his polyglot knowledge.

HIS ANTI-PAPAL CONTROVERSIES.

Some time after the Hammersmith discussion, Dr. Cumming met Mr. French on a public platform, where the latter was contending for what he termed the literal interpretation of Scripture. Dr. Cumming of course maintained that some of the words of the Bible are to be read figuratively, and as an instance quoted the well-known verse, "All flesh is grass." He asked whether Mr. French would take these words literally? The reply of the barrister was, "If I were a bundle of grass I should be very sorry to be in the vicinity of a hungry Scotchman," a rough pleasantry which Dr. Cumming received with perfect equanimity.

Dr. Cumming, in reply, was careful to show that the prevalence of Popery taught the divine nature of the Gospel, for nothing but the Gospel could have survived the pressure and persecutions to which it had been subjected. It was struck at, he said, by the heresy of Arius in the 4th century, and it was long crushed and smothered by the ever-eclipsing superstition of the Roman heresy. But it heard, even in its captivity, the voice of Him who summoned Lazarus from the grave, as that voice poured through the organs of the Reformation, and came fresh from its retreats, casting off the incrustations of corruption and the cerecloths and trappings of its tomb, and looked once more abroad upon the wide world unshorn of its splendor, in the beauty of holiness, with the dew of its own bright and holy morn.

OPPOSES CARDINAL WISEMAN.

Some eleven years later, the Papal controversy again emerged, and this time on a colossal scale, and Dr. Cumming was again prominent in the lists of champions of Protestant truth. In October 1850, Cardinal Wiseman fulminated his celebrated Pastoral, and Protestant Great Britain rose en masse to oppose the "Papal Aggression." Dr. Cumming was now a recognized leader in the Protestant Church, and his fearlessness and zeal were admired by every lover of the truth in Great Britain. He even visited the head-quarters of Cardinal Wiseman in Golden Square, where he inspected the oath of the soi-disant Archbishop of Westminster; and when he delivered his anti-Papal lecture in Hanover Square Rooms, London, in November, 1850, the room was filled three hours before the commencement of the discourse, and during its delivery the square and surrounding streets were crowded by thousands of enthusiastic admirers of the Protestant champion who were unable to obtain admission.

Dr. Cumming was much the ablest and most persistent antagonist of Cardinal Wiseman. Early in 1852 a public meeting was held in Exeter Hall, London, Sir Peter Laurie presiding, to take preliminary steps for arranging a testimonial to be presented to Dr. Cumming on the part of the Protestant public of Great Britain, and in recognition of his anti-Papal exertions. The committee of noblemen and gentlemen appointed to carry out the object of the meeting included the Duke of Montrose, the Earl of Shaftesbury, Dr. Baring, now Bishop of Bristol, Lord Cavan, Lord Ducie, Sir James Duke, M.P., Mr. George Moffatt, M.P., and Principal Macfarlane, of Glasgow.

The testimonial subsequently presented to Dr. Cumming, in accordance with the feeling manifested at this and a second public meeting, consisted of a service of chased silver plate of the value of $1575, and a sum of money equivalent to $5250. Among the subscribers was the Premier Duke of England, the late Duke of Norfolk, whose conversion to Protestantism, so much talked of at the time, was due, it is now well-known, chiefly to the influence and preaching of the late Dr. Cumming.

Both this present of plate and the one given Dr. Cumming at Hammersmith, were somewhat inappropriate in the case of an earnest, active, but not aristocratic preacher of the Gospel. Many Christians thought so at the time, and urged that the testimonial should take some other form, but the majority of the committee being peers, who from their associations regarded silver vessels for the table as a necessity, they overruled the objection, and the testimonial was consequently presented in a shape that Dr. Cumming himself would not have selected. It was, however, an evidence that his efforts in the cause of Protestantism were appreciated and as such was highly esteemed.

HIS PROPHETIC EXPOSITIONS.

Besides his conflict with Rome, Dr. Cumming gave much attention to the interpretation of prophecy. He was a voluminous writer, his works numbering considerably over a hundred.

His "Apocalyptic Sketches," which are perhaps as well known as any of his works, were lectures given in Exeter Hall, London, in 1848, where the congregation worshipped during the enlargement of Crown Court Church. Mr. James Grant, who was at the time editor of the London Morning Advertiser, wrote shortly afterwards that not a few were then afraid that Dr. Cumming would be led into rash and questionable theories in investigating a subject confessedly beset with difficulties; but by the blessing of God and the exercise of caution all ended more than satisfactorily. The spacious hall in which they were delivered overflowed with unprecedentedly large masses of people of every denomination, and the growing attention excited in the minds of these audiences, and the saving and striking impressions made on unconverted minds by the solemn truths they heard, were all signs and tokens that called for humble gratitude to God.

In 1852 he published his "Apocalyptic Sketches," which were followed, in 1859, by his "Great Tribulation Coming Upon the Earth" in a volume of upwards of 500 pages, in which he treated of the Second Coming of our Lord and the end of the present dispensation. Subsequently he published, "The Great Preparation," "Redemption Draweth Nigh," "The Destiny of the Nations," "The Lost Woe," etc. He always mentioned that the 1260 years (Rev. 11 : 2, 3) of the temporal power of the Papal witchcraft would end about 1866-8, and it is remarkable that the war of Prussia against Austria, in 1866, destroyed the old Austro-German Empire, on which, as Metternich said, the temporal power of Papal Rome rested; and then, in 1870, the temporal power of the Pope over Rome was completely destroyed by the King of Italy, Victor Emmanuel, seizing that city.

HIS VIEWS ON THE SECOND ADVENT.

His book, the "Signs of the Times," had an immense circulation, and it will be interesting by a single extract to point out what his views really were upon this solemn subject. He thus sums up what he had shown in the course of three lectures which he delivered on special occasions :

"I have shown, first, that Christ's Advent is the prominent hope of the Church of God; secondly, that His Advent is a personal one; and, thirdly, that the millennial day succeeds, and does not precede, the Advent of Christ, just as the light follows the sun and does not precede it; and, lastly, I have shown from the signs of the times that this Advent is near at hand, and that it becomes all to make ready for the coming of our blessed Lord. Let us now look more earnestly for the appearing of the Son of God and cease to quarrel. When our Lord comes, there will instantly take place a resurrection of the dead in Christ. I hold that when Christ comes at the commencement of the Millennium, all brethren that have died in Christ, from Adam down to the babe that perished yesterday from its mother's bosom—the dead in Christ will instantly rise to welcome their coming Lord.

"All believers then living will moreover be gathered together with them, and both the dead in Christ who rise from the earth, and the living in Christ who do not die, but are changed, shall be caught up in the air, and shall there remain until the earth has undergone its fiery ordeal, just as the family of Noah was kept in the Ark. The rest of the dead will not rise till the thousand years are finished. That the resurrection of the dead in Christ—that is, of all true believers—takes place at the commencement of the Millennium, and Christ's Advent is pre-millennial, and not post-millennial (Rev. 20 : 4-6)."

For many years the church in Crown Court was frequented by some of the most famous as well as the most fashionable of the Presbyterian nobility, including the Duchess of Sutherland, the Countess Russell, and other notables. Dr. Cumming published a volume of sermons which he had on various occasions preached before the Queen at Balmoral; and so lately as 1872, when the Queen was the guest of the Duke of Sutherland at Dunrobin, he preached another sermon on "Communion between Heaven and Earth," for which, at its conclusion, he received the personal thanks of her Majesty.

Among the most successful of his discourses may be cited his, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," delivered and published in the revolutionary days of 1848; his "Great Exhibition;" his "Wellington Lecture" (after the death of the Iron Duke), along with several sermons on the Russian war, especially in its relation to the fulfilment of prophecy. Dr. Cumming took a decided stand in the advocacy of perfect and entire Sabbath observance.

He received the degree of D.D. from the University of Edinburgh in 1844. He retired from the charge of Crown Court Church in 1880, when his admirers raised a substantial testimonial, and presented it to him in recognition of his long and faithful services. The congregation elected the Rev. Donald MacLeod (whose portrait appears on our front page) as his successor in the pastorate. During the latter part of his life he found a comfortable asylum at Chiswick when his mental powers almost completely faded away. He died there on July 5th, 1881.

DEATH AND EULOGY.

The death of Dr. Cumming was the subject of editorial articles in most of the London daily papers. In its article, the London Times, to which at one time Dr. Cumming was a frequent contributor, spoke of him as "A luminary that less than twenty years ago was blazing in the mid heavens, and outshining the light of day!"

At the morning service on July 10th, 1881, in the Scotch National Church, Crown Court, where Dr. Cumming had preached during so many years, an unusually numerous congregation, many of whom were attired in deep mourning, assembled, and the recently-elected pastor, the Rev. Donald MacLeod, at the close of his sermon alluded in feeling terms to the death of one whom, since they last worshipped in that place, it had pleased the Mighty Disposer of all things to take away to Himself. He said: "The deceased was one who for a lengthened period had made Crown Court, humble as were its surroundings, one of the most widely-known and most eagerly resorted-to churches in that vast city. The name of Dr. John Cumming is a household word to Scotchmen at home and abroad. He was an earnest, faithful, and gifted minister of whom all Scotchmen and the Church of Scotland might well be proud."

No writer has ever done so much as Dr. Cumming, by his eloquently written books on prophecy, to disseminate throughout the world the doctrine of the personal pre-millennial Second Advent of Christ. His books have been as widely circulated in this country as in Great Britain, and are to be found scattered all over the villages, towns, and cities of America. His great fame, reputation, and ability as a writer, secured a circulation for his pre-millennial views which otherwise they would not have attained. He was, unquestionably, the greatest modern advocate of the soul-inspiring doctrine of Christ's speedy Second Advent.

THE REV. DONALD MACLEOD.

Successor of Dr. Cumming in the Pastorate of Crown Court Church, London.

Birth in 1839—Licensed as a Preacher in 1861—First Pastoral Charge at Fort Augustus—Subsequent Appointments to Dornoch, Dumfries, Montrose and Dundee—Removes to Jedburgh in 1877, and Succeeds Dr. Cumming in London in 1881.

THE REV. DONALD MACLEOD, whose portrait accompanies that of the late Rev. Dr. Cumming on our frontispiece this week, is a true son of the Scottish manse. It has been supposed that he is the same Rev. Donald MacLeod who is the editor of the English magazine Good Words, but though the names of both gentlemen are alike they are not even related to each other. The editor of Good Words is a son of the late Dr. Norman MacLeod.

Rev. Donald MacLeod, who succeeded Dr. Cumming, is, as his name suggests, of Scottish birth. He was born at Fort William, Invernessshire, on July 21st, 1839, and is therefore now in the forty-third year of his age. His father was successively minister of the parishes of Ballachulish and Laggan, in the same bold and rugged county.

After the usual preliminary education, Mr. MacLeod proceeded to the University of Aberdeen, where he studied both in Arts and in Divinity, and having graduated in the year 1860, he was licensed by the Presbytery as a preacher of the Gospel in 1861, and in the same year was appointed, with the happiest results, to the pastoral charge of the parish of Fort Augustus, not far from his father's home.

The fame of the young minister grew, and he was speedily solicited to transfer his able services to a wider and more influential sphere of Christian activity. In the early part of 1863 the parish of Dornoch, one of the best livings in the North of Scotland, becoming vacant, the public-spirited and magnanimous patron, the present Duke of Sutherland, generously delegated to the people themselves the unqualified privilege of choosing their own minister, and their choice unanimously fell upon the successful and enthusiastic pastor of Fort Augustus, Mr. Donald MacLeod.

After a brief period of happy and most useful work for Christ in the parish, Mr. MacLeod was called, in 1866, to succeed the Rev. Malcolm Taylor (now Professor of Church History in the University of Edinburgh) in assuming the pastoral supervision of the parish of Greyfriars, Dumfries, and on the appointment of Dr. Taylor, in 1869, to be Chaplain to Her Majesty, and minister of the parish of Crathie, Mr. MacLeod was a second time asked to succeed him in the First Church of Montrose, his "call" being signed by seventeen hundred communicants and adherents.

Four years of successful ministry passed rapidly away, leaving results of the most gratifying character, in the building-up of believers in the faith, and the in-gathering of lost sinners to the fold of Christ. But the need arose for an active and zealous preacher in Dundee. Circumstances had occurred rendering it most important in the interest of the Scottish National Church that a wise choice should be made, and in 1873, Mr. MacLeod was prevailed upon by some of the leading men in his church to give up his position, which was one of the foremost in the Established Church of Scotland, in order that he might settle at Dundee.

Though singularly successful, because abundantly blessed by God, during all his previous ministry of the Gospel, it was in Dundee that he undertook his greatest, as it was certainly his most arduous work. It was a work of delicate and difficult character, and it required a man of faith and prayer as well as a man of courage and tact. It is no small evidence of Mr. MacLeod's excellences that his success at Dundee was conspicuous and assured.

In the year 1877, Mr. MacLeod was invited to two new charges at the same time, viz.—those of Jedburgh, and Maxwell parish, Glasgow. He preferred the former, and it was from the midst of its attached people that, on the 10th of June, 1881, he was transferred to the Scottish National Church, Crown Court, London, the picture of which is given in our frontispiece. We understand that Mr. MacLeod was twice called before he could bring himself to consent to succeed the late Dr. Cumming. His work is very naturally one of considerable responsibility, but the success that has attended Mr. MacLeod's labors in other spheres and his manifest dependence solely on the blessing of God encourages the hope that Crown Court Church may still exercise on the aristocracy and the poor of London the beneficial influence it exercised during the ministry of Dr. Cumming.

Why a Sermon was Discarded is Explained in a biographical notice of Rev. J. Phillips, an English Baptist minister who died in 1880. "One Saturday night, after Mr. Phillips had prayerfully studied his sermon, he felt a strange sense of oppression and heart-weariness. In the morning he said, 'I cannot preach this; I do not feel the Lord present with me.' His wife said, 'Pray, Get thee behind me, Satan.' He did, but entered the pulpit with a heavy heart. Service commenced. The time came for the text. He said, 'My friends, I cannot tell what oppresses me, but I cannot preach the sermon I prepared. Let us pray!' At the close he opened the Bible at Zech. 2 : 4, and read, 'Run, speak to that young man,' and without preparation spoke earnestly as God gave him utterance. It was many years before he understood the cause of his being prompted to lay aside one sermon and preach another on that particular Sunday. The explanation came when long afterward he went to a meeting at a neighboring parish. A young man sought him, and said: 'I am a stranger to you; you are not to me.' He replied, 'You are mistaken; I have not to my knowledge ever spoken to you.' 'Oh, yes, you have, sir. Do you not remember preaching some years ago from the words, 'Run, speak to that young man?' I am that young man! I entered the chapel to annoy you and others, but the hand of God arrested me. The arrow sped home, and here I am, a living monument of God's mercy, and a minister of that same Gospel.'"

THE MEANNESS OF INFIDELITY.

FOURTH REPLY TO MR. INGERSOLL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Morning, February 5, 1882.

"When Jehudi had read three or four leaves, he cut it with the penknife."—JEREMIAH 36: 23.

The Jehoiakim of our Day—What Penknives Cannot Do—Healthful Merriment—Ghastly Joking—The Joker at Spuyten Duyvil—Mr. Ingersoll's Jokes—I. Satirizing His Early Home—Mr. Ingersoll's Father—His Godly Mother—Questions from "Talmage's Catechism"—II. His Worthless Substitute for Consolation—The Anodyne of Trouble—III. His Substitute for the Hope of Heaven—The Don't Know Religion—A Conspiracy to Extinguish Light-houses—The Lights on the Eternal Coast—What Beneficial Institutions has Infidelity Founded?—The Complete Mission of Infidelity—The Pauper of the Universe—The Glorious Roll of Christian Worthies.

ON a former occasion I employed this text for a different purpose from that for which I shall employ it this morning. There sits Jehoiakim in the winter house, his feet to the fire which is blazing and crackling on the hearth. His private secretary, Jehudi, is reading to him from a scroll containing God's words to Jeremiah. Jehoiakim is displeased at the message, gets very red in the face, jumps up and snatches the scroll from the hand of his private secretary, takes out his penknife, and cuts and slashes it all to pieces.

Jehoiakim was under the impression that if he destroyed the scroll he would destroy the prophecy. Ah! no. Jeremiah immediately takes another scroll and the prophecy is redictated. The fact is that all the penknives ever made at Sheffield and in all the cutleries of the world cannot successfully destroy the Scriptures. We have a Jehoiakim in our day, Mr. Ingersoll, the representative of the infidelity of the hour, who proposes with his penknife to hack the Word of God to pieces. With that penknife he tries to stab Moses, and to stab Joshua, and to stab all the prophets and apostles, and evangelists, and to stab Christ, and to stab the God of the Bible; but while he is cutting to pieces his own copy of the Bible—for I suppose he has only one copy of this dangerous book in his house, and that carefully guarded and locked up so none of his friends may be poisoned by it—there are innumerable copies of the Bible being distributed.

No book, secular or religious, ever multiplied with such speed and into such vastness as the Word of God. Disraeli's, "Endymion," Macaulay's "History of England," Shakespeare's tragedies, having very small and limited reading and very small and limited sale and distribution as compared with this Book; which, after for centuries being bombarded by thousands of Ingersolls, to day has abroad over three hundred millions of copies. Where one Bible dies, ten thousand Bibles are born. Cut away, then, with your infidel penknives.

Mr. Ingersoll proposes—and when I mention his name I only mention him as the representative of thousands of people; of course we could not spend an hour or five minutes in the discussion of what one man says, but he is the exponent of thousands of people antagonistic to the Scriptures, and therefore I call him by name—Mr. Ingersoll with his knife-blade proposes to cut the Bible to pieces in ridicule. Now, no man was ever built with a keener appreciation of it. There is health in laughter instead of harm—physical health, mental health, moral health, spiritual health—provided you laugh at the right thing.

I LIKE FUN;

The morning is jocund. The Indian with its own mist baptizes the cataract Minnehaha, or laughing water. You have not kept your eyes open, or your ears alert, if you have not seen the sea smile, or heard the forests clap their hands, or the orchards in blossom-week agree with redolence. But there is a laughter which is deathful, there is a laughter which has the rebound of despair. It is not healthy to giggle about God, or chuckle about eternity, or smirk about the things of the immortal soul.

You know what caused the accident a few weeks ago on the Hudson River Railroad. It was an intoxicated man who for a joke pulled the string of the air brake and stopped the train at the most dangerous point of the journey. But the lightning train, not knowing there was any impediment in the way, came down crushing out of the mangled victims the immortal souls that went speeding instantly to God and judgment. It was only a joke. He thought it would be such fun to stop the train. He stopped it!

And so Mr. Ingersoll is chiefly anxious to stop the long train of the Bible, and the long train of the churches, and the long train of Christian influences, while coming down upon us are death, judgment, and eternity, coming a thousand miles a minute, coming with more force than all the avalanches that ever slipped from the Alps, coming with more strength than all the lightning express trains than ever whistled, or shrieked, or thundered across the continent. Stop! says Mr. Ingersoll, it is only a joke. It is a spectacle which almost splits him with laughter. It is a subject which, though agonizing the nations, throws him into uproars of laughter; and the theme of his funniest lecture, as you see it advertized, is the most stupendous question that was ever asked: "What must I do to be saved?" It is only a joke.

In my reply to the champion of infidelity, I have shown you in other discourses the untruth of infidelity, the blasphemy of it, the unfairness of it, the outrage of it. This morning, I show you the meanness of it, a subject upon which no one has yet dwelt—the meanness of infidelity.

I. Mr. Ingersoll in many of his lectures satirizes his early home. He demonstrates the meanness of infidelity by and leaving the people of this country under the impression that his father at least was a bigot, and a tyrant, and a fool. Now, can you imagine anything meaner than the assailing of a parent's reputation after he is dead and gone? I had a Christian ancestry of elevated type, but suppose my father or mother had been hypocritical and tyrannical, and bigoted, and bad, would it not have been debasing in me to have hooked up the horses to the ploughshare of contempt, and turned up the mound of their graves? It is a demonstration of the unutterable, the unnatural meanness of infidelity that assails a parent's reputation.

SATIRIZING HIS EARLY HOME,

We have two accounts of Mr. Ingersoll's parentage. One is, that he was a minister of the Presbyterian Church, a good man; on one occasion preaching a sermon under which over a hundred souls were converted to God, liberal in fraternization with all other denominations of Christians, indulgent to a fault with his children.

But I received during this last week a letter from one of the places of his residence which gives just the opposite account. It says of Mr. Ingersoll's father: "He was abstemious to a fault, and the family suffered accordingly. The children were commanded to eat, drink, and dress sparingly. He never spoke a kind word to his wife, who was a noble Christian woman, neither to his children, within the knowledge of persons now living here who were familiar with the family. At last the mother died. She was cared for by friends in her sickness, and on the day of interment gentle hands carried her form and rested it for a time on the catafalque. Mr. Ingersoll's father, to the astonishment of all present, deliberately removed his cravat and gloves, stepped on the rostrum and delivered a eulogy over the body. He attempted to extol her virtues and panegyricize her conduct. It was the first time he had ever been known publicly to speak well of her."

I know not which account is accurate. I prefer the former, because I prefer to think well of any man, living or dead. But that is not the question. It seems to me most mean, most insufferably mean, that a man should assail a parent gone. Far better the conduct of Shem and Japhet, who at their father's inebriation took a mantle and walked backward, and with averted eyes threw it over him to hide the shame.

While Mr. Ingersoll leads his audiences to believe that his father was a tyrant and a bigot, why does he not say something about his mother? All the accounts agree in saying she was a grandly good Christian woman. Why does he not tell us the source of her goodness? Where is the Bible she used to read? Is it still in the family? Why does he not extol her Christian graces? Has his father's frigidity made more impression upon him than his mother's tenderness? Where has she gone to? Has she gone to the same place with his dead father? He does not like the Westminster Assembly Catechism, or the Shorter Catechism. Perhaps he will answer a few questions of

TALMAGE'S CATECHISM!

How did religion seem to agree with her? Did the Christian religion make her cross and sour, and queer, and crabbed, or did it make her kind, and genial, and loving, and patient? Did it give her comfort in the days of trouble? Was she deluded with it to the last? In her dying hour was it a pest or an encouragement? He has left us to believe that his father was a tyrant and a bigot. Why does he not say something about his mother, his Christian mother, his sainted mother, at whose side, I warrant you, he used to kneel and say his evening prayers. Amid all the flowers of rhetoric can he not twist one garland for her memory?

He is said to be a very brave man. I dare him to do one thing. I dare him to take his mother's Bible and some Sunday afternoon go into his room, and locking the door, kneel down and while kneeling read the fourteenth chapter of John. Nothing there about Jonah and the whale; nothing there about the sun and moon stopping. Nothing there about the manner in which Eve was made. Certainly a man so brave that he defies the God of the Universe and scoffs at the army of martyrs, and apostles, and prophets, and bullies perdition—certainly, a man as brave as that ought to be brave enough on a Sabbath afternoon to go into his room and kneel down, if the door is locked, and read the fourteenth chapter of John.

O! it is insufferably mean, it is accursedly mean, that a man should throw a cloud of obloquy on his early home when there was at least one parent who loved God, kept His commandments, and lived a grandly beautiful and useful life. I stand at the door of the sepulchre of that Christian mother and I cry out for justice from the infidel lecturer. O! ungrateful man, you are nothing to the bosom that nursed you and the arm that encircled you, and the lips that prayed for you, and the hands that were blistered for you, and the shoulders that stooped to carry your burdens. You do not believe in the Bible, you do not believe in the God of the Bible. Do you believe in your mother?

I do not implead you by John Calvin's God, for you say he is a fiend; I do not implead you by John Wesley's God, for you say he is a fanatic; I do not implead you by the God of the Westminster Catechism; I do not implead you by your father's God; but I implead you by your mother's God. By the birth pang that launched you, by the Christian cradle that rocked you, by the solemn hour in which you were held up in the old country meeting house while the minister of religion said: "Robert, I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost"—by that God I implead you to reconsider, and turn and live.

I hold before you that bombardment of the early home and that maligning of the Christian consecration and devotion—I hold all that before you as specimens of the meanness of infidelity. I know nothing to equal it in all the day. I do not know another man on the American Continent who would do it, who would stoop to do it.

II. Mr. Ingersoll also shows the meanness of infidelity, demonstrates the meanness of infidelity, by trying to

SUBSTITUTE FOR THE CHIEF CONSOLATION of the world absolutely nothing. You have only to hear him at the edge of the grave, or at the edge of the coffin, discoursing, to find out that there is no comfort in infidelity. There is more good cheer in the hooting of an owl at midnight than in his discourses at the verge of the grave. You might as well ask the spirit of eternal darkness to discourse on the brightness of everlasting day. You know there are millions of people who get their chief consolation from this Holy Book. Now, Mr. Ingersoll proposes to take away that consolation. What do you think of it? What would you think of a crusade of this sort? Suppose a man should resolve that he would organize a conspiracy to destroy all the medicines from all the apothecaries and from all the hospitals of the earth. The work is done. The medicines are taken and they are thrown into the river, or the lake, or the sea. A patient wakes up at midnight in a paroxysm of distress and wants an anodyne. "O," says the nurse, "the anodynes are all destroyed; we have no drops to give you, but instead of that I'll read you a lecture on the absurdities of morphine, and on the absurdities of all remedies." But the man continues to writhe in pain, and the nurse says: "I'll continue to read you some discourses on anodynes, the cruelties of anodynes, the indecencies of anodynes, the absurdities of anodynes. For your groan, I'll give you a laugh."

Here in the hospital is a patient having a gangrened limb amputated. He says, "O! for ether. O! for chloroform." The doctors say, "Why, they are all destroyed; we don't have any more chloroform, or ether; but I have got something a great deal better. I'll read you a lecture on the mistakes of James Y. Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform as an anæsthetic, and upon the mistakes of Doctors Agnew, and Hamilton, and Hosack, and Mott, and Harvey, and Abernethy." "But," says the man, "I must have some anæsthetics." "No," say the doctors, "they are all destroyed, but we have got something a great deal better." "What is that?" "Fun." Fun about medicines.

Lie down, all ye patients in Bellevue Hospital and stop your groaning—all ye broken hearted of all the cities, and quit your crying; we have the catholicon at last! Here is a dose of wit, here is a strengthening plaster of sarcasm, here is a bottle of ribaldry that you are to keep well shaken up and take a spoonful of after each meal, and if that does not cure you, here is a solution of blasphemy in which you may bathe, and here is a tincture of derision. Tickle the skeleton of death with a repartee! Make the King of Terrors cackle! For all the agonies of all the ages, a joke!

Millions of people willing with uplifted hand toward heaven to affirm that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is full of consolation for them, and yet, Mr. Ingersoll proposes to take it away, giving nothing, absolutely nothing, except fun. Is there any greater height, or depth, or length, or breadth, or immensity of meanness in all God's universe!

III. Mr. Ingersoll still further demonstrates the meanness of infidelity by trying to substitute for the Bible explanation of the future world

A RELIGION OF "DON'T KNOW."

Is there a God? Don't know! Is the soul immortal? Don't know! If we should meet each other in the future world will we recognize each other? Don't know! This man proposes to substitute the religion of "don't know" for the religion of "I know." I know in whom I have believed. "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Infidelity proposes to substitute a religion of awful negatives for our religion of glorious positives showing right before us a world of reunion and ecstasy, and high companionship, and glorious worship, and stupendous victory; the mightiest joy of earth not high enough to reach to the base of the Himalaya of uplifted splendor awaiting all those who on wing of Christian faith will soar toward it.

Have you heard of the conspiracy to put out all the lighthouses on the coast? Do you know that on a certain night of next month, Eddystone Lighthouse, Bell Rock Lighthouse, Sherryvore Lighthouse, Montauk Lighthouse, Hatteras Lighthouse, New London Lighthouse, Barnegat Lighthouse, and the 640 lighthouses on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts are to be extinguished? "O!" you say, "what will become of the ships on that night? What will be the fate of the one million sailors following the sea? What will be the doom of the millions of passengers? Who will arise to put down such a conspiracy?" Every man, woman, and child in America, and the world.

But that is only a fable. That is what infidelity is trying to do, put out all the lighthouses on the coast of eternity, letting the soul go up the "Narrows" of death with no light, no comfort, no peace

—all that coast covered with the blackness of darkness. Instead of the great lighthouse, a glow-worm of wit, a firefly of jocosity. Which do you like the better, O! voyager for eternity—the firefly or the lighthouse? What a mission infidelity has started on! The extinguishment of lighthouses, the breaking up of lifeboats, the dismissal of all the pilots, the turning of the inscription on your child's grave into a farce and a lie.

Walter Scott's "Old Mortality," chisel in hand, went through the land to cut out into plainer letters the half obliterated inscriptions on the tombstones, and it was a beautiful mission. But Mr. Ingersoll is spending his life, and the men who are like him are spending their lives, with hammer and chisel trying to cut out from the tombstones of your dead all the story of resurrection and Heaven. He is the iconoclast of every village graveyard, and of every city cemetery, and of Westminster Abbey. Instead of Christian consolation for the dying, a freezing sneer.

INSTEAD OF PRAYER, A GRIMACE.

Instead of Paul's triumphant defiance of death, a going out you know not where, to stop you know not when, to do you know not what. That is Infidelity.

To show that Infidelity can provide no substitute for what it proposes to destroy, I ask you to mention the names of the merciful and the educational institutions which Infidelity founded and is supporting, and has supported all the way through; institutions pronounced against God and the Christian religion and yet pronounced in behalf of suffering humanity. What are the names of them? Certainly not the United States Christian Commission, or the Sanitary Commission; for Christian George H. Stuart was the president of the one, and Christian Henry W. Bellows was the president of the other. Where are the asylums and merciful institutions founded by Infidelity and supported by Infidelity, pronounced against God and the Bible, and yet doing work for the alleviation of suffering? Infidelity is so very loud in its braggadocio it must have some to mention.

Certainly if you come to speak of educational institutions it is not Yale, it is not Harvard, it is not Princeton, it is not Middletown, it is not Cambridge or Oxford, it is not any institution from which a diploma would not be a disgrace. Do you point to the German universities as exceptions? I have to tell you that all the German universities today are under positive Christian influences, except the University of Heidelberg, where the ruffianly students cut and maul and mangle and murder each other as a matter of pride instead of infamy. The duello is the chief characteristic of that institution.

There stands Christianity. There stands Infidelity. Compare what they have done. Compare their resources. There is Christianity, a prayer on her lip; a benediction on her brow; both hands full of help for all who want help; the mother of thousands of colleges; the mother of thousands of asylums for the oppressed, the blind, the sick, the lame, the imbecile; the mother of missions for the bringing back of the outcast; the mother of thousands of reformatory institutions for the saving of the lost; the mother of innumerable Sabbath schools bringing millions of children under a drill to prepare them for respectability and usefulness, to say nothing of the great future. That is Christianity.

Here is Infidelity; no prayer on her lips, no benediction on her brow, both hands clenched—what for? To fight Christianity. That is the entire business,

THE COMPLETE MISSION, OF INFIDELITY, to fight Christianity. Where are her schools, her colleges, her asylums of mercy? Let me throw you down a whole ream of foolscap paper that you may fill all of it with the names of her beneficent institutions, the colleges and the asylums, the institutions of mercy and of learning, founded by Infidelity and supported alone by Infidelity, pronounced against God and the Christian religion and yet in favor of marking the world better. "O," you say, "a ream of paper is too much for the names of those institutions." Well then, I throw you a quire of paper. Fill it all up now. I will wait until you get all the names down. "O," you say, "that is too much." Well, then, I will just hand you a sheet of letter paper. Just fill up the four sides while we are talking of this matter, with the names of the merciful institutions and the educational institutions founded by Infidelity and supported all along by Infidelity, pronounced against God and the Christian religion, yet in favor of humanity. "O!" you say, "that is too much room; we don't want a whole sheet of paper to write down the names."

Perhaps I had better tear out one leaf from my hymn book and ask you to fill up both sides of it with the names of such institutions. "O!" you say, "that would be too much room; you wouldn't want so much room as that." Well, then, suppose you count them on your ten fingers. "O," you say, "not quite so much as that." Well, then, count them on the fingers of one hand. "O," you say, "we don't want quite so much room as that." Suppose, then, you halt and count on one finger the name of any institution founded by Infidelity, supported entirely by Infidelity, pronounced against God and the Christian religion, yet toiling to make the world better. Not one! Not one!

Is infidelity so poor, so starveling, so mean, so useless? Get out,

YOU MISERABLE PAUPER OF THE UNIVERSE!

Crawl into some rat hole of everlasting nothingness. Infidelity standing to-day amid the suffering, groaning, dying nations and yet doing absolutely nothing save trying to impede those who are toiling until they fall exhausted into their graves in trying to make the world better. Gather up all the work, all the merciful work, that Infidelity has ever done, add it all together, and there is not so much nobility in it as in the smallest bead of that sister of charity who last night went up the dark alley of the town, put a jar of jelly for an invalid appetite on a broken stand, and then knelt on the bare floor, praying the mercy of Christ upon the dying soul.

Infidelity scrapes no lint for the wounded, bakes no bread for the hungry, shakes up no pillow for the sick, rouses no comfort for the bereft, gilds no grave for the dead. While Christ, our Christ, our wounded Christ, our risen Christ, the Christ of this old-fashioned Bible—blessed be His glorious name forever!—our Christ stands this morning pointing to the hospital, or to the asylum, saying: "I was sick and ye gave me a couch, I was lame and ye gave me a crutch, I was blind and ye physicked my eyesight, I was orphaned and ye mothered my soul, I was lost on the mountains and ye brought me home; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it to me."

O! what a magnificent array of men and women have been made by the religion of the Bible. I cannot call it would take me all of this day and to-night, and to-morrow to call the roll. I call the roll only of a part of one company of a regiment of a battalion of an army of magnificent men and women innumerable: John Howard, John Milton, David Brainard, George Whitefield, Martin Luther, Adoniram Judson, Alexander Duff, Henry Martyn, William Wilberforce, Richard Cobden, Bishop McIlvaine, James A. Garfield, George Washington, Victoria the Queen; Hannah More, Charlotte Elizabeth, Harriet Newell, Mrs. Sigourney, Florence Nightingale, Lucretia Mott, and ten thousand other men and women, living and dead, standing in the present and in the past, aflame with the transpicuous glories of the Christian religion!

THE ROLL;

Thirty-three Homeless Boys were Sent to Culpeper Co., Va., by Mr. Whitelaw Reid, on January 31st. This is the twelfth party Mr. Reid has assisted to emigrate from New York. Of the eleven parties previously sent out under Mr. Reid's direction, numbering nearly 500 persons, only two boys are known to have returned to New York. This was the second party sent to Virginia, and was despatched in response to requests from farmers who knew that the former party had turned out creditably. Most of the boys were orphans, and all were homeless and friendless.

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 70.)

Miles in Ireland—Arrest of Conspirators—Lord Edward Fitzgerald's Capture—Miles Visits his Parents—Recognized by his Retriever—His Secession from the Romish Communion Confessed to his Mother—The Priest's said Requested.

WHEN Miles Rossiter reached Dublin, he found the city in agitation. A man named Reynolds, a silk merchant, had turned government informer; and the chief members of the General Republican Committee, with the exception of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, had been surprised in a house in Bridge Street and placed under arrest by a Major Swan; who had also secured a large number of most compromising documents. The committee when surprised had tried to burn these papers in the room, but Swan, drawing a pistol, promptly stopped even the show of such endeavor.

It was generally supposed that Lord Edward Fitzgerald had hastened north to a brother's estate there, and that from thence he would escape the country; but Miles, who had by secret signs made himself known to trusted confederates, knew better. This unfortunate nobleman, who from his rank, boldness, and social position, was the acknowledged head of the whole conspiracy, never left the city; and was now ensconced in the house of a Mr. Francis Magan, a barrister, Usher's Island, who had been once a member of the Society of United Irishmen. There Miles obtained an interview with Lord Edward; and conveyed to him the message he had been commissioned to bear from Paris, namely, that another French invasion would be attempted, early in the year; giving him the intended place of landing—the coast of Wexford—and urging the Irish confederates to be courageous and ready.

Miles was much struck with the appearance and manner of the rebel nobleman. He was tall, of a well-knit frame and handsome features; and as Lord Holland declared in after days, "of a sweet and gentle disposition;" that is, when not aroused. "Gentle when stroked, fierce when provoked," is a phrase which, it is said, exactly describes Ireland; and the same words would as correctly describe this, her ill-fated son; the impulsive, fiery-souled, and chivalrous Geraldine.

"You see," said Lord Edward to Miles, "that it must be feared there are traitors in our camp, Rossiter. Never would the authorities have been able to surprise our committee as they have done, unless some Judas were among us. But, no matter, we shall dare the worst. Others have taken the place of those captured; our Republican Council is again complete; and if you can return word to our friends in France, tell them, that at the hour they name we shall be ready. Ho! then for the days of English disaster, but of Irish freedom; and the return of her ancient happiness and glory!"

Miles declared that he was not to go back at once to France, since he had been commissioned by Hoche to proceed to his native barony of Firth, there to advance Republican doctrines and make arrangements, as far as possible, for the approaching French landing; but added that he would secure some means of conveying his lordship's message.

With mutual expressions of good-will and hope, Miles parted from Lord Edward, but never to see him again; for, as is well-known, a party of armed officials, some days after, led by a foresworn fellow-conspirator, tracked the betrayed nobleman to his place of concealment—the feather store of a Michael Murphy, Thomas Street; and came upon him suddenly, when reclining half dressed upon a bed.

The surprised Lord Edward, though warned it was vain to resist, grasping a wave-bladed dagger, sprang upon the intruders, Major Swan and Captain Ryan, like an infuriated tiger startled from its lair; and, nerved by the courage of despair, inflicted several stabs upon his captors.

Wounded in the shoulder, however, by a pistol-shot, fired by a Major Sirr, who came to their aid—which hurt in a few days proved fatal—he was, after a most desperate resistance, overpowered, made prisoner, and borne, bleeding and faint, to a jail cell; and only escaped the hangman's rope by death from his wound before his day for trial.

This is the brief record of a dreadful and sorrowful episode in Irish history; one which, however, it is well to be reminded of.

* * * * *

When Miles entered his father's home in Barony Firth he was not recognized. Wishing to test the completeness of his disguise, he resolved, though with great violence and restraint upon his feelings, to preserve for a little his incognito, even to his mother. Max, his retriever dog, now grown old, was the first to discover him. When Miles entered the house, Max growled and showed his teeth, and gave signs of his displeasure. At the sound of Miles's voice, however, though much changed, the large, black, noble-looking animal pricked up his ears, and with head erect stared into Miles's face; then moving close to him, for a moment or two he sniffed around his young master's legs and feet, and soon solved the mystery which had for awhile perplexed him. He who stood in the room, hat in hand, was no intrusive and hostile stranger, but was his long-lost human companion and friend. With a cry of joy, half bark and half excited whine, that startled the whole household, he bounded upon Miles, almost overthrowing him, and licked his hands and face, wagging his tail all the while most furiously.

"Down, Max! down, sir!" cried Miles. The words, said in his accustomed tones, were an instantaneous revelation. In an instant the returned exile was folded in the arms of his mother, weeping in her gladness; and was clasped in the embrace of his overjoyed father.

Miles had a long and exciting story to pour into the ears of his astonished parents. They had heard, indeed, indistinct and disjointed reports of the events which had lately convulsed the civilized world—but had no true conception of what had taken place until they heard, from the lips of their own son, a connected and authentic narrative. Old Mrs. Rossiter wept over the sorrows and miserable fate of the French monarch and his queen, and of their household, as recited by Miles; and mourned over the ruthless massacre of priests and nobles and gentlemen, in Paris and over the whole French provinces; but Miles's father, while deeply stirred by the tale of disaster which had befallen the upper classes on the continent, felt a deeper interest in the news he heard of men of his own order rising up, in their might, to the assertion of the common rights of humanity.

"But, Miles dear, where is your priest's dress?" said his mother to him, two or three days after his arrival. "I have been longin' to see you in it, Alannah, to feast a mother's pride, you know. Of course it was well to thravel here in disguise, for the times is dangerous—but here, among friends, you can show your colors, my son, and appear what you are; and besides, Father John, you know, will be wantin' you wan o' these days to be sayin' mass for him."

Miles's face colored at the words of his mother. The discovery which he now must make was one which he had desired to put off to the last moment; for he knew that his abandonment of the priesthood would excite both the horror and indignation of his parents—both of whom were most devoted adherents of their church—and not only this, if the news of his religious defection were to spread abroad in the district, it would go far to hinder the whole success of his mission. The Barony of Firth he knew would refuse to accept the lead of one who, it would be supposed, had become a religious renegade.

"Oh, mother," said Miles, after a pause, "I am sorry to tell you I have no priest's garments to put on; and, indeed, if I had, mother—if I had—to tell you the truth—I could not honestly wear them."

At these last words his mother gave him a pained and penetrating look. "You see, the fact is, mother," he added, with a laugh, "priests have become superseded articles in the land I come from, and soldiers are the rage. It is true, I assure you." But observing the flash of anger which this saying excited, he changed his phrase. "I mean, mother, that, for months and months, to be a priest in Paris would have been to court death; and I did not wish to die without seeing you again, and so I dropped being a student for Holy Church; and turned soldier."

"A curious calling to take up to preserve your life," was the acute response of the old lady; "but of course, Miles, since now you have come to a land where priests are not threatened, but loved and honored, you will return to the holy calling to which, from your very cradle, I have consecrated you."

Miles felt himself getting still deeper into a sore difficulty. He did not wish to deceive his mother; and yet he knew that if he were to disclose his real sentiments, and tell her the whole truth about his change of ideas and practice, he would shock her firmly-seated and most sacred beliefs; and would even run great risk of turning her affection into hatred, and of making her disown him.

After a few moments' reflection, however, he concluded to trust a mother's instinctive and unchanging love; he, therefore, softening matters as far as possible, gave her a full and true account of the steps by which he had been led to see that the sacerdotal office was both a superstition and a tyranny; that the powers it claimed were at once a usurpation and a cheat; for that no man could convey, by virtue of his office, supernatural, or, for the matter of that, even natural grace; and that to exercise dominion over human consciences was a despotism the most degrading to man and dishonoring to God; that Christ alone, who died for men, was the only true Priest, as He is the all-sufficient sacrifice; and, that they who believe in Him for their soul's salvation, are alone His free-men, and "all are slaves besides."

The words chosen by Miles to convey his thoughts and feelings were, of course, much more mild and measured than those which we have employed; but, state the matter as he would, it was news altogether too dreadful for his mother to hear patiently. Listening in breathless astonishment and terror, after a while she raised her hands and waved them protestingly; and then burst into a flood of tears.

The fond expectation she had cherished for years was dashed miserably to the ground; and her son—her only and long-absent son—had returned to her worse even than a heretic; for Miles, first forsaking and then denouncing the priesthood, seemed, to her shuddering thoughts, an utter apostate.

She did not, however, load him with accusing words or passionate reproaches; her heart felt too broken and awe-stricken for the energy of anger. She buried her face in her hands, as she sat upon the old arm-chair in the room, and swaying her body to and fro, she wept and sobbed piteously.

Miles gazed in sadness, as with half-bent head he stood before her. "Oh, Truth, Truth!" he said, within himself, "thou art more precious than gold, and thy light is more blessed than the sunshine; and yet there is sorrow to those who embrace thee. Our best loved idols at thy bidding must be banished from our hearts and be shaken to the dust. And not only so, to be faithful to thee is often, alas! to forfeit the love and honor of those dearest to us, who blindly cling to the delusions which we are forced to abandon. But hold to thee we must, for the soul that once has seen thy beauteous light, can never again go back to its former phantom-haunted darkness."

His mother still kept weeping, and Miles still kept silently gazing. He was searching into his thoughts for words to mitigate her grief; but after a long and anxious quest he could discover none. None would satisfy her that did not express a return to his early credulity, but that was a thing impossible; it would be to speak falsehood, or to annihilate his own mind's history.

Despairing of comforting his mother by anything he could say he quietly withdrew; and believing in the power of the open air to soothe his perturbed feelings, he left his father's cottage for a stroll into the fields, now beautiful in their early summer verdure. He had another motive likewise for his retired walk, he was to attend a meeting of confederates in the evening, and he wished to ponder over the matter and the method of his statements.

His mother heard his hand upon the latch and saw him go out; and, like a thorough-going devotee, she resolved to bear her sorrow to him whom she deemed the best consoler; she would go, without the delay of an hour, to her priest, Father John; would make known to him her bitter grief, and ask what had best be done to reclaim her son, lost in unbelief. She knew not the voice of Him who says, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

(To be continued.)

PARABLE OF THE SOWER.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 19. Mark 4: 1-20. Golden Text, Luke 8: 18; Rev. 2: 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE same day of which we were speaking in our last lesson (Matt 13: 1) the Lord Jesus went out from the house and continued His teaching by the sea-side. "Much people were gathered together, and were come to Him out of every city" (Luke 8: 4), "and He taught them many things by parables." The first of these was the parable of the sower, and we may judge of its importance from the fact that it is related by the first three evangelists. It gives a clue to understanding both His teaching and what we see in our daily life and work for God. He says with regard to it, "Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?" "Behold there went out a sower to sow, and the sower, whoever he may be, 'soweth the word.'" "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man" (Matt. 13: 37), but there are other sowers of the word also. "Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters" (Isa. 32: 20); "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him" (Ps. 126: 5, 6).

The seed, good in itself, is sown on diverse soils. The first mentioned is "the wayside." What an apt picture of the unconverted! open to every influence, bad and good; any foot may tread there, religious impressions may come, but they must go again; there all passes on, nothing gets in, it is hard, unyielding, unfruitful. Such are brought in contact with the word, and "Satan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts." They are not moved enough by the truth of God to be against it, they have no objection to attend religious meetings, but

NOTHING TOUCHES THEM.

Satan takes good care that when anything is said which is calculated to arouse them, the flower in a neighbor's bonnet, the cut of a gentleman's coat, some peculiarity in the speaker's manner, or tone of voice, or something in the construction of the building, shall be occupying them, and if you ask them, "Did they hear such and such parts of the discourse?" you will find they have never heard it at all. Thousands upon thousands, the majority of those who are around us, are in this condition. The active opponents of God's truth are a much smaller company; there must be some personal interest at stake in order that a man should be stirred up to oppose the Gospel; many of the priests who had opposed the Lord Jesus were afterwards obedient to the faith, Saul the persecutor became the giant evangelist of his day.

Some seed "fell on stony ground, where it had not much earth; and immediately it sprang up, because it had no depth of earth: but when the sun was up, it was scorched; and because it had no root, it withered away." Our Lord does not leave us in ignorance as to the meaning of this: these are they "who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness;" there is a fair promise of fruit; signs of life are there, joy in the sense of God's pardon, delight in the company of Christians, in Bible reading, in the singing of hymns, are found in these, so long as their pleasure is increased thereby. But a time comes when it is a question of following Christ; if they follow Jesus, some attachment to a worldly man or a worldly girl must be renounced, some long-cherished pleasure (it may be light reading or perhaps some darling ambition) is seen to be inconsistent, they are unwilling to decide for Him against themselves. They are willing to take all they can get from Him which ministers to their pleasure, but have never had the least intention of themselves becoming living sacrifices for His pleasure; they are living still unto themselves and not unto Him which died for them and rose again.

The Lord does not reckon it to be a proof of the badness of the sowing that some fell away. He has shown us that it will and must be so. It is these unsatisfactory cases which drive or ought to drive His working children to prayer, that the rain and the sun may wear down the rock of these hard hearts into soil, which shall eventually bring forth fruit. In all our work for God we must remember that He has His eye not only on the work, but the workers. If all soils were good, the success of our labor might be such that we should run the risk of losing our dependence upon Him, and the balance of prayer and effort might not be so effectually kept up. "But," ask some, "are we to look upon these souls as converted at all? if we must wait till the harvest, how can we be sure of any?" If we put personal feeling out of the question, if we are content to be misjudged when others attribute the falling away of our converts to some want in us, or even if we are willing to be thought deceived, all becomes simple; it is self-vindication which complicates matters; this parable is explanation enough for any real seeker after truth.

"Some fell among thorns; and the thorns grew up, and choked it, and it yielded no fruit." "That which beareth thorns and briars is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned" (Heb. 6: 8).

PREOCCUPIED HEARTS,

divided hearts, attempting to solve the problem which God never intended to be solved, how to serve God and mammon! O the wretchedness of these divided hearts which have tasted and seen "that the Lord is gracious," and yet the "cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful." Where God comes by His word into a heart He wants all the room, there is none for anything else, and this miserable attempt to harmonize what is so totally distinct is a wrong to our beloved Lord. When He saves a man, He is ready to save him entirely, and to make him as free from care as from sin. O how few understand that God means what He says when He directs us, "In nothing be anxious; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God; and the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4: 6, 7, Rev. Ver.)

God purposely brings us into difficulties and perplexities, that we may be exercised in trusting Him to bring us through them. If He set us no exercise but that which we could master without Him, we should be independent of our God, but He puts us into positions in which we cannot see before us, because He wants to be eyes to us; where we cannot judge, because He would be our Judge and Counsellor; where we have no power, because He wills to be strength for us. The exercise of faith is to refer everything as it arises to Him, yielding up to Him both our opinions and our will, that He may be all in all. And this is every detail about rent, clothing, plans, children's education, health, reputation, everything which Satan has tried to make an anxiety to us.

Besides the cares of this world, there is the deceitfulness of riches, which chokes the word and render it unfruitful. There is

NO HARDER MASTER THAN RICHES, it brings such slavery with it. The rich man thinks that he must keep up his position, it is expected of him, he must have a large house, and therefore a great many servants, and then a butler is needed to oversee the men, and a housekeeper to oversee the women. And rich people, sometimes even religious people, look upon this slavery as a necessity, and they do not know the luxury of waiting upon one's self, and the privilege of saving for God's work the money which goes in this burdensome state, this bondage to what people expect of one. "But," says one, "if I were to alter my style of life, I should lose my position." Then such a position is not worth retaining. Truly if a large house and grounds, servants and carriages are pressed into the service of God, well; if not, they are part of the deceitfulness of riches which choke the word and it becometh unfruitful.

Then "the lusts of other things entering in." Whatever distracts from the one main aim of a Christian's life, however innocent in itself, chokes the word. Many a Christian man of refined taste is living as though immortal souls were not perishing all round him; his tastes are innocent in themselves, but where is the fruit of the word in his life, where is the self-denial, where is the unworldliness, where are the precious souls won? The lusts of other things choke the word, he is taking advantage of Christ's death to save him from hell, and trying hard to make the best of both worlds, to the entire disregard of the claims of that crucified Saviour. Is this a life worthy of Him who sought not His own?

But we come to the good ground. "These are they which are sown on good ground; such as hear the word, and receive it, and bring forth fruit with patience" (Luke 8: 15). It is not specified here whether "the word" signifies simply the message of salvation from the condemnation and power of sin, or whether all the teachings of the Word of God, as they are sown from time in our hearts, are here meant; we incline to the latter. The characteristics of the good ground are hearing, receiving, and fruit-bearing. They hear, they possess a teachable spirit, a willingness to learn, and they also receive it—take it right in, give it room in the heart, in the will, in the life: give themselves up to be transformed by it, humbled by it, turned inside out by it, used by it, offered as a sacrifice by it. These bring forth fruit, but not all in the same measure, "some thirty-fold, some sixty, and some an hundred." In some soils there is more of moisture, more of the living water, and an hundred-fold is brought forth for God; in others, where there is less fertility, a lesser harvest is to be found; but always when the fallow ground of the heart has been broken up, and the plough of God's loving discipline has come through it; always where there has been no flinching from the winter frost of misunderstanding or the burning sun of persecution, there always is and there always must be fruit to the glory of God.

A Hand was Saved by Faith and Prayer

some time ago. The incident was described recently by a minister of the Gospel. He said: "I once knew a little boy who had a very bad sore on his right hand. It got worse, in spite of all that was done for it. At last it began to mortify, and the doctor said it would have to be taken off in order to save his life. The day was fixed for the operation. The little boy was a Christian. When he heard the doctor say that his hand must be cut off, he felt very sad; he did not want to lose his right hand. So he went to a quiet, shady spot in the garden, and there kneeled down and prayed that God would make his hand better, and let it get well again without having to be cut off. The next day, when the doctor came to look at his hand, he was very much surprised to find it looking a great deal better. The next day it was better still; and the third day, he said he thought it was going to get well, and that it would not be necessary to have it taken off. The little boy grew up to be a man. He became a minister; and this," said the speaker, holding up his hand, "is the right hand that was saved by prayer from being cut off. And I hold up this hand before you as a proof of the blessings that may be obtained in answer to prayer." "In everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God" (Phil. 4: 6).

"John Ploughman's Talk:" by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. In paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 cents; ten per cent less to ministers and the trade. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Senator Sherman's Refunding Bill in its amended form was carried in the Senate on Friday, February 3d, by a vote of 38 to 18. The affirmative vote was composed of twenty Republicans, sixteen Democrats, and two Independents. In the negative there were five Republicans and thirteen Democrats. Among the Republicans who voted against the Bill was ex-Secretary of the Treasury Windom, who urged that the debt was already in good shape, and that it was unwise to disturb it. In the course of the debate a resolution was passed declaring valid the bonds issued by Mr. Windom. The alterations effected in the bill during its progress through the Senate affect its arrangement for the redemption of the new bonds. Instead of their being irredeemable for five years, as Mr. Sherman proposed, they may be called in at the option of the Government, with the proviso that they shall not be paid while other bonds bearing a higher rate of interest and payable at the option of the Government are unpaid. A compromise was effected on the amendment affecting the national banks. As the Bill now stands any bank deciding to withdraw its circulation must give thirty days' notice, and not more than $5,000,000 must be withdrawn in any one month. The Bill has now to pass the ordeal of criticism in the House, where it is likely to meet with considerable opposition.

The Subject of the Electoral Count is Under the consideration of the House Committee on the law respecting the election of President and Vice-President. A Washington correspondent of a New York journal who is generally well informed, telegraphs that the members of the committee "are substantially agreed that all disputed questions arising in any State as to who are the Presidential Electors properly chosen at any election shall be referred to the Supreme Court or some other designated judicial tribunal of the State, and that its decision thereon shall be final, so far as the counting and declaration of the Electoral vote of that State by the Vice-President or President of the Senate of the United States is concerned." He also states that the committee expect to have settled all details of their bill and be "ready to report before the end of the month. It is the intention then to consider and, if practicable, to agree upon a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing in detail for the counting of the electoral votes and the decision of all disputed questions arising therein."

An Exciting Controversy has been Carried on during the past two weeks respecting Mr. Blaine's policy while he held the office of Secretary of State. Important instructions issued by the ex-secretary before he quitted office have been revoked by Mr. Frelinghuysen. This implies either that the President did not know of the instructions Mr. Blaine issued, or that he has altered his mind since Mr. Frelinghuysen accepted office. The question is one of some importance, and has not yet been authoritatively answered. The despatches, about which the dispute rages most hotly, are those Mr. Blaine sent to Mr. Hurlburt and Mr. Trescott on the settlement of the war between Chili and Peru, in which the United States appeared as the friend of Peru. Mr. Frelinghuysen now represents the President as disclaiming any right to dictate in the matters at issue, and as merely offering his good offices impartially to both republics in the interests of peace. Other despatches, too, beside those to Chili and Peru have been revoked, and a marked change of policy is observed. It is expected that a thorough investigation of Mr. Blaine's conduct while in office will be made by Congress with the view of ascertaining whether he acted on his own responsibility or with the approval of President Arthur.

The Assassin of President Garfield was on Saturday last sentenced by Judge Cox to be hanged on Friday, June 30th. Mr. Scoville's argument in application for a new trial was heard on February 3d. Guiteau was present and occasionally interrupted the proceedings. The District Attorney and Mr. Davidge replied, and on the following day Judge Cox pronounced his decision overruling the motion. In passing sentence the judge said to the prisoner: "It would have been a comfort to many people if the verdict of the jury had established the fact that your act was that of an irresponsible man. It would have left the people the satisfying belief that the crime of political assassination was something entirely foreign to the institutions and civilization of our country; but the result has denied them that comfort. * * * Your own testimony seems to controvert the theories of your counsel. They have maintained and thought honestly, I believe, that you were driven against your will by an insane impulse to commit the act; but your testimony showed that you deliberately resolved to do it, and that a deliberate and misguided will was the sole impulse. This may seem insanity to some persons, but the law looks upon it as a wilful crime." Guiteau listened to the solemn words of the dread sentence, and then broke out in a torrent of abuse on judge, counsel, and jury. He defended his crime, claimed that nothing but good had come to the nation from President Garfield's death, and reiterated his blasphemous declaration that God had inspired him to commit the deed. He continued shouting his anathemas on all concerned until he was led out of court to the prison van.

One of the Most Disastrous Fires New York has witnessed in a quarter of a century occurred on Tuesday, January 31st. The Potter building, at the corner of Park Row and Beekman Street and extending through the block to Nassau Street, was wholly destroyed, and it was thought for some time that the fire would extend to adjoining premises occupied by the New York Times, and that other large edifices in the neighborhood would suffer. Happily the Times building was firmly built, and a thick party wall protected it until the deluge of water poured on its roof and walls by the firemen stemmed the progress of the fire. The burned building was an old one, and the flames, which originated in a defective flue, were carried by the elevator shaft to the roof, so that passers-by describe the outburst of smoke and flame from the basement and the fourth story as simultaneous. The offices of the New York World were formerly in the building, but they had been removed within a few weeks, and it was mainly devoted to small offices, in which a large number of persons were employed. So rapid was the progress of the fire that by the time the alarm was given, those in the upper stories found the staircases and the walls of the corridors on fire and had no way of escape but by the windows. Some jumped from these to the street below and were killed, or suffered serious injuries; others crawled along the stone ledge on the outside to the Times building, while others—it is not yet known how many—fell back into the flames and were burned to death. In little over an hour from the time when the first alarm was given, the building was completely gutted, and nothing remained but the four walls, which threatened to topple over and bury the firemen at any moment. The walls were at length overturned by the hook and ladder companies, but the ruins continued to smoulder for several days, and it was not until Saturday that the work of removal of debris and the search for the dead bodies could be commenced.

One Hundred and Fifty Persons are Supposed to have been in the Potter building when the fire broke out. Among these were Dr. S. Irenæus Prime, his brother, Dr. E. D. G. Prime, and Dr. C. A. Stoddard, the editors of the Observer, the offices of which were in the building. Dr. E. D. G. Prime thus described his escape to a reporter: "I was writing at my desk in an inner room on the third floor of the Park Row side, when some one in the outer office gave an alarm of fire. It was followed almost immediately by a puff of smoke, and I judged there was no time to be lost in getting out. I had expected a fire for a long time, and as the building was a perfect tinder-box, I knew that when one occurred it would be advisable to move quickly. I put on my coat, and ran after the clerks in the outer office. They had just taken time to close the safes, and then ran for their lives. My brother ran out without his hat. Dr. Stoddard and I, on reaching the hallway, found the smoke so thick and the heat so intense that we were afraid to venture down the stairs. We opened a window and crawled along a broad stone ledge to the Times building, holding on by the Observer sign. We descended at once from the Times building to the street, and yet so rapid had been the spread of the flames that when I reached the street I could see that the desk at which I had been seated was in flames."

An Influential Meeting was Held in Chickering Hall, New York, on Wednesday, February 1st, to express the indignation evoked by the outrages perpetrated on the Jews of Russia. Mayor Grace presided, and after appropriate resolutions had been passed, Hon. William M. Evarts, ex-Secretary of State, delivered an address. He said the persecutions had taken almost every awful form. Men had been cruelly murdered, women violently outraged, and children dashed to death on the ground. Houses had been burned, property destroyed, and even whole communities had been banished from their native places. One hundred and sixty towns had felt the scourge, which had continued from last April until Christmas. And while this atrocity was going on 120,000 Russian soldiers were kept closely in their garrisons, not allowed to prevent the horrible outrages. Hon. John W. Foster, formerly United States Minister to Russia, wrote from Washington expressing his sympathy with the movement and speaking highly from personal knowledge of the character of the Russian Jews. Chief-Justice Noah Davis, of the Supreme Court, spoke with horror of the authentic reports received of the persecution, and stated his conviction that if it continued the world would regard "Nihilism as the accepted vengeance of an offended Jehovah." Rev. John Hall, D.D., and Dr. Howard Crosby also delivered eloquent speeches expressing sympathy with the suffering people.

A Shocking Mining Disaster Occurred at the Midlothian Mine, Coal Field, Va., on February 3d. About one o'clock on that day, while thirty-two men were at work in the mine, an explosion was heard in the Grove shaft, which is six hundred feet deep and runs for three quarters of a mile in a lateral direction. All the men were entombed by the explosion, which also destroyed the apparatus, including that used for ventilation, and it is feared that it will have to be replaced before the work of rescue can be effectually performed. Several descents of the shaft have been made, but the rescuing party were driven back by the foul air. But faint hopes are entertained that the entombed men will be found alive. Among the anxious crowd at the mouth of the shaft on Saturday were twenty-seven women whose husbands were imprisoned in the shaft, and there are 108 children who will be fatherless if the men are found dead.

An Unheeded Warning was Twice Given to the owner of the building destroyed by fire in New York last week. The New York Times, whose offices adjoin the Potter building, says: "On the day before the fire a portion of the work near the flue caught fire from the intense heat. The tenants, made uneasy by the prevailing odor of 'roasted wood,' explored the building, hunting for the cause. They remonstrated with the owner of the property, but to no effect. A slight fire broke out on Monday, January 30th, and they suggested, after they had put it out, that the Fire Department should be called in quietly and hose laid on ready for instant use. But 'the idea didn't strike him as a wise one,' and nothing was done." On a previous occasion also a deputation waited on him and called his attention to the danger of fire, but without avail. On Tuesday, January 31st, when the fatal fire seized the building it was completely destroyed in two hours. The owner is much blamed for neglecting these repeated warnings, but many even of those who condemn such conduct in worldly matters are, in spiritual affairs, acting in a precisely similar way and running a more fearful risk (Prov. 29 : 1).

A Crafty Business Firm was Outwitted a few days ago by the agent of an express company. The company carry parcels of money from the West for several houses, charging a rate in proportion to the value of the package. One firm has for some time been sending $2000 parcels, the size of which excited the suspicion of the agent, who at length had one of the parcels opened, and its contents counted. It was found to contain $5000. He removed $3000 to the company's safe, sent on the balance and took a receipt for the amount. Then the senders sent in a claim for the money abstracted, but as they had stamped the parcel $2000 and held the express company's receipt for that amount only, the agent demurred. Then with shame the firm produced their books and showed that for some time past they had misrepresented the contents of their parcels, to save in the cost of expressage. They were glad to refund the amount they had so saved, and the $3000 was then returned to them. Eagerness to make and save money is in these days leading many men to misrepresentation and lying. Sin is lightly considered when the realization of money is in question. Ananias and Sapphira had the same idea.

A Surprise was Occasioned in a Revival meeting at New Carlisle, Ind., by the statement made by a man who came forward for prayer. He was deeply affected by a consciousness of his sinfulness, and as he begged the prayers of those who were present, he said he was a burglar and had gone to New Carlisle from Chicago. He said that he was on his way to commit a burglary when he passed the church where the revival meeting was held, and having time on his hands turned in. He had his housebreaking tools then in his pocket and showed them to the congregation. Among them was a complete set of tools for working an iron safe, and when he left home he intended robbing two safes which he knew of. But in the meeting his heart was touched by the Holy Spirit and when he went out of the meeting he surrendered himself to the sheriff for trial.

An Engineer's Daring Act, by which he saved many lives at the peril of his own, is described in Virginian journals. On January 18th several trains were waiting for the passing of the extras near Waynesboro. The first train released was No. 14, which commenced ascending the heavy grade to the tunnel. "Rain and sleet were falling and the engine being unable to draw its cars the engineer of the train immediately following it, Mr. R. P. Irving, detached his engine from his own train, and coupling on to the rear car of No. 14, aided the ascent. After pushing the first train nearly a half mile and giving it a good start, Mr. Irving reversed his engine and started to return to his own train, but ere he had reached it he saw a detachment of the train he had left, coming down the mountain at a rapid rate, it having become uncoupled from the engine. In an instant the intrepid engineer realized the peril of the situation. He ran to within a short distance of the cars, and then reversing, to lighten the shock, clutched the lever in his firm grasp and bracing every nerve in his body awaited the catastrophe. A moment and the crash came. The shock of an avalanche could scarcely have been greater. One of the cars climbed up on the boiler of the engine and another was wrecked. But the brave man had accomplished his purpose. The wild train was stopped, and the engineer had saved many precious lives and thousands of dollars' worth of property." In trying to realize the situation when that crushing destruction was descending upon the devoted man, we obtain a faint conception of the meaning of the awful scenes of Gethsemane and Calvary (1. Pet. 2 : 24).

A Miser and his Wife Died at Troy, N. Y., in circumstances of abject misery on January 29th. During the recent bitter weather, when the mercury fell below zero, they had refused to buy coal and had lived for weeks without a fire. Their deaths are attributed to the effects of the cold weather. They admitted that they had dispensed with fuel, preferring the money it would have cost to the comfort it would have given. The man and woman carried on their persons two thousand dollars, and the man had thus borne his portion for more than twenty years, and when removed from between the linings of his garments the gold was found black and greasy. When asked why he had not spent some of it for necessary comforts, he said, "money is a good thing to have." He was right, but he learned when he came to die and leave it all behind him, that it was not the best thing to have (Prov. 8 : 19).

The Safety Netting which Acrobatic Performers spread under them when performing their dangerous feats is but a poor protection if they fall into it. On January 19th the Zorella Brothers were performing in San Francisco, when one of them, whose real name was Fox, fell and lost his life. At the coroner's inquest Zorella, his companion, testified that they were rehearsing an act on a ladder which hung from the roof of the pavilion, and some eight or nine feet under it was swung "the safety netting." The two were hanging, head down, Zorella from the short and Fox from the long trapeze. Fox let go his hold, turned a somersault in the air, and instead of catching the hands of Zorella only touched his elbows with his fingers and fell to the netting, striking his forehead on the piece of carpet. While doubled up Fox said: "Oh, George! I'm dead this time. I'll never do anything in the air again." He was put to bed, and a physician called in, but, after suffering terribly all night, he died at about five o'clock the next morning. The terrible event should be a warning to men who so risk their lives trusting to the safety netting. There is no safety in it, any more than there is in the hopes to which impenitent sinners cling, such as death-bed repentance, the final salvation of the lost, and other doctrines, instead of embracing the one and only way of salvation through Jesus (John 14 : 6).

An Unexpected Reward for a Kindness Rendered long ago, was received last week by a hairdresser named Eugene Mergendahl, who lives at Kingston, N. Y. Mergendahl formerly kept the old Clinton Hotel, and during the war had as a guest one Leander Decker, who fell sick while in the house. Mergendahl was advised to send his sick guest to the poor-house, as he was without means and his illness promised to be a prolonged one. Mergendahl, however, decided on the more generous course of keeping him, and he paid for a doctor and a nurse to attend him. Decker recovered, and on leaving the Clinton promised that if he prospered Mergendahl should be reimbursed. But changes came, and Mergendahl left the hotel and fell into adversity. On Saturday, January 28th, he received notice that Decker had died in a Western city leaving a will in which he constituted his former benefactor his sole heir. Mergendahl visited the lawyers who had notified him and received from them $1450 and the information that beside that sum he was the owner of real estate worth over $20,000. Such instances of grateful reward are very rare, but we are assured by our Lord that kindness to His poor will in no case lose its reward, though it may not, as in this case, come in this world (Luke 6 : 35).

THE TOUCH.

An Exposition and Sermon, by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

EXPOSITION.

Mark 5 : 21 to 33.

Verses 21, 22.—"And when Jesus was passed over again by ship unto the other side, much people gathered unto Him: and He was nigh unto the sea. And, behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name, and when he saw Him, he fell at His feet."

Paying our Lord respect and deference, as was His due. See here an instructive sight: the law at the feet of the Gospel. This is the place for the law; the best work the law can do is to bring us to the feet of Jesus. The elder had an earnest request to make, and therefore he put himself into a lowly, suppliant position: we too shall succeed in prayer when we plead with all humility, bowing in the dust before the Lord.

Verses 23, 24.—"And besought Him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray Thee, come and lay Thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live. And Jesus went with him; and much people followed Him, and thronged Him."

We are told elsewhere that this was his only daughter, and twelve years of age. All the father's heart was set upon her; his life was wrapped up in the child's life. She was now in extremis. She must die unless the great Teacher will come and raise her up to health again. There was faith in this ruler, and hence we read; "And Jesus went with him." Faith insures the aid of Jesus without delay, and if you and I can trust Him He will go with us. Friend, canst thou rely on Jesus? Then shall it be written of thee also, "And Jesus went with him."

Verse 25.—"And a certain woman, which had an issue of blood twelve years."

In this passage of our Lord's life He blesses two women—the damsel sick unto death, and the matron sorely diseased. A large portion of the cures that Jesus wrought were upon men, but those wrought upon women are nearly all specially noteworthy. Surely of miracles of a spiritual kind the women have a double share. This poor woman had been a sufferer for twelve years, that is to say, just as long as the damsel had lived. How many only live to suffer, their existence being little better than a protracted wasting away.

Verses 26, 27.—"And had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. When she had heard of Jesus, came in the press behind and touched His garment."

"When she had heard of Jesus." "Faith cometh by hearing." My dear hearers, whatever you do not hear, take care that you hear much of Jesus. Some preach the church; it were better by far if they preached the church's Head. Some preach up a creed; it were wiser to proclaim Him who is the essence of the creed. Attend those places where most is said of Christ, for it is by hearing of Him that you will be blest as this poor woman was. That which she heard brought her to Jesus; and coming to Jesus is the great thing to be desired. When she had heard of Jesus she determined to obtain for herself the healing which He was able to bestow. Have you no such resolve?

Verse 28.—"For she said, If I may touch but His clothes, I shall be whole."

Not "If I may but touch His clothes," as if she meant to lay stress on the mere touch. The translators were wise to place the "but" after the "touch," for there the emphasis rests; the woman believed that everywhere Jesus was full of healing energy even to His garments, and therefore she felt—"If I may touch but His clothes, I shall thus come into contact with Him, and I shall be whole." Nor did she rest content with theory, she carried it out into act; she pressed through the throng, and touched the border of His garment, as Luke informs us. O that all good intentions were as promptly turned into actions!

Verse 29.—"And straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up; and she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague."

"Straightway." Mark is very fond of that word "straightway" or "immediately;" and truly the instantaneous action of our Lord at the call of faith is so remarkable that we do not wonder that the evangelist should record it. Are there not sick souls here who would gladly obtain an immediate salvation? A touch of Jesus will win it.

Verses 30, 31.—"And Jesus, immediately knowing in himself that virtue [or power] had gone out of Him, turned Him about in the press, and said, Who touched my clothes? And His disciples said unto Him, Thou seest the multitude thronging Thee, and sayest Thou, Who touched me?"

Peter led the way in this remark, acting as the spokesman for the rest. Jesus is always right, even when to the eye of sense He appears to be wrong. We ought never to suspect Him of making a mistake; indeed, for us to question Him would be great presumption.

Verses 32.—"And He looked roundabout to see her that had done this thing."

He knew who it was; evidently He looked for "her." He looked round, not to make a discovery of what was unknown, but to look on one whom He would gently bring out of her hiding place. Taking a long and steady gaze around the multitude He at last singled her out.

Verses 33.—"But the woman fearing and trembling, knowing what was done in her, came and fell down before Him and told Him all the truth."

Here is another instructive sight. Just now we saw the law at Christ's feet, and here we have a needy sufferer at Christ's feet. What a picture! If the ruler of the synagogue had a right to be at Jesus's feet, much more this poor healed one who owed everything to Him. Oh, you that have been saved by Jesus, worship Him; fall at His feet with reverence; sit there with attention; and abide there in obedience.

SERMON.

"And Jesus, immediately knowing in himself that virtue had gone out of Him, turned Him about in the press, and said, Who touched my clothes? And His disciples said unto Him, Thou seest the multitude thronging Thee, and sayest thou Who touched me?"—Mark 5: 30, 31.

Jesus Still a Healer—Mental Leprosies Cured—I. The Wonderful Person—Charged with Virtue—His Power Lay in His Deity—In His Becoming Man—In His Unmeasurable Spiritual Endowment—The Spiritually Sick in Dire Need—II. The Remarkable Touch—An Intentional Contact—Faith the Only Way—The Point of Contact—The Philosophy of the Plan—III. The Remarkable Question—One that Brought Her to the Front—It Brought a Blessing—Peace following Confession—The Faith a Grandfather Raised from the Dead Would Need—Faith Needed by Strangers to Spiritual Things.

WE just now read the story of this woman who was immediately healed. Spiritual persons know that the miracles recorded by the evangelist are true, because they have seen them reproduced. That is to say, we have not seen an issue of blood stanching by the touch of Christ's garments, but we have seen the spiritual counterpart of it. We have seen men and women healed of all kinds of spiritual and moral diseases by coming into contact with our Lord Jesus. They have touched Jesus, and they have been made whole; for Jesus lives still, and His healing work is not ended, but has only entered on another phase.

Jesus has said, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world;" and, being with us, He is not here inactive or ineffectually, but He is here, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, to work the same miracles, only not on men's bodies, but on their souls. Jesus is present to heal leprosy of the mind, and to open the eyes of the understanding. Yea, He is still among us to raise those who are dead in trespasses and sins. Though we live in a great leprosy house, yet are we comforted because we see that Jesus walks the hospitals, and still heals on the right hand and on the left all those who come into contact with Him. At the sight of His wonders of grace we cry out as they did in the days of His flesh, "He hath done all things well."

I. First, then, I have the blessed work, far beyond my power, but, oh! how sweet to my soul, of speaking upon

THIS WONDERFUL PERSON.

The Lord Jesus Christ as He stood in the midst of the crowd was charged with a power which is called by our translators "virtue." An efficacious healing force was in Him. Sometimes He emitted it by words, frequently by the touch of His hand, and, in this case, it seemed to stream even from His garments when He was but fitly and properly touched. He was charged with omnipotent blessing, and those who came into contact with Him were made whole. Do not think, dear friends, that He is less full of benedictions for the sons of men now. Nay, if I may venture to say as much, He is fuller still of healing power, for He has bowed His head to death and worn the thorn-crown, and He has risen from the tomb and gone up into the glory leading captivity captive. In our midst at this moment He is, if it be possible, more charged with energy to bless than even when He walked the fields of Palestine, and healed the feeble men and women of His time.

Observe that Christ's power to bless lay mainly in the fact of His Deity. That humble, weary, way-worn man was the Son of the Highest. Because He was still very God of very God His will was omnipotent. He did but speak to fever or leprosy, and they went at His bidding; even as the centurion put it, "I am a man under authority, and I say unto this man, Go, and he goeth, and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it," even so the divine Christ did but will it, and diseases fled at His bidding. He is not less divine to-day. At this hour He cries, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else."

But His power to bless us lay also in the fact that He had become man for our sake. I speak with lowly reverence, but "it behoved Christ to suffer." He found it needful to be compassed with infirmities that He might save us from our infirmities. He was able to heal not only because He was God, but because He was Emmanuel, God with us. Oh, the blessed mystery of the incarnation! What a fount of mercy it is to us miserable sinners! Oh, see, my brethren, God incarnate present among us, "able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him."

In addition to this, it is never to be forgotten that our blessed Master, being both divine and human, was also endowed with the Holy Spirit without measure. Often are we told in Scripture that He was able to do these mighty signs and wonders, because the Holy Ghost was with Him. Even now that same Holy Spirit is with Him in plenitude of power. Jesus, whom I preach to you, the man of Nazareth, the mighty God, has the residue of the Spirit, by which power He can remove from us all the guilt and power of sin, and can make us perfectly whole, that is, holy.

Is not this a thing to be delighted in—that there should be such a Saviour, and such a Saviour accessible to-day? Every sort of spiritual malady the blessed physician of souls can heal. I am able to say that I have seen Him heal such maladies. I think I have been witness to the cure of every sort of sin. At any rate, He is healing me of my own maladies, and I am under His tender care, persuaded that He will make even me perfectly whole ere He has done with me. I have seen the proud man, who could not else have been cured of his haughtiness, come and sit at Jesus' feet and learn of Him, until he has been made meek and lowly.

I have seen the obstinate man come to Jesus and gladly take Christ's yoke upon him, and become willingly and joyfully obedient to the supreme will of Him who bought him with His blood. Often have I seen the unclean and the lascivious enticed to Jesus by His gentleness, and they have been made pure. How, often have these eyes seen the despairing that have been on the verge of madness cheered and comforted till they had sung for joy of heart! How frequently have I seen the coward made brave, the morose made gentle, the revengeful made forgiving, by coming into contact with Jesus! You cannot love my Lord and love sin. You cannot trust my Lord and yet delight yourselves in iniquity. Only get near to Him, and He will begin a cure upon your character, and, ere long, will perfect it.

If your malady should be a delight in the pleasures and the pursuits of the world, He will teach you not to love the world, nor the things of it. Do you suffer from selfishness? He shall teach you to deny yourselves. His lance and nails and cross shall crucify you with Himself till self-seeking shall die. Are you afflicted with a sloth that will not let you be active? My Master's zeal shall fire your soul till, like Him, you shall be consumed with energy. I do not mind what your fault is, my brother or my sister; but this I know, there is power in my divine Lord and Master to redeem you from that fault. He can destroy evil and create good. Behold, He makes all things new!

Ah, now, if I were addressing myself to a number of persons that were blind, or deaf, or sick, and I told them that Christ was here to heal them of their bodily infirmities, what a rush there would be. Set Jesus up in Trafalgar square to be touched by all manner of sick folk, and I warrant you the crowd would press one another to death in their eagerness to get at Him. But surely, spiritual maladies are worse. It is worse to have a blind spiritual eye than a blind bodily eye. But men do not think so, and consequently they are not anxious for spiritual health. I may praise up my Master, as I fain would, even to the skies, and yet men will care nothing for Him, for they would just as soon be morally and spiritually sick as not; and some of them are even proud of their sicknesses.

Well, what shall become of you? In that day when God shuts out the spiritually-sick folk—the diseased, the pestilential, the putrid, the corrupt—when He casts them into Tophet, because they cannot be permitted to stand among His saints in His holy house in heaven, whose fault shall it be that ye were not healed? Who shall bear the blame that ye died in your sins? Not the Lord Jesus Christ; but yourselves, because you chose your own delusions, and would have none of Him.

Thus have I feebly tried to set Him forth; and oh, how I would that ye desired Him and longed for Him, for He is here, and a touch of Him will save you! Poor souls, must He pass you by?

II. And now, secondly, I want to say a little, by God's help, about of this woman.

THE REMARKABLE TOUCH

Such a touch as hers may be given to Jesus at this good hour. We cannot by our finger literally touch His mantle; but there is a spiritual touch that can still be given to Christ, which will draw virtue out of Him, so that all our spiritual diseases shall straightway be healed. This contact is not always described in Scripture as a touch; sometimes it is represented as hearing. "Incline your ear and come unto me. Hear and your soul shall live." There is a link between you and me to-day in the fact that I speak and you hear. Well, a spiritual connection, of which this is the analogy, if it be set up between Christ and you, will cure you of your sin.

Sometimes this contact is described as being formed by a look. This is the favorite symbol. "Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth." It is apparently a very meagre connection which is set up by a glance; and yet if you have such a contact between you and Christ as the eye made between the dying Israelite and the brazen serpent, it will save you. Here in this narrative the contact is symbolized by a touch. The patient by her touch was linked with Jesus, and felt in her body that she was healed of her plague.

Now, do you not wish to touch Jesus and to be made whole, that is, holy? If you do, remember that the touch must be a voluntary one. If any of you were brought into a supposed connection with Christ when you were children, without consciousness of what was done, I charge you, do not put any confidence in the ceremony. Religion performed for you, when you were unconscious and gave no consent to it, cannot possibly save you.

Whatever there might be in it, there is nothing saving in it. You must come into a voluntary union with Jesus if you would be made whole.

It must be an intentional contact. Some were pressed against the Saviour as they pushed against each other, and as the crowd surged to and fro; but this woman was not driven against Christ without her consent. Oh no, she was eager to get at Him. She pushed; she strove; and at last she reached the fringe of His mantle, and a contact was established intentionally by her finger. She wished to be made whole, and she touched Christ with that view. You, too, must come to Jesus with the view of being delivered from the guilt, penalty, and power of sin; and you must get into contact with Christ with the intent that He should be your Saviour. I entreat you to see to this, and may the Holy Spirit lead you to do it at once.

"Oh," say you, "but I do not know how to get into contact with the Saviour." The best way, the only way, is by believing in Him. If you, tonight, say in your heart, "I trust Christ to save me," there is immediately a contact between you and Christ of the right kind; you are the trusting one, and He is the person trusted in. There is a point of union between you and Christ, and this will save you; for there never was one yet that did wholly trust the blood and righteousness of Jesus without finding himself fully justified in so trusting. The rule of the kingdom is—"According to thy faith so be it unto thee." If your faith be only as a grain of mustard seed, if it is genuine faith, it shall work in you the cure of your soul's disease, and you shall live unto righteousness.

The point of contact is a main consideration, and I pray you look to it. Do you not see that when the woman's finger touched Christ's garment there was established at once a connection between the two, along which the divine virtue flashed? I will not illustrate this by electricity, for such a figure will suggest itself to you all; but the fact is that faith sets up a contact between the sinner and Christ, and thus the healing virtue comes to us.

"Oh, well," says one, "I have often heard you preach about being saved from sinning by Christ, but I do not feel that I can do anything." Just so. That is why I want you to get Christ to work in you, and for you. "Oh, but I am nobody." That is the very sort of person I delight to find out, that Jesus Christ may make you into somebody; and say, "Somebody has touched me." Nobody is made into somebody when he once touches Jesus Christ. "Oh, but I am—" There will be no end to these objections, and therefore let me say plainly, NEVER MIND WHAT YOU ARE.

The question is, What is the Lord Jesus Christ? If He is able to save you, trust Him, rely upon Him, rest your soul with Him.

Did I hear one reply, "I do not see how that will make me better?" My speedy answer is that faith, simple as it seems, is the one thing which, by God's grace, shall make you a new man. Here is the philosophy of it—If you trust Jesus you will love Him; if you love Him, you will serve Him. Believing that Jesus has saved you, gratitude springs up in your heart and becomes the motive power by which a new life is begun and continued.

I remember years ago when I tried the power of faith in Jesus. It was a poor, feeble, trembling touch that I gave to Christ, but by it from sadness and despair I rose to gladness and hope. I had something to live for, and I had the expectation of being able to accomplish it, too, when I had touched Him. And at this hour, when I am sick and sad and sorry and sinful, I to go Him, and I am blest. If I want washing, He must wash me; if I want clothing, He must clothe me; if I want strength, He must invigorate me. He is all in all to my soul; and so I do but tell you what I know myself, and persuade you by my own experience to trust Him.

III. Lastly, the poor woman, having touched the hem of Christ's garment, and being made whole, was about to slink away, when the Master asked which brought her to the front, so that she was obliged to confess what Christ had done for her,

THE REMARKABLE QUESTION

I would to God that all of you who have felt the power of Christ would bear testimony to the fact. As a rule those who have been converted in this place have not been backward to confess Christ, but still some among you who love my Lord have never yet avowed your attachment to Him. You are on Christ's side, but you do not wear His uniform, and own His cause. You do not confess Him, though He has promised that those who do so He will confess at the last. We are all too fond of ease, and so it happens in this world of ours that much of the force of goodness remains unused because men are inactive and retiring.

Who covets the front of the battle? Only a bold, brave man whose heart God has touched. He comes to the front, and remains the butt of opposition when prudence might dictate that he should shelter himself from the conflict. Oh, my dear friend, if you love Jesus Christ, my Master, I ask you never to be ashamed to be on His side, and on the side of the right and the true, the just, and the kind.

TAKE YOUR PLACE LIKE A MAN, avow yourself a soldier of the cross. Too many are like the timid woman of our text, they receive benefits from Jesus, and then try to lose themselves in the crowd. I will tell you a little about that.

Listen to me, you who are trembling. Let not your fears rob your Lord of His honor. You must confess your faith, for Jesus loves that those whom He heals should own it. That is why He turned round and said, "Who touched My clothes?" He delights in that tender avowal, wet with many tears. If you have done good to one of your neighbors, you think it hard if no word of thanks is spoken. I have known benevolence almost shrivelled up for lack of gratitude. My Master is not of such a temper, but still He welcomes words of humble acknowledgment. He loves that much love which comes of having much forgiven. Do not, then, hold your tongue. If Jesus has indeed healed you, tell Him of it, and tell His people of it to His praise. Such grace ought to be known. Is there anything to be ashamed of? For my part I glory in being saved by Christ. If he that is a Christian is a fool, write me down among the fools. Say you not so, poor working brother? When you go into the workshop and they say, "These Christian people are a set of hypocritical Presbyterians," will you not answer, "Then put me down among them."

If your Lord and Master did not grudge to stand in the pillory for you till they did spit in His face, what a coward you must be if you ever draw back from avowing your faith in Him from the fear of ridicule. If He owned your cause even unto death, never blush to be regarded as His follower. Let every craven thought be banished from your spirit. If Jesus saved you from going down into the pit and made you a new creature, never be ashamed in any company to say, "The Christ has made me whole, and henceforth I am His."

To this woman Christ said,

"GO IN PEACE."

What a blessing she gained by being fetched out of her hiding-place; for had she gone away without an open confession, she might often have been disturbed in mind by the fear that a stolen cure would not be permanent. The Master said, "Go in peace," and a profound calm fell upon her spirit as when the sea-birds sit on the waves and all the winds have fallen into a deep sleep.

Now, it may be that some of you who love Christ will go to heaven safely enough; but you will miss a mint of comfort on the road because you have never openly confessed that you belong to Christ. Peradventure certain of you will never get peace till you avow your discipleship, and link your whole life with Jesus. When you do that, and take up His cross with all its shame, and are known to be a Christian in every society into which you enter, then shall your peace be like a river.

I have done, only I would put to the whole congregation the question, "Who has touched Christ to-day?" O that some would answer in their hearts, "I have touched Him to-day by faith." Why should you not all trust the appointed Saviour? Do you tell me that you do not understand what faith is? It is trusting—trusting wholly upon the person, work, merit, and power of the Son of God. Some think this trusting to be a strange business, but indeed it is the simplest thing that can possibly be. To some of us truths which were once hard to believe are now matters of fact. If were to rise from the dead, and come into the present state of things, what a deal of trusting he would have to do. He would say to-morrow morning, "Where are the flint and steel?" I want a light;" and we should give him a little box with tiny pieces of wood in it, and tell him to strike one of them on the box. He would have to trust a good deal before he would believe that fire would thus be produced. We should next say to him, "Now that you have a light, turn that tap and light the gas." He sees nothing but is annoyed with an offensive smell. How can he believe that light will come of that invisible vapor? And yet it does. "Now come with us, grandfather. Sit in that chair. Look at that box in front of you. You shall have your likeness directly." "No, child," he would say, "it is ridiculous. The sun take my portrait? I cannot believe it." "Yes, and you shall ride fifty miles in an hour without horses." "I do not believe it," says he. "What is more, you shall speak to your son in New York, and he shall answer you in a few minutes." Should we not astonish the old gentleman? Would he not want all his faith? And yet these things are believed by us without effort, because experience has made us familiar with them.

ONE OF OUR GRANDFATHERS

Faith is greatly needed by you who are strangers to spiritual things; you seem lost while we are talking about them, and our very words puzzle you. But oh, how simple it is to us who have the new life and have communion with spiritual realities. We have a Father to whom we speak and He hears us, and a blessed Saviour who hears our heart's longings, and helps us in our struggles against sin. It is all plain to him that understandeth. May the Spirit of God bring every one of you to understand it! What a joy it would be if we all touched the Saviour, should all be healed of sin, and all be admitted to stand at His right hand for ever. Then, whoever we may be, and however much we may differ in rank and talent, we shall all heartily join to sing the new song, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive honor and glory for ever and ever, Amen."

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, AND JOHN KNOX, THE REFORMER.

(See Illustration.)

THE youthful Queen Mary assumed the sovereignty of Scotland in 1561, just as the Reformation had convulsed the nation, and the Protestant party had gained the ascendancy. Being a devoted Roman Catholic, as well as a shrewd and artful woman, she immediately set about to restore her own religion by gradual and disguised measures; and she might have succeeded had it not been for the stern resistance of the man of God, John Knox.

Froude, the historian, has described more than one interview between the Queen and the Reformer, she perhaps the most remarkable woman and he the most remarkable man of the day; and we give the following narrative nearly in his words. Our illustration shows one of the interviews, the other persons present being Queen Mary's brother, Lord James Stuart, and two ladies in waiting. Mary herself arranged the interview. With clear collected presence of mind she desired to comprehend her situation exactly, and the resistance, for which she had to look, and she took the opportunity of a sermon which Knox preached at St. Giles's Cathedral in Edinburgh, against the mass, the Sunday after her arrival, to measure her strength with her most dangerous enemy.

After some preliminary conversation, the Queen said inquiringly, "My subjects, then, are to obey you and not me? I am subject to them, not they to me?"

"Nay," he replied, "let prince and subject both obey God. Kings should be foster-fathers of the Kirk, and queens its nursing mothers." (Isa. 49:23.)

Interview between Mary Queen of Scots and John Knox, the Reformer.

"You are not the Kirk that I will nurse," she said. "I will defend the Kirk of Rome, for that I think is the Kirk of God."

"Your will, madam," Knox answered, "is no reason; neither does your thought make the Roman harlot the spouse of Jesus Christ."

So the two parted for the time, each with some insight into the other's nature. "If there be not in her," said Knox afterwards, "a proud mind, a crafty wit, and an indurate heart against God and his truth, my judgment faileth me."

"He made her weep," Thomas Randolph, the English ambassador, wrote to the Secretary in London, "as well you know there be of that sex that will do that for anger as well as grief. The voice of that one man is able to put more life in us than five hundred trumpets blustering in our ears."

Some time afterwards Mary accepted proposals of marriage with Don Carlos, the son of the Spanish King. Many of the Scottish lords were so elated at the prospect of insuring the succession to the throne, and so overcome with the Queen's artful flatteries, that they desisted from opposition even to such an enormity as a Romish king in Puritan Scotland. But Knox rose in his pulpit and told them all that "whenever they, professing the Lord Jesus, consented that a Papist should be head of their sovereign they did as far as in them lay to banish Christ from the realm; they would bring God's vengeance on their country, a plague on themselves, and perchance small comfort to their sovereign."

Mary recognized her enemy, whom alone she had failed to work upon. She sent for him, and her voice choking between tears and passion, said, "Never has prince been handled as I have; I have borne your bitterness, admitted you to my presence, endured to be reprimanded, and yet I cannot be quit of you. I vow to God I will be avenged."

Quiet, collected, seeing through and through her, yet with a sound Scotch courtesy, the Reformer answered that when it pleased God to open her eyes, she would see that he had done nothing to offend her; in private he had been silent, but in "the preaching place" he must obey God Almighty.

"But what," the Queen said, "have you to do with my marriage? What are you within this commonwealth?"

"A subject born within the same, Madam," he replied, "and one whose vocation and conscience demand plainness of speech. And therefore, Madam," he went on, "I say to yourself what I spake in yonder public place—whenever the nobility shall consent that you be subject to an unfaithful husband, they renounce Christ and betray the realm."

The Queen again sobbed violently. Knox stood silent till she had collected herself, and then continued:

"Madam, in God's presence I speak; I never delighted in the distress of any of God's creatures; yea, I can scarcely abide the tears of my own boys whom my own hand corrects. But seeing I have but spoken the truth, as my vocation craves of me, I must sustain your Majesty's tears rather than hurt my conscience."

WILLIAM HUNTER, THE HEROIC MARTYR.

(See Illustration.)

OUR illustration depicts a scene in the history of William Hunter, who in the reign of Queen Mary of England, commonly called "Bloody Mary," had the honor of being enrolled in the noble army of martyrs when only nineteen years of age. He had been trained in the doctrines of the Reformation from his earliest youth, being descended from religious parents, who had carefully instructed him in the truths of the Bible.

When Queen Mary succeeded to the crown, orders were issued to the priests of every parish to summon their parishioners to receive the communion at mass the Easter after her accession; and Hunter, refusing to obey the command, was threatened with a summons to appear before the bishop.

He was taken and kept in the stocks four-and-twenty hours, and then brought before the justice. He was then interrogated as to his doctrines. The point of difference between Protestants and Romanists which was most fiercely disputed was the doctrine of transubstantiation. The Protestants contended that the bread and wine used at the Lord's Supper were emblems merely, while the Romanists claimed that the priest in uttering the words of consecration worked a miracle and transformed the bread and wine into the actual body and blood of the Saviour.

The justice, therefore, in order to find out whether the accused young man was a heretic called for a Bible, and turning to the sixth chapter of St. John, desired his opinion as to the meaning of it, as it related to the sacrament of the altar. He fearlessly denied the corporeal presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper. The justice then wrote to the Bishop of London, to whom this valiant young martyr was soon conducted.

Said the bishop, "How sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Wilt thou not recant thy saying that Christ's body is not in the sacrament of the altar, the same that was born of the Virgin Mary?" No way daunted, William said, "My lord, I will not recant, by God's help."

After further questioning he was sent to Newgate. About a month after, Hunter was sent to Brentwood, on the Saturday before the Feast of the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, which fell on the Monday after; he therefore remained till the Tuesday, because they would not put him to death then, for the holiness of the day. In the meantime William's father and mother came to him and desired heartily of God that he might continue as he had begun.

In the morning he was commanded by the sheriff to prepare for his fate. At the same time the sheriff's son came to him, and embraced him saying, "William, be not afraid of these men with bows and weapons prepared to bring you to the place where you shall be burned." "I thank God I am not afraid," said the undaunted youth, "for I have reckoned what it will cost me already." Then the sheriff's son could speak no more to him for weeping. He then went to the place where the stake stood, where, all things being not ready, he kneeled and read the 51st Psalm, till he came to these words: "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a contrite and a broken heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise." As one was attempting to dispute the translation of his words, the sheriff brought a letter from the Queen, and said, "If thou wilt recant, thou shalt live; if not, thou shalt be burned." "I will not recant, God willing," answered the noble youth.

Immediately after the fire was made. Then William cast his psalter to his brother, who said, "William, think on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraid of death." William answered, "I am not afraid." Then he lifted up his hands to heaven, and said, "Lord, Lord, receive my spirit;" and casting down his head again into the smothering smoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, sealing it with his blood.

THE SHOCKING OUTRAGES ON THE JEWS OF RUSSIA.

Their Extent and Prophetic Significance.

TOWARDS the close of the present dispensation, according to the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel, the Jews will be restored in large numbers to Palestine, and an attack will be made upon them there by the people of Rosh, Meshch, and Tubal, generally understood by expositors to signify Russia proper, Moscow, and Tobolsk, three lands which, though now under the one government of the Czar of all the Russias, were at the time Ezekiel wrote separate and independent. Ezekiel mentions another assailant of the Jews under the title of Gomer and the house of Togarmah of the north quarters (Ezek. 38:6), which names expositors have long believed signify the countries now included in the great German Empire.

It is a remarkable sign of the near approach of the end that during 1880 and 1881 a bitter feeling of hostility against the Jews has spread all through Russia and Germany, which will have the twofold result of (1) causing many Jews to emigrate to Palestine as an asylum, and (2), the passions of the people being inflamed, to bring on ultimately the anticipated hostile invasion of Palestine by Russia and Germany.

The Russian authorities quail before the torrent of indignation poured upon them from all parts of Europe and this country, and are ashamed of the barbarities reported by the expelled Jews. They ventured to deny that outrages so shameful as were narrated had ever occurred, and charged the fugitive Jews with exaggeration. The London Times, however, has a correspondent in Russia who has sent to that journal an authentic narrative of the disturbances. This account, constituting as it does a crushing indictment of the Russian government, is all the more reliable because the Times has lately given uniform support to Mr. Gladstone's policy, which, while it is quick to notice the wrongdoings of Turkey, regards everything reprehensible in Russia with indulgence. The following facts are vouched for in the narrative of the Times correspondent:

William Hunter, the Heroic Martyr.

Early last April it was well known in the town of Elizabethgrad that certain disorderly people meditated raising a riot, the object of which was to pillage the Jewish quarter. There were 10,000 Jews in the town, and they appealed to the Governor for protection, but no notice was taken of the appeal. On April 27th, the outbreak occurred, and a mob of brutal men well plied with wine attacked the Jews, carrying off their property and tearing down their houses and stores to the number of six hundred. The Times correspondent writes:

"Amid the horrors that ensued a Jew named Zolowenski lost his life, and no fewer than thirty Jewesses were outraged. At one place two young girls, in dread of violation, threw themselves from the windows. Meanwhile the military had been called out, but only to act at first as spectators and afterward as active participants. One section of the mob, formed of rioters and soldiers, broke into the dwelling of an old man named Pelikoff, and on his attempting to save his daughter from a fate worse than death they threw him down from the roof, while twenty soldiers proceeded to work their will on his unfortunate daughter. When seen by the correspondent who narrates this fact, Pelikoff was in a state of hopeless madness and his daughter completely ruined in mind and body. The whole Jewish quarter was at the mercy of the mob for two days and nights."

On Sunday, May 8th, a similar riot broke out at Kieff, once the capital of Russia, which now has a population of 140,000, of whom 20,000 are Jews. "The police and the soldiers again acted the same part that they had at Elizabethgrad.

17 deaths caused by violation, and no fewer than 225 cases of outrages on Jewesses." Meanwhile, the municipalities, with the connivance of the local governments, have taken every means in their power to add to the misery of the situation. With rough logic they argued that, as these riots were directed against the Jews, if there had been no Jews there would have been no riots. They accordingly petitioned the Governors of their provinces to issue orders for the expulsion of the Jews from towns in which they had no legal right of domicile. The result has been that many thousands of Jews despoiled of all they possessed have been driven from Russia.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 78.)

Another Offer.

THE next day Phebe locked up her house and rode down to Riversborough. As she descended into the valley and the open plain beyond her sorrowfulness fell away from her. Her social instincts were strong, and she delighted in companionship and in the help she could render to any fellow-creature. If she overtook a boy trudging reluctantly to school she would dismount from her rough pony and give him a ride; or if she met with a woman carrying a heavy load, she took the burden from her, and let her pony saunter slowly along, while she listened to the homely gossip of the neighborhood.

Phebe was a great favorite along these roads, which she had traversed every week during summer to attend Riversborough market for the last eight years. Her spirits rose as she rode along, receiving many a kindly word, and more invitations to spend a little while in different houses than she could have accepted if she had been willing to give twelve months to visiting. It was market-day at Riversborough, and the greetings there were still

"Ever since last April the feeling of fear and insecurity has ruled the lives of all Russian Jews. Not a month, scarcely a week, has passed since then without some outbreak or other occurring to confirm these fears and render them the more acute. At Borispol, on July 21st, scenes occurred during the riots worthy of the worst days of the Commune. Women, for almost the first time, made their appearance on the scene as assailants and added to its horrors. During the rioting they encouraged their friends on to the fight, and were seen to assist them to violate the Jewesses of the village by holding down the unfortunate creatures."

"These cases are not exceptional, horrible as they are, they have been selected from a list of over 100 towns and villages in which cases of riot, rapine, murder, and spoliation have been known to occur during the last nine months of 1881. Out of these information was collected from about 45 towns and villages in Southern Russia. In these alone are reported 23 murders of men, women, and children, more numerous, and, if possible, more kindly. Everybody had a word for Phebe Marlowe, especially to-day, when her pretty black dress told of the loss she had suffered.

She made her way to Whitefriars Road. The Old Bank was not so full as it had formerly been, for immediately after the panic last May a new bank had been opened more in the centre of the town, and a good many of the tradesmen and farmers had transferred their accounts to it. The outer office was fairly busy, but Phebe had not long to wait before being summoned to see Mr. Clifford. The muscles of his stern and careworn features relaxed into something approaching a smile as she entered, and he caught sight of her sweet and frank young face.

"Sit down, Phebe," he said. "I did not hear of your loss before yesterday; and I was just about to send for you to see your father's will. It is in our strong-room. You are not one-and-twenty yet?"

"Not till next December, sir," she replied.

"Roland Sefton is the only executor appointed," he continued, his face contracting for an instant, as if some painful memory flashed across him; "and, since he is dead, I succeed to the charge as his executor. You will be my ward, Phebe, till you are of age."

"Will it be much trouble, sir?" she asked anxiously.

"None at all," he answered; "I hope it will be a pleasure; for, Phebe, it will not be fit for you to live alone at Upfold Farm; and I wish you to come here—to make your home with me till you are of age. It would be a great pleasure to me, and I would take care you should have every opportunity for self-improvement. I know you are not a fine young lady, my dear, but you are sensible, modest, and sweet-tempered, and we should get on well together. If you were happy with me I should regard you as my adopted daughter, and provide accordingly for you. Think of it for a few minutes while I look over these letters. Perhaps I seem a grim and surly old man to you; but I am not naturally so. You would never disappoint me."

He turned away to his desk, and appeared to occupy himself with his letters, but he did not take in a single line of them. He had set his heart once more on the hope of winning love and gratitude from some young wayfarer on life's rough road, whose path he could make smooth and bright. He had been bitterly disappointed in his own son and his friend's son. But if this simple, unspoiled little country maiden would leave her future life in his keeping, how easy and how happy it should be!

"It's very good of you," said Phebe in a trembling voice; "and I'm not afraid of you, Mr. Clifford, not in the least; but I could not keep from fretting in this house. Oh, I loved them so, every one of them; but Mr. Roland most of all. No one was ever so good to me as he was. If it hadn't been for him I should have learned nothing and father himself would have been a dull, ignorant man. Mr. Roland learnt to talk to father, and nobody else could talk with him but me. I used to think it was as much like our Lord Jesus Christ as anything any one could do. Mr. Roland could not open father's ears, but he learned how to talk to him, to make him less lonely. That was the kindest thing any one on earth could do."

"Do you believe Mr. Roland was innocent?" asked Mr. Clifford.

"I know he was guilty," answered Phebe sadly. "He told me all about it himself, and I saw his sorrow. Before that he always seemed to me more like what I think Jesus Christ was than any one else. He could never think of himself while there were other people to care for. And I know," she went on, with simple sagacity, "that it was not Mr. Roland's sin that fretted father, but the loss of the money. If he had made six hundred pounds by using it without his consent, and said, 'Here, Marlowe, are twelve hundred pounds for you instead of six; I did not put your money up as you wanted, but used it instead; why, father would have praised him up to the skies, and could never have been grateful enough,'"

Mr. Clifford's conscience smote him as he listened to Phebe's unworldly comment on Roland Sefton's conduct. If Roland had met him with the announcement of a gain of ten thousand pounds by a lucky though unauthorized speculation, he knew very well his own feeling would have been utterly different from that with which he had heard of the loss of ten thousand pounds. The world itself would have cried out against him if he had prosecuted a man by whose disregard of the laws he had gained so large a profit. Was it, then, a simple love of justice that had actuated him? Yet the breach of trust would have been the same.

"But if you will not come to live with me, my dear," he said, "what do you propose to do? You cannot live alone in your old home."

"May I tell you what I should like to do?" she asked.

"Certainly," he answered. "I am bound to know it."

"Those two who are dead," she said, "thought so much of my painting. Mr. Roland was always wishing I could go to a school of art, and father said when he was gone he should wish it too. But now we have lost our money, the next best thing will be for me to go to live as servant to some great artist, where I could see something of painting till I've saved enough money to go to school. I can let Upfold Farm for fifteen pounds a year to Simon Nixey, so I shall soon have money enough. I promised father I would never sell our farm, that has belonged to Marlowes ever since it was inclosed from the common. And if I go to London, I shall be near Madame and the children, and Mrs. Roland Sefton."

The color had come back to Phebe's face, and her voice was steady and musical again. There was a clear, frank shining in her blue eyes, looking so pleasantly into his, that Mr. Clifford sighed regretfully as he thought of his solitary and friendless life—self-chosen partly, but growing more dreary as old age, with its infirmities, crept on.

"No, no; you need not go into service," he said; "there is money enough of your own to do what you wish with. Mrs. Roland refuses to receive the income from her marriage settlement till every claim against her husband is paid off. I shall pay your claim off at the rate of one hundred a year, or more, if you like. You may have a sum sufficient to keep you at an art school as long as you need be there."

"Why, I shall be very rich!" exclaimed Phebe; "and father dreaded I should be poor."

"I will run up to London and see what arrangements I can make for you," he continued. "Perhaps Mrs. Roland Sefton could find a corner for you in her own house, small as it is, and Madame would make you as welcome as a daughter. You are more of a daughter to her than Felicità. Only I must make a bargain, that you and the children come down often to see me here in the old house. I should have grown very fond of you, Phebe; and then you would have married some man whom I detested, and disappointed me bitterly again. It is best as it is, I suppose. But if you will change your mind now, and stay with me as my adopted daughter, I'll run the risk."

"If it was anywhere else!" she answered with a wistful look into his face, "but not here. If Mrs. Roland Sefton could find room for me I'd rather live with them than anywhere else in the world. Only don't think I'm ungrateful because I can't stay here."

"No, no, Phebe," he replied, "it was for my own sake I asked it. As you grow older, child, you'll find out that the secret root of nine-tenths of the benevolence you see is selfishness."

Six weeks later all the arrangements for Phebe leaving her old home and entering upon an utterly new life were completed. Simon Nixey, after vainly urging her to accept himself, and to give herself and her little farm and her restored fortune to him, offered to become her tenant at £10 a year for the land, leaving the cottage uninhabited; for Phebe could not bear the idea of any farm laborer and his family dwelling in it and destroying or injuring the curious carvings with which her father had lined its walls. The spot was far out of the way of tramps and wandering vagabonds, and there was no danger of damage being done to it by the neighbors. Mrs. Nixey undertook to see that it was kept from damp and dirt, promising to have a fire lighted there occasionally, and Simon would see to the thatch being kept in repair, on condition that Phebe would come herself once a year to receive her rent, and see how the place was cared for. There was but a forlorn hope in Mrs. Nixey's heart that Phebe would ever have Simon now she was going to London; but it might possibly come about in the long run if he met with no girl to accept him with as much fortune.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 79.)

The Territorial Changes to Precede the Reconstitution of the Roman Empire—Italy Recovering Venetia—Austria Divided—Changes in Greece—Egypt to be Severed from Turkish Control—Syria Independent—The New Thracian Kingdom—Bulgaria the Fifth Kingdom—Remarks of Dr. Tregelles.

(4.) Italy will undoubtedly recover possession of Venetia.† Already a most important step towards the requisite reduction of the excessive number of kingdoms and States in the Western Roman Empire has been effected in 1861, when, as the result of Garibaldi's revolutions, the seven separate Italian States or Kingdoms were fused into one United Italy.

(5.) Austria must be completely split asunder—the line of division being the river Danube. Bohemia, Moravia, and Galicia above the Danube have to be altogether governmentally detached from Austrian territory below the Danube, which necessarily falls within the Western Roman Empire. Hungary, although north of the Danube, is said to have belonged to the Roman Empire under the name of Dacia. But even thus it would seem more likely to belong to the Eastern rather than to the Western half to which Austria belongs. Belgrade, the capital of Servia, is said to have been the point of division between the Western and Eastern Halves of the Roman Empire. If so, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and part of Servia will be annexed to Austria, and the rest of Servia added to Bulgaria.

(6.) Greece, as well as Egypt, Syria, and Thrace-with-Bithynia, must be one of the ten kingdoms, because these four kingdoms were the four horns which came up in the place of the notable horn, Alexander the Great, in Daniel 8; and, in fact, were the four kingdoms into which his Macedonian Empire was subdivided after his death. Although for many centuries they have been swallowed up in the huge Turkish Empire, yet they are predicted to become re-existent at the time of the End, for Daniel saw them all four existing in separate distinctness at the final crisis.

Hence it is a fulfilment of prophecy that Greece completely separated from Turkey and became an independent kingdom in 1827, and Egypt in 1841. Greece, however, must yet be considerably enlarged northward, by the addition of Thessaly, Epirus, and Macedonia, and probably Albania, in order to attain its ancient dimensions.

(7.) Egypt is still nominally a feudatory appendage of Turkey. It must, therefore, be made formally and legally independent, although it has been practically so ever since 1841. If this is the case, the sovereign of Egypt will, of course, possess supreme power over Palestine and Jerusalem; and hence the question arises, How will the Napoleonic Little Horn, who is to arise after the Egyptian sovereign and the other nine horns have arisen (Dan. 7: 24) come to possess any authority or locus standi in Palestine so as to make a seven years' covenant with the Jews to guarantee them a peaceable settlement in Jerusalem?

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders," By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, $1.

† This prediction, which has since come to pass, was also published in April, 1865, in the author's treatise on menacing perils, in these words, "Venetia may be expected to be re-united to Italy." [Note added in 1880.]

It seems as if before making the covenant he will have risen from his embryo littleness to a very commanding position among the ten horns, according to the prediction that "he is to wax exceeding great toward the South and toward the East and toward the pleasant land" (Palestine), Dan. 8 : 9, and is to "subdue three kings." He is certainly predicted to wage a victorious war against the King of Egypt under the title of the "King of the South," in Daniel 11 : 25, but the war predicted in this passage seems to be after and not before his covenant or league with the Jews.

(8.) Syria has not yet achieved its predestined secession from the Turkish Empire, and become an independent kingdom. But it must do so, and thus become one of the ten horns, before the final seven years of this dispensation. Its territories formerly consisted of Armenia and nearly all Asia Minor, and all the countries lying between Palestine and the Euphrates, and even beyond that as far as the river Indus. If Palestine is not annexed to Egypt, it will belong to Syria.

(9.) Thrace with Bithynia, and perhaps a little more of the territory in Asia Minor, must re-exist within its ancient boundaries as one of the four-horn kingdoms of Alexander the Great's Empire, according to Daniel 8 : 8, 23, and will then form one of the future ten kingdoms. Its boundary on the north was the Balkan Mountains, and on the west was Macedonia, so that it corresponded with modern Turkey in Europe adjacent to Constantinople. Hence before Thrace can reappear as a kingdom, Macedonia must be separated from it, i.e., from Central Turkey; and also Bulgaria lying north of the Balkan Mountains must likewise be separated from it, and become the fifth kingdom in the Eastern Roman Empire; and still further, Syria and nearly all Asia Minor must be divided off from it. Then all that remains of the Turkish Empire, with Constantinople as its capital, will be virtually equivalent to ancient Thrace-with-Bithynia. Mahomedan Turkey will have dwindled down to the size of Lysimachus' Thrace.

(10.) Bulgaria, with parts of Serbia and perhaps Roumania, and possibly even part of Hungary, must necessarily be the Fifth Kingdom in the Eastern Half of the Roman Empire, which is to be divided into Five Kingdoms, corresponding with the Five Toes on one Foot of Daniel's Prophetic Image. The matter resolves itself into a simple sum of subtraction, as follows :

The Eastern Roman Empire is to be divided into five kingdoms. But Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Thrace are to be four of those kingdoms, according to Daniel 8 : 9, 23. Therefore the remainder of the Eastern Empire must be the fifth kingdom. And that remainder consists of Bulgaria and whatever part of Serbia lies East of Belgrade, which divided the Eastern from the Western Roman Empire. Also if Roumania (i.e., Moldavia and Wallachia), which lies above the river Danube, and part of Hungary (ancient Dacia) are correctly specified to have belonged to Cæsar's Roman Empire, they may be added to the Bulgarian Kingdom.

Dr. Tregelles, Dr. Kelsall, and B. W. Newton, in 1846-9 showed in their books that Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Thrace must be four of the ten kingdoms, and inferentially therefore according to their view Bulgaria must be separated from Turkey and become the fifth kingdom in the Eastern Roman Empire, as it, with part of Serbia, is all that remains after those kingdoms are divided off.*

THE ROMAN EMPIRE AS SYMBOLIZED BY THE FEET OF DANIEL'S IMAGE.—Dan. 2 : 41-45.

Countries of the Roman Empire as they were in 1866.

The Future Ten Kingdoms of the Roman Empire.

As to the Roman Empire territory in the North of Africa, Algeria belongs to France, and Tunis and Tripoli may be annexed to France or Italy.

DR. TREGELLES,

in his "Remarks on the Prophecies of Daniel," published in 1846-7, says in his exposition of Daniel 8 :

"The roughgoat is the King of Greece, and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king," etc. After the rise of the empire of Alexander and his personal rule have been spoken of in the vision (verses 5-8), we find, "the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven." In the interpretation, this is stated (verse 22), "Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power." This fourfold division had been intimated in Daniel 7 : 6, by the four heads of the third beast.

"We know simply as a matter of historical fact, that after the death of Alexander, his dominions were parcelled out among his generals, and that after a few years (subsequently to the battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301) four kingdoms were formed.

"1. Ptolemy possessed Egypt, Cyrene, Cœle-Syria, and some of the southern parts of Asia Minor. 2. Cassander had Macedon and Greece. 3. Lysimachus obtained Thrace, Western Bithynia, Lesser Phrygia, Mysia, and Lydia, and—4. Seleucus had Syria and all the rest.

"Daniel's vision, after speaking of the formation of the four horns, proceeds thus : 'And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceedingly great toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land.' This is explained thus in the interpretation—'And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up,' etc. The history of this horn or king is then given and it reaches to the end of the vision; everything concerning this person and his actions must therefore belong to the period called 'the last end of the indignation.'

"To this period, then, the issue of this vision belongs; a king rises from one of the four parts of that dominion which once was in the power of Alexander; his power extends in various directions; among others 'toward the pleasant land'; this, of course, means the land of Israel. Violent oppression and blasphemy appear to characterize this king, both from the statement of the vision and the explanation given by Gabriel.

"It is scarcely possible for us to have examined this eighth chapter of Daniel without being struck with many points of resemblance between this little horn and the little horn which has been spoken of in the seventh chapter; that in the seventh chapter continues to act till Christ takes the kingdom—the one before us acts up to 'the last end of the indignation.' These two periods are synchronous. Thus the horn in this chapter and that in chapter 7 coincide as to period of time.

"Further, the four divided kingdoms which formed themselves out of the empire of Alexander, were one by one incorporated with the Roman Empire; but it is out of one of these four kingdoms that the little horn in this eighth chapter springs, hence it is clear that he will belong to the Roman earth. Thus the persons spoken of in the two chapters are found within the same territorial limits. The moral features of the two are also alike.

"The conclusion appears to be that the horn of chapter 7 and that of chapter 8 are one and the same person.

"But it may be asked—How can these two little horns be identical; for that in chapter 7 springs out of one of the ten parts of Cæsar's Roman earth, that in chapter 8 from one of the four parts of Alexander's Grecian Empire? The answer to this is simple, and, I believe, satisfactory: In chapter 7 we see that the whole of the Roman earth is to be divided into ten kingdoms; these ten being found in its whole extent, the East as well as the West. The four parts of Alexander's empire formed a considerable portion of the Eastern half of the Roman territory; and as we see here these four existent as kingdoms at the time of the end, it follows that four kingdoms out of the ten will be identical with the four parts into which the Grecian Empire was long ago divided, viz., Egypt, Greece, Thrace, and Syria.

"A horn springs out of one of these parts; it may be described in a general manner, as in chapter 7, as rising from one of the ten kingdoms, or else in a much more definite way, as in chapter 8, as rising from one of the four kingdoms, so that we see even what part or direction of the Roman earth will give Antichrist his origin (as a sovereign power or horn).

"The whole extent of the Roman Empire is marked out in prophecy as that which shall be divided into ten kingdoms, just as the Grecian Empire of Alexander the Great was separated into four.

"We have, in accordance with Scripture, to look at all the present period as one in which changes and divisions take place in the Roman earth prior to that tenfold development into kingdoms which shall precede the rise of the terrible but transient horn of blasphemy. 'The ten horns are ten kings that shall arise, and another shall rise after them' (Dan. 7 : 24).

"Britain, which had been invaded by Julius Cæsar in B.C. 55, and which for many subsequent years maintained only a commercial connection with Rome, was made part of the Roman Empire by the successors of Augustus Cæsar about a century after Julius Cæsar's invasion—so far, at least, as the lines of forts carried from the Clyde to the Forth in Scotland. Even farther north there were Roman towns. . . . It seems to me we should include Southern Britain (i.e., below the Clyde and Forth) in the Roman Empire, and take as its boundary-line in Europe the Rivers Rhine and Danube in the general sense."

Thus Dr. Tregelles does not include Ireland among the countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire which he maintains are to be formed into ten kingdoms, and therefore in his view Ireland must be separated from England, which is to be one of those ten kingdoms. Dr. Tregelles gives in his book the same map of the Roman Empire which is given in Bagsters' and many other Reference Bibles, and which excludes Ireland but includes all Britain and most of Scotland, and the same territories as we have described as belonging to the Roman Empire, viz., Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Thracian Turkey, and Bulgaria with Hungary; and in a chapter on "The Roman Empire and its Divisions," he designates those countries and the North of Africa as constituting the territories of the Roman Empire.

(To be continued.)

* [Note added in 1880.] The separation of Bulgaria from the Turkish Empire in 1877 and its formation into a distinct kingdom was a remarkable fulfilment of Prophecy. It and Austria may be expected soon to divide Serbia between them. The outline of Thrace is now re-appearing, because its ancient frontier, the Balkan mountains, has been made the boundary line between Central Turkey (ancient Thrace) and Bulgaria. The agitation in Greece for the annexation of Thessaly and Epirus is a noticeable movement toward that prophetic fulfilment. Macedonia and Albania are also before long to be added to Greece.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Telegram from Lieut. Danenhower, of the Jeannette Expedition, received on February 2d, gives rise to grave apprehensions as to the fate of De Long and his companions. The two sailors who were with De Long and who made their way to Bolonenga, were sent forward on October 9th, and reported the severe straits in which the party were placed. In searching for them Lieutenant Danenhower discovered some records buried by De Long which confirmed the statement of the sailors. One of these, dated October 1st, found near a deserted hut, said: "Fourteen of the officers and men of the Jeannette reached this hut on Wednesday, September 28th, and, having been forced to wait for the river to freeze over, are proceeding to cross to the west side this morning on their journey to reach some settlement on the Lena River. I have two days' provisions, but having been fortunate enough thus far to get game in our pressing needs we have no fear for the future. Our party are all well except Hans Eriksen, whose toes have been amputated in consequence of frost bite. Other records will be found in several huts on the east side of the river, along which we have come from the north." Other records were found of a later date, from which it was learned that Eriksen died on October 7th. The party have been traced to a wilderness on the west bank of the Lena, into which the natives refused to follow them, and a return to Bolonenga was necessary to get Russian assistance on November 28th. A large force is now searching, having to dig out everything, as the ground is deeply covered with snow. The wilderness is devoid of game. Thus it seems that early in October De Long, with only two days' provisions, which he hoped to eke out by supplies of game, entered a wilderness devoid of game, and a month was lost in searching for him. Lieutenant Danenhower has lost the sight of one eye and the sight of the other is impaired, and one member of the party is suffering from softening of the brain. The Secretary of the Navy despatched two officers of the navy from New York on Saturday last to assist in the search.

Another Political Crisis has been Developed in Egypt, and the chief minister, Cherif Pacha, whom the Khédive appointed at the instance of the army, has been forced to resign. The Notables, the legislative assembly of Egypt, sent a deputation to Cherif Pacha, and formally requested him to sign the draft of a proposed law. Cherif Pacha referred them to the Khédive, and they thereupon proceeded to the palace. The Khédive deferred his reply to their request, and summoned the English and French consuls to a consultation, in the course of which Cherif Pacha arrived at the palace and tendered his resignation. The correspondent of the London Times says that public opinion at Cairo strongly favors Turkish intervention under the English and French Commissioners. "The Notables" are the mere creatures of the army, and Araby Bey, the leader of the troops, is reported to have had a stormy interview with the President of that body, during which he pointed to his sword and spoke threateningly in regard to what the Chamber might expect if it swerved an inch from the path prescribed by the military. The state of Egypt is now but little removed from anarchy. The event derives its chief importance from the fact that England and France decided recently to use active measures if Cherif Pacha was ousted or the Khédive's authority menaced.

The Commissioners under the Irish Land Law still continue to make enormous reductions in the rental of farms. At a sitting of one of the courts on January 31st, the rent of a farm on Lord Egmont's property was reduced from $420 to $165, and the rents of several others were reduced forty-five per cent. The imprisoned Land Leaguers will be made the subject of debate when Parliament meets. An agitation has been made with the view of inducing Mr. Gladstone to release those of them who are Members of Parliament in time to take their seats, but in a letter the premier wrote to a correspondent he appears to indicate that he has resolved to keep them in prison. Mr. Gladstone said: "The Government cannot consistently release these individuals until they have lost their power or have renounced their intention of pursuing a course of disturbance. Neither of these conditions is so far apparently fulfilled. The Government thus has no alternative but to persevere with a most painful duty."

A Meeting Summoned by the Lord Mayor of London to protest against the outrages on the Russian Jews was held at the Mansion House on February 1st. Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, who was invited but was unable to be present, wrote to the Lord Mayor "protesting as a nonconformist and a liberal against the outrages upon the Jews." Mr. Alfred Tennyson, the Poet Laureate, was also prevented attending, but a letter was received from him in which he said: "I am dismayed at the madness of the hatred evinced against the Jews. If the unspeakable barbarities being committed are not universally denounced it is only because they are so alien to the spirit of the age as to be almost incredible." The Earl of Shaftesbury, Cardinal Manning, and Canon Farrar spoke in support of the resolutions. The Lord Mayor was requested to forward a copy of the resolutions to Mr. Gladstone, "in the hope that the government, when an opportunity arises, shall exercise a friendly influence in behalf of the persecuted Jews." A relief fund was opened, and subscriptions to the amount of $95,000 were received. Other meetings with the same object have been held in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, and other cities.

The Mormon Preachers in England have been roughly handled by a London mob. Encouraged by Mr. Gladstone's refusal to protect the ignorant classes of society from their wiles, they extended their operations and preached boldly in the London streets. On Friday, January 27th, six Mormon elders endeavored to hold an open-air meeting at Kings Cross, London. They were accompanied by a procession of Mormon men and women singing hymns. One of the elders delivered an address and urged upon his hearers the advantages of emigration to Utah. The meeting was broken up by a large crowd, who attacked the Mormons. Several persons were hurt.

The King of Greece is said to Have Received a most chilling reception from his subjects when he opened the Chamber of Deputies on January 31st. The Athens correspondent of the London Times says: "The reception of the king's address at the opening of the Chamber of Deputies was absolutely unsympathetic. The silence was unbroken at his entry and departure. The people in the streets were equally cold. So decided an expression of public disfavor was never before seen since the king's accession to the throne." There is something ominous in such news, Greece being notoriously prone to change and revolution.

The Failure of the Union Générale, a great financial institution in Paris, was announced on January 30th. The news produced a painful sensation in business circles, as it was thought certain that many smaller concerns were so deeply involved in the failure that they could not survive. The Union Générale was an institution started in the interests of the Roman Catholic religion, and of the Monarchical party in politics. The Compté de Chambord, the head of the Bourbon line, contributed $500,000 to its capital. It carried on the business of a bank, but it also conducted other operations of a speculative character. No statement of affairs has been issued, but it is reported that the liabilities of the institution amount to $28,000,000. M. Bontoux, the president, and M. Feder, one of the directors of the Union Générale, have been arrested, and it is expected that other members of the board will also be placed on trial. The last statement issued represented the institution to be in a prosperous condition.

Monsignor Justin, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Besancon, in eastern France, some time ago received from a wine merchant a present of a cask of truly excellent red wine, described as suitable to be used at mass. Being struck by the quality of the wine, and by its low price, he recommended it without scruple to his clergy. The vendor consequently received many orders; but the wine which he distributed among the lesser clergy was of a very different quality from that which he had presented to the archbishop. Yet it was a wine that tasted well, and the majority of country curés who used it had no suspicion that it was anything but pure unadulterated juice of the grape, such as the rubric enjoins shall be drunk by priests when saying mass. One priest, however, more experienced than the rest, went to the expense of having the wine analyzed, and then it was found that this extraordinary beverage did not contain a single drop of grape juice. Great was the scandal which resulted upon this discovery, and the archbishop was obliged to order that all the masses in which the spurious wine had been used should be annulled. This decision was announced in the pulpits of about a hundred churches.

Mr. Thomas E. Murphy has been Conducting another remarkably successful Gospel Temperance campaign, in the busy Lancashire town of Rawtenstall. The huge Co-operative Hall has been crowded at every meeting, and nearly 4,000 have signed the pledge. The prayer-meetings are well attended, and the whole religious community has been stirred up, not only to endeavor to save drunkards from the curse of drink, but also to lead them to Christ.

Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, one of the Twin Sons of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, has just accepted the pastorate of the Baptist Church at Auckland, New Zealand.

"The Treasury of David:" by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. A homiletical exposition of the Book of Psalms. Vol. II., comprising psalms 27 to 52; Vol. III., psalms 53 to 78; Vol. IV., psalms 79 to 103. We have not the other volumes. Price $3 a volume postage free. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Vols. III. and IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1880 and 1881, with complete indexes. Price, $3 each volume, including postage ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

BY THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1882.

16th Year. No. 7.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF MR. AND MRS. BOOTH, who Organized the Salvation Army.
FIFTH REPLY TO MR. INGERSOLL. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday morning.
SYLPH SOMERS. By Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Ouffe" (Continued).
PICTURE OF AN ATTACK BY A LION ON DR. LIVINGSTONE, THE MISSIONARY.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Continued).

CURRENT EVENTS: The Canal Project—The Reapportionment Question—The Midlothian Mine on Fire—A Degrading Spectacle—Visiting an Opium Den—An Unwilling Ride—A Story Revealed in a Trunk—An Indian Dandy's Costume—A Family Reunited through a Dream, etc.

A SOLDIER'S LAST REQUEST (with Illustration).

ACCEPTABLE SERVICE. A New Sermon by Rev. O. H. Spurgeon.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).

The Growth of the Kingdom. S. S. Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter—Thirsty. A Temperance Appeal.

FOREIGN TOPICS: Opening of the British Parliament—Mr. Bradlaugh Refused Admission—An Explosive Letter—The Outrages on the Jews, etc.

MRS. BOOTH.

SALVATION ARMY STANDARD.

GENERAL BOOTH.

HOLINESS MEETING OF THE SALVATION ARMY AT HEADQUARTERS.

GENERAL AND MRS. BOOTH, AND A SALVATION ARMY MEETING.

GENERAL AND MRS. BOOTH OF THE SALVATION ARMY.

General Booth's Conversion to Christ—Early Evangelistic Work—Appointed Lay Preacher—Enters the Methodist Ministry—Memorable Visit to Guernsey—Invitations from Large Towns—Set Apart as an Evangelist—Officially Requested to Abandon Evangelistic Work—Successful Mission in Cornwall—The Character and Results of Mrs. Booth's Preaching—Service in a Tent at Whitechapel—Mr. Booth Consecrates his Life to the Salvation of the Masses—The First Headquarters—Organization of the "Salvation Army"—A Great Holiness Meeting.

THERE have appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at various times references to the work the Salvation Army is accomplishing here and in England. We this week give with the portraits of Mr. Booth and his wife, who originated the movement, a sketch of its earliest conception and its progress.

The Rev. W. Booth, the well-known originator and general of the Salvation Army, is now about fifty-three years of age, having been born at Nottingham, England, in the year 1829. He was brought up by his parents to attend the services of the Episcopal Church; but when about fourteen years of age he manifested a decided preference for the Methodist Chapel, where, about a year later, the preaching of the Gospel was blessed by the Holy Spirit to his soul, and he was CONVERTED TO GOD.

About this time, two or three youths, recently converted, and in the abounding enthusiasm of their "first love" to Christ, had commenced meetings in the lower parts of the town, and into this work, almost immediately after his conversion, Mr. Booth threw himself, with all his characteristic ardor of soul, preaching constantly in the open-air, in all weathers. At the early age of seventeen, so greatly had he commended himself to the responsible officials of his denomination, that he became an accredited lay preacher. Two years later he was urged by the superintendent of the circuit to enter the ministry, but the physicians who examined him, reported that his physical strength was not sufficient for the work, saying that if he entered upon the requisite course of training, associated with regular and exhausting ministerial labor, twelve months would probably end his career. Under these circumstances, he resolved to wait, and in the meantime devoted himself, as far as was possible, to Christian work.

For eighteen months he was wholly engaged preaching in London and in Lincolnshire, and in 1843, at the age of twenty-four, he

ENTERED THE MINISTRY

of the Methodist New Connection, by whose Conference he was stationed in London. But he had not been thus happily and successfully employed many weeks when the officials of the Guernsey Society, having heard of his great success in winning souls, urgently invited him to that island on a preaching excursion. He thought it right to respond to the invitation, and commenced his labors. It was on a certain Wednesday that his first sermon in Guernsey was preached. Nothing remarkable occurred for the first few days, beyond increasing congregations and deepening convictions; but on the Sunday following, thirty persons professed to have found Christ, and, in a stay of ten days, it was estimated that no less than three hundred persons decided for God.

The Guernsey people were naturally most urgent for Mr. Booth's visit to be prolonged; but he was compelled to return to his circuit. The report of this wonderful movement, however, which he was instrumental in initiating, had preceded him on his return to England, and rapidly spread in all directions. The consequence was that he received most pressing invitations to visit nine large towns in various parts of Great Britain for similar enterprises. So successful was Mr. Booth in these places, and so evidently adapted for this particular kind of labor, that the Conference of the following year, 1844, set him apart for and in that capacity he visited Guernsey a second time, where the divine blessing again fell upon the immense congregations to which he preached the Gospel of salvation. A short time afterwards he went to the English towns of York, Sheffield, Dewsbury, Hunslet, Leeds, Halifax, and Macclesfield, upon the same glorious errand and realized the same enriching benediction.

THE WORK OF AN EVANGELIST,

The Methodist New Connection Magazine and other denominational journals of the year 1845, show that the following results attended his untiring and prayerful efforts to bring men to Christ. At Hanley, "upwards of four hundred persons, of all ages," were registered as converts. At Newcastle-under-Lyme, in "one week, two hundred and ninety." In Sheffield, during "four weeks six hundred and sixty-three." At Halifax, "in four weeks, between four and five hundred." At Chester, a congregation of a thousand was gathered every night, and "hundreds" sought salvation. Fifteen persons converted in connection with these labors are known to have entered the regular ministry of different denominations. This evangelistic work was continued by him for about ten years.

Some ministers, however, felt that the special services were not an unalloyed good, and when they saw that at the conclusion of those services many of the converts, like the hearers of the stony ground order, fell away, they were averse to the continuance of the special services. In deference to their wishes, Mr. Booth consented to return in 1856-7 to accordingly he spent the next four years in the work of the ministry in two spheres of labor. At one place—Gateshead—a large congregation was established, and the members of the Church trebled in numbers during his ministry there. But so deep were his convictions, and those of his equally devoted wife, that he could more effectually serve God and his generation as an evangelist, that he offered himself again for this work; and when the Conference of 1861 deliberately refused to allow him to return to that sphere, for which he had been proved so peculiarly adapted, and insisted upon his settling down permanently to the routine of a circuit, in the ministry, and went forth, trusting in the guidance of God, to hold services whenever and wherever a door might open.

ORDINARY PASTORAL WORK;

HE RESIGNED HIS POSITION

The next two years (1862-3) were mostly spent in Cornwall, where the services which he held among the warm-hearted miners and fishermen, were blessed to the salvation of thousands of souls. Whole neighborhoods were stirred to their centre, the claims of religion and of Christ became the all-absorbing topic of the hour, and the principal theme of common conversation.

MRS. BOOTH COMMENCED PREACHING

twelve months before Mr. Booth left the regular denominational ministry, holding evangelistic services during that year in Durham, Newcastle-on-Tyne, East Hartlepool, and in Sunderland, in addition to regular preaching engagements at Gateshead. In all Mr. Booth's evangelistic tours also Mrs. Booth shared her husband's exhausting labors, her ministry, both then and ever since, being marvellously popular, everywhere attracting crowded audiences, and her pointed, personal pathetic appeals to the souls and consciences of men and women, leading large numbers to decision for Christ and His service and glory. From Cornwall Mr. and Mrs. Booth proceeded to Cardiff, Newport, Walsall, Birmingham, Leeds, and various other places.

Between two engagements, Mr. Booth went to London in June, 1865, and held a week's at the east end of London. Here he saw the enormous population of utterly godless people which swarmed on every side, and feeling his heart powerfully drawn out for their salvation, he resolved, in the strength of the Lord, to turn aside from those who, in all directions throughout the country would have invited him to continue the work of an evangelist in their midst, and to spend the remainder of his life in endeavoring to Christianize the millions of his perishing countrymen of the most depraved and most neglected classes.

SERVICES IN A TENT IN WHITECHAPEL,

He began by preaching in the open-air upon a piece of land by the side of the Mile End Road, called "The Waste," where vagrant curiosity exhibitions, shooting ranges, petty dealers, and patent medicine men rival each other in attracting the attention of the poor. In those days it was somewhat of a novelty for any one to stand there stately and regularly in all weathers to preach to the ever-moving masses of the people. And this tall, dark stranger who came to talk to them all familiarly about their souls, using every passing event and every common proverb, to illustrate and point the mighty truths which he was preaching, who used the plainest and simplest language to express divine truth, was a new wonder—an attraction equal at any rate to punch-and-judy or the giant baby, exhibited close at hand.

ENLISTING THE FIRST RECRUITS.

From the very opening of his marvellous campaign in this locality, dense crowds surrounded Mr. Booth, and while he spoke, the unseen but invincible power of God sent into the depths of many a dark and despairing soul, the burning arrow of conviction. Men and women long burdened with sins accompanied the preacher to a tent, and one after another fell down at the feet of Jesus, and sought and found mercy. These, rallying around their spiritual father in the open-air, soon began by their singing, and their simple relation of God's pardoning love to them, to increase and deepen the general interest, and many who, perhaps, would have taken but little notice of a mere preacher, now stood speechless and astonished to hear men who had been notorious for their iniquity but a little while before, tell of the peace and joy and love which they had newly found.

The autumn winds and rains soon demolished the tent; but the work went on in the open air. While a ring of devoted men and women prayed to God for blessing as they stood on the ground, the power of the Holy Spirit repeatedly fell upon those around, so that they were constrained to step out before the staring and astonished crowd, and then and there to join in prayer to God and seek His forgiving mercy.

AN OLD DANCING SALOON

was, however, soon secured for indoor services, and then a low gin-mill was purchased entire and converted into a mission hall. Both these places were small, but as the people inconveniently crowded together on floors, and stairs, and passages, and listened with eager ears and hearts to catch every sound, often from lips they could not see, the truth of God smote great and small together, and many were daily freed from the thralldom of Satan, and stepped new born into the glad enfranchisement of the redeemed.

The time had evidently come for a great advance to be made, and God plainly showed the way. In 1866 near at hand, was taken for Sunday afternoons and evenings, and there, by thousands, came old and young, nearly all of them utterly unaccustomed to the sound of the Gospel. Here on the stage awakened sinners sought and found salvation. As the fame of the work spread, hearers came, not merely from the immediate neighborhood, but from every part of London, and especially from its eastern districts. Saved themselves, the converts naturally looked around among their circle of daily associates and friends with longing hearts, and from other parts of London soon came pouring in upon Mr. Booth earnest undeniable entreaties for the commencement of similar work among the masses there.

A LARGE THEATRE,

The invariable answer was, "Well, see if you can get any room suitable for services, and let me know what it will cost, and I will come and see about it." To working people, who were determined to get something, this opened a pretty clear course. A club-room, a cellar, a shed, a back room behind a pigeon-fancier's store, an old factory, a schoolroom, a cottage, were just as eagerly sought after where nothing larger could be secured, though a variety theatre was preferred where they could hire one.

Everywhere, however, the mighty power of God to save the most abandoned sinners was constantly exemplified, in the most marvellous manner, by the instrumentality of converted navvies, and thieves, and infidels, and drunkards, and gipsies, and sailors, and butchers and dog-fanciers—in short, the roughest, most ignorant, and wildest men and women who could well have been got together, were set up as witnesses for Christ, who had plucked them as

BRANDS FROM THE BURNING.

Twos and threes of such men were soon multiplied in each locality to strong bands of trained and indefatigable laborers. Thus the work grew and prospered during 1866-8.

In 1869 Mrs. Booth held services at Croydon, Hastings, and Brighton, and in each of these places Christians were stirred up to seek the salvation of souls with a diligence hitherto unknown to them. They asked for the establishment of the mission in each case, and the request was complied with. Some of the Croydon converts, at the request of one of their number who had removed to Bromley, rode over in a wagon to that place, and commenced services, which resulted in the establishment of a branch of the mission there. And, in rapid succession, openings were secured or made in every precinct of eastern London. The holy fire was spreading, and no human agency could restrain or extinguish it. The was acquired in 1870. It is a building which has been arranged so as to furnish sitting accommodation for two thousand persons, and until 1881, when new central premises were secured in Queen Victoria Street, in the City of London, served well as the headquarters first of "the Christian Mission" and subsequently of the Salvation Army. Each successive year witnessed some new departure in the name of the Lord, the achievement of yet more brilliant exploits, and the conversion of thousands to the Saviour. But the year 1873 will always be memorable in the history of the Army, or it witnessed a marvellous advance of the whole movement.

PEOPLE'S MARKET AT WHITECHAPEL

A year previously Mr. Booth had, through serious illness, been laid aside from the work for several months, and the various agencies associated with the mission had consequently suffered very considerably, and materially affected the entire success of the movement. Evangelists, recruited from various religious denominations, had come, bringing, with all their piety and devotion, an amount of inclination towards the settled and methodical church life which they had left. The mission was, therefore, being diverted from the primary object Mr. Booth had in view toward the regular system of the churches. But with the recovery of Mr. Booth came the return of the old ideas, away from the edification of those already brought to Christ, to the training of them to further onslaughts upon the kingdom of darkness. The year 1873, therefore, was commenced with a stronger determination than ever to keep the mission true to its original aim—the spread of

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE MASSES.

With this object in view, both Mr. and Mrs. Booth labored with unceasing assiduity. Branches were established and consolidated at Portsmouth,atham, and Wellingborough; while in London itself the spirit of holy aggression continued to break through the barriers of the past, and carried the work into new localities with a speed that was surprising, and everywhere being crowned with ever multiplying tokens of the divine approval.

The distinguishing feature of the year 1874 was the inauguration of the work at Hammersmith. A lady in the locality, who had long been aiming at the evangelization of the poor, had been persuaded by her Bible-woman, one of the fruits of the Christian Mission, to invite Mr. Booth's co-operation by sending preachers for Sunday services. In less than twelve months some hundreds of men and women had yielded to the power of the Gospel, and a great body of working people were helping to spread the glad tidings yet farther and farther. This year, also,

A CONVERTED TINKER

Stockton-on-Tees, a converted railway guard at Middlesbrough, and a converted navy at Cardiff, commenced what have since become powerful missions in each of those hives of industry.

And now each successive year in the history and operations of the organization produced results which read almost like a repetition of the rapid conquests of apostolic days. Men and women of vicious habits leading depraved lives have heard the Gospel preached, not in elegant language and polite phrase, but in words such as they were accustomed to use; they have been overcome, and, abandoning their sinful ways, have submitted to God and have in turn preached the Gospel to their associates.

"THE SALVATION ARMY"

won the right to its new name in 1878, when it sprang out of comparative weakness and obscurity into strength, and attacked and obtained a footing in fifty towns where it had no representative at the commencement of the year. This sudden outburst, whereby the number of stations occupied was raised from thirty to more than eighty, and the number of evangelists or officers from thirty to one hundred and twenty-seven, attracted public attention to the movement, and many Christians who had at first looked askance at it, realized that it enjoyed the favor of God.

The East London Christian Revival Society had developed into the East London Christian Mission, and by another stage into the Salvation Army. It had been enabled to achieve a magnificent work in London among a class the churches had never been able to reach. It had gone into localities which even city missionaries had not penetrated, and its efforts had been blest. Its power, instrumentally, consisted in the fact that those who went to preach in the slums were men well known there. They had but a short time before been denizens of those wretched haunts, and they stood up to tell their old companions, in their old way, of their having found a good thing which they pressed them to come and share. So it came about that burglars, drunkards, and criminals of all sorts went to hear Tom or Bill talk, who could not have been induced to listen to a trained and cultured preacher. "Religion is all very well for gentlefolks," they would have said, "but it would not suit such as we are," but when one of their own circle had tried it, and came to tell them it did suit him, then they went to hear his testimony and were converted.

The organizing brain of the leader soon saw that in the army he had a pattern he could utilize. Detachments were thrown out to do for other places what had been done in London, and at length America, France, and Ireland were invaded. But the work was being done by raw recruits; men who were converted, straightway gave God thanks and began to preach. It was necessary, as Mr. Booth saw, that this zeal and enthusiasm should be, not repressed, but wisely directed, and catching the idea most familiar to the minds of the people with whom he had to deal, he organized the army. The roughs had seen one of themselves, filthy, untidy, unwashed, uncombed, enlist in the army and in a few weeks becoming clean, orderly, neat in person, and prompt to obey. They understood discipline and had seen its effects, and Mr. Booth took advantage of this influence fashioned ready to his hand.

Thus the Salvation Army has become a power in the war between the Prince of Peace and the prince of this world. Its soldiers and officers are fighting under the same flag as are the churches, but they have a field and a method of their own. Criticism has been lavished upon them, but as the churches have seen hardened criminals won from the power of Satan they have nearly ceased to carp at the power God uses to advance His purposes, and have begun to welcome them as allies, rough, it may be, and uncultured, but honest, sincere, faithful, earnest, and well adapted to do the rough work which urgently needs doing.

A HOLINESS MEETING was held held in Exeter Hall, London, on December 26th, 1881, which was placed at the disposal of the Salvation Army for the day by the Young Men's Christian Association. The meeting continued all day, and a large body of members of the army remained at Exeter Hall from morning to night, dinner and tea being provided in the restaurant and reading-room of the Young Men's Christian Association, whose commodious premises were wholly occupied by the army. Many of the general public were present at the meeting, and of these a large proportion were evidently such as had come to see and judge the army for themselves. Several clergymen of the Episcopal Church and Nonconformist ministers were among the multitude. On the platform, near the General, were several gentlemen prominent in philanthropic circles.

THE WORK OF THE ARMY IN 1881.

In the course of the day an account was given of the year's work of the army, from which it appeared that the movement was developing in England, and branches had been established in America, Australia, and notably in France. At the present time the army has 251 stations in Great Britain, under 533 officers and cadets, holding over 4200 services every week. Lately, 6986 children have joined the army as little soldiers. At the seven o'clock Sunday morning "knee-drills" at 182 stations, 8331 were reported as attending on the morning of December 5th; and a sum equivalent to $4455 was contributed in local offerings for that week at 187 stations, on which estimate the amount received in 1881 is said to be not less than $285,000. General Booth has just purchased the Orphan Asylum, at Clapton, near London, as a Congress Hall and Institution for training cadets. We gave a picture and full description of this commodious building on December 22, 1881. Its cost is $100,000, and toward this amount General Booth has already received the sum of $50,000.

THE RIOT AT SHEFFIELD

on January 16th was one of the most painful experiences the Salvation Army has yet been called upon to bear. Sheffield has long been notorious for the desperate character of its roughs, and in no place on earth has trade unionism been disgraced by outrages so diabolical as have occurred in that town. They were cruel and inhuman, showing that the perpetrators were men over whom Satan exerted unbounded influence. It was to be expected that when the Salvation Army attempted to preach the Gospel to such men, Satan would stir up some to resist it. Men who thrive on the vices of others would dread the approach of any movement likely to endanger the profits of their vile trade, and they were at no loss to find instruments to execute their wicked designs.

On Sunday, January 15th, the army marched through the town, amid the jeers of a hostile mob, but without being molested. The attempt, however, on the following day to march to the Albert Hall led to a most serious riot. Three carriages, containing the officers of the army, a brass band, and a converted wrestler, who rode a gray horse and wore a scarlet uniform, presented to him at Newcastle on the occasion of the Stephenson centenary, when he carried the banner, took part in the procession. The latter had not advanced far on its way when it became apparent that the crowds, with which the streets were thronged, meant mischief. Mud and brickbats were freely thrown, and with cut and bleeding faces, and half covered in mire, the Salvationists pressed on.

Even the females were attacked in this brutal fashion. Eventually it was thought wise to divide the procession into two parts, which should make for the hall by different routes. One division was led by the converted wrestler, and this seems to have suffered most. The poor fellow was struck by a stick on the back of the head, and was carried to the hospital suffering from concussion of the brain. The hall was reached at last, and meetings—the evening one being, it is said, a great success—were held within the building, while the mob roared and yelled without.

It appears that the animosity against the wrestler arose from the fact that, when converted, he was engaged to wrestle with a noted champion of the ring, and a large sum of money was pending in bets on the issue of the struggle. When the great change in the man's soul occurred, he declined the contest, and he persisted in his refusal in spite of many efforts made to overcome his resolution, in one of which a reward of $150 was offered to the man who should cause the wrestler to become intoxicated. All the attempts failed, and as a result he was the best hated man in the procession.

FIFTH REPLY TO MR. INGERSOLL.
Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Morning, February 12, 1882.

"Do men gather grapes of thorns?"—MATT. 7 : 16.
What Thorns do—Good Results Argue a Good Cause—Mr. Ingersoll's Charges against the Bible—I. A Cruel Book—Its Philanthropic Students—Where does the Cruelty crop out?—II. An Impure Book—Where are the Victims?—III. A Mass of Contradictions—IV. An Unscientific Book—V. An Imposition on Human Credulity—Fulfilled Prophecies—The Prophecies in Good Company—The Secret of the Influence of the Bible Writers—Uneducated Men—The Assaults of Centuries—The Bible Unmoved—When we can Afford to do without the Bible—The Bible in Heaven—Question of a Dying Hindoo.

NOT in this country. Not in any country. Thorns stick, thorns lacerate, but all the thorns put together never yielded one cluster of Catawba or Isabella grapes. Christ, who was the master of apt and potent illustration, is thus setting forth what you and I well know, that you cannot get that which is pleasant and healthful and good from that which is bad. If you find a round, large, beautiful cluster of grapes you know that it was produced by a good grape-vine, and not from a tangle of Canada thistle. Now, if I can show you that this Holy Bible yields good fruit, healthful fruit, grand fruit, splendid fruit, you will come to the conclusion it is a good Bible, and all the arguments of Mr. Ingersoll against it when he tries to show it is a bad book, will go overboard.

I. "Do men gather grapes of thorns?" Can a bad book yield good results? Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors—for there is no personality in this matter, I only mention one name as a representative of a class—Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors with great vehemence declare that the Bible is a cruel book. They read the story of the extermination of the Canaanites, and of all the ancient wars, and of the history of David and Joshua, and they come to the conclusion that the Bible is in favor of laceration and manslaughter and massacre. Now, a bad book will produce a bad result, a cruel book will produce a cruel result.

You have friends who have been in the habit of reading the Bible a great many years. Have you noticed a tendency to cruelty on their part? Have you ever heard any of them come out and practically say, "I have been reading the story about the extermination of the Canaanites and I am seized upon with a disposition to cut and slash and maul and pinch and murder and knock to pieces everything I can lay my hands on?" Have you friends who in proportion as they became diligent Bible students and disciples of the Christ of the Bible, have shown a tendency toward massacre and murder and manslaughter? Has that been your observation?

What has been the effect upon your children of this cruel book? or, if you do not allow the book to be read in your household, what has been the effect upon the children of other households where the Word of God is honored? Have they as a result of reading this cruel book gone forth with a cruel spirit to pull the wings off flies and to pinion grasshoppers and to rob bird's nests? A cruel book ought to make cruel people; if they diligently read it and get absorbed with its principles, that cause must produce that effect. At what time did you notice that the teachings of this Holy Bible created cruelty in the heart and the life of George Peabody, of Miss Dix, of Florence Nightingale, of John Howard, of John Frederick Oberlin, of Abbot Laurence? Have you noticed in reading the biography of these people that in proportion as they became friends of the Bible they became enemies to humanity? Have you not, on the contrary, noticed that all the institutions of mercy were established, or, being established, were chiefly supported by the friends of this Book? There is the hospital in war time. There are twenty Christian women. They are binding up wounds, they are offering cordials, they are kneeling down by the dying praying for their departing spirits.

WHERE DOES THE CRUELTY CROP OUT?

They have been reading the Bible all their lives. They read it every morning; they read it every night; they carry it under their arm when they go into the hospital.

Where does the cruelty of the Book crop out? Is it in the gentleness of their step? Is it in the cadence of their voice? Is it in the sympathetic prayer they offer at the bedside of the dying? Your common sense tells you that a cruel book must produce cruel results. When you can make a rose leaf stab like a bayonet, and when you can manufacture icicles out of the south wind, and when you can poison your tongue with honey gotten from blossoming buckwheat, then you can get cruelty out of the Bible. That charge of Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors falls flat in the presence of every honest man.

II. Again: Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors go on and most vehemently charge that this Bible is AN IMPURE BOOK.

You all know that an impure book produces impure results. No amount of money could hire you to allow your child to read an unclean book. Now, if this Bible be an impure book, where are the victims? Your father read it—did it make him a bad man? Your mother read it—did it make her a bad woman? Your sister fifteen years in Heaven died in the faith of this Gospel—did it despoil her nature? Some say there are two million copies of the Bible in existence, some say there are three million copies of the Bible. It is impossible to get the accurate statistic, but suppose there are two million copies of the Bible abroad, this one book read more than any twenty books that the world ever printed, this book abroad for ages, for centuries—

WHERE ARE THE VICTIMS?

Show me a thousand. Show me five hundred victims of an impure book. Show me a hundred despoiled of the Bible. Show me fifty. Show me ten. Show me two. Show me one! Two hundred million copies of an impure book, and not one victim of the impurity! On the contrary, you know very well that it is where the Bible has the most power that the family institution is most respected.

III. But Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors go on still further and they say the Bible is and they put prophet against prophet, evangelist against evangelist, apostle against apostle, and they say if this be true, how then can that be true. Mr. Mill, who was a friend of the Bible, said he had discovered thirty thousand different readings of the Scriptures, and yet, not one important difference—not one important difference out of thirty thousand—only the difference that you might expect from the fact that the book came down from generation to generation and was copied by a great many hands. And yet I put before you this fact to-day, that all the Bible writers agree in the four great doctrines of the Bible.

A MASS OF CONTRADICTIONS,

What are those four great doctrines? God—good, kind, patient, just, loving, omnipotent. Man—a lost sinner. Two destinies—one for believers, the other for unbelievers; all who accept Christ reaching that home and only those destroyed who destroy themselves; only those who turn their back upon Christ and come to the precipice and jump off, for God never pushes a man off, he jumps off. Now, in these four great doctrines all the Bible writers agree. Mozart, Beethoven, Handel, Haydn never wrote more harmonious music than you will find in this perfect harmony of the Word of God, the harmony in providence and in grace.

You must remember also that the authors of the Bible came from different lands, from different ages, and from different centuries. They had no communication with each other, they did not have an idea as to what was the chief design of the Bible, and yet their writings, gotten up from all these different lands, and from all these different ages, and all these different centuries, coming together make a perfect harmony in the opinion of the very best scholars of this country and of England. Is not that a most remarkable fact?

IV. Again: Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors vehemently charge that the Bible is an unscientific Book. In a former discourse I showed you that there was no collision between science and revelation, and I went from point to point in the discussion; but now let us have authority in this matter. You and I cannot give forty, or fifty, or sixty years exclusively to the study of science that some give. Let us have authority in this matter.

Who says there is a collision between science and revelation? Well, Herbert Spencer, Tyndal, Darwin, Ingersoll. They say there is a discord between science and revelation; but I will bring you names of men who have found a perfect accord between science and revelation—men as much higher in intellectual character above those whom I have mentioned as the Alps and Mount Washington and the Himalayas are higher than Rimbey Wood Water Works. Herschel, Kepler, Leibniz, Ross, Isaac Newton. My friends, we are in a respectable company when we believe in the Word of God—very respectable company.

In the temple of nature there are two orchestras, the orchestra of revelation, and the orchestra of science. The orchestra of revelation has all musical instruments full strung, and it is ready for the burst of eternal accord. The orchestra of science is only just stringing the instruments. If will only wait long enough you will find that as in the old German cathedrals where they had an organ at one end of the building, and an organ at the other end of the building, both responding to each other and making mighty music. So it will be in the temple of the universe—the orchestra of revelation and the orchestra of science will respond to each other after a while, and it be found that the roar of the ocean is only magnificent bass of the temple voices and that earth is only the pedals of a great organ of which the Heavens are the keyboard.

V. Now, I might, as Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors have failed to prove that the Bible is a cruel book, that the Bible is an impure book, that the Bible is a contradictory book, that the Bible is an unscientific book—I might move a nonsuit in this case of Infidelity, the plaintiff, against Christianity, the defendant; but I will not take advantage of the circumstances, for when Mr. Ingersoll and his coadjutors go on to say that we are a gullible people, when he goes on to say, as he often does in his lectures, that the greater the improbability the more we like to believe it; when, he goes on to say that the Bible is made up of a lot of manuscripts, one picked up here and another there, and another from some other place, and that the whole thing is on the credulity of the human race, I must reply to that charge.

AN IMPOSITION

The Bible is made up of the Old Testament and the New Testament. Let us take the New Testament first. Why do I believe it? Why do I take it to my heart? It is because it can be traced back to the divine heart just as easily as that aisle can be traced to that door, and that aisle to that door.

Jerome and Eusebius in the first century, Origen in the second century, and other writers of the third and fourth centuries, gave a list of New Testament writers just exactly correspond with our list, showing that the same New Testament which we have they had in the fourth century and the third century, and the second century, and the first century. But where did they get the New Testament? They got it from Irenæus. Where did Irenæus get it? He got it from Polycarp. Where did Polycarp get it? He got it from John, who was the personal associate of the Lord Jesus Christ. My grandfather gave a book to his father, my father gave it to me, I give it to my child. Is there any difficulty in tracing the line?

On communion day I will start the chalice at the end of the aisle, and the chalice will pass along the other end of this aisle. Will it be difficult to trace the line of that holy chalice? No difficulty at all. This one will say, "I gave it to that one and this one will say, 'I gave it to that one.' But it will not be so long a line as this to trace the New Testament. It is easier to get at the fact. But you say, 'Although this was handed right down in that way, who knows but they were lying impostors? How can you take their testimony?' They died for the truth of that book. Men never die for a lie cheerfully and triumphantly. They were not lying impostors. They died in triumph for the truth of that New Testament.

"Well," says some one, "now I am ready to lieve that the New Testament is from the heart Christ, but hy do you believe that?" I believe the Old stament because the prophecies foretold events ndreds and thousands of years ahead, events ich afterward took place. How far can you see ead? Two thousand years? Can you see ead a hundred years? Can you see ahead five nutes? No, no. Human prophecy amounts to hing. Here these old prophets stood thou- ds of years back and they foretold events which ne accurately true far on in the future centuries. ppose I should stand here this morning and say ou, twenty-five hundred and sixty years from w, three miles and a half from the city of Mos- w there will be an advent, and it will be in a cer- n family, and it will be amid certain surround- s. It would make no impression upon you, ause you know I cannot foresee a thousand rs, or one year, or one minute, and I cannot what is going to transpire in a land that I have ver looked at. But that is what these old pro- ets did.

HOW ABOUT THE OLD TESTAMENT?

You must remember that Tyre and Babylon and neveh were in full pomp and splendor when these phecies, these old prophecies, said they would e destroyed. Those cities had architecture that ke the houses on Madison Square and Fifth enue perfectly insignificant. Yet these old pphets walked right through those magnificent eets and said: "This has all got to come down, s is all going to be levelled."

Suppose a man should stand up in these cities ay, and say, "The East River will overflow and oklyn will be destroyed, and the Hudson River l overflow and New York will be destroyed, and n there will be a great earthquake and the two rs will forsake their beds, and there will be har- sts of wheat and corn where these cities now nd, and Fulton Street and Broadway will be sture for cattle." Such a man would be sent to omingdale Insane Asylum. Yet the old proph- id that very thing. Where is Babylon to- y? You go and walk over the ruins of Baby- and you will not find a leaf or a grass-blade of se splendid hanging gardens, and in the sum- r time the ground actually blisters the feet of e traveller. Babylon destroyed according to the phecy.

Where is Tyre? In the day of its pomp, the phet said: "The fishermen will dry their nets ere this city stands." If you should go to that ce to-day, you would find that literally. The rmen are drying their nets on the rocks where e city of Tyre once stood. Tartar, and Turk, and racen, drying their nets on the rocks.

Go up Chatham Street to-morrow and find the filment of a prophecy made thousands of years o. Why is it always distinguishable, whether you see him in w York, or Brooklyn, or Madras, or Peking, or enna, or Stockholm, or London, or Paris? The glishman comes to America and after a while loses his nationality. The American goes to gland and after a while he loses his nationality. e Norwegian his, the Russian his, the Italian e, the Spaniard his, the Jew never. Why? Be- use this book provided thousands of years ago t the Jews should be scattered in all lands and t they should be kept separate, separate until e Lord took them back to Jerusalem. And ye o persecute the Jews had better look out. They e God's people yet, and worse calamities than e assassination of a Czar will come upon Russia he does not take her foot off of the Jews. They e God's people, and according to the prophecy de thousands of years ago they are distinguish- le, they are kept separate until the Lord takes m to their native land.

THE JEW

How could those old prophets foretell that? ow could they know that thousands of years ago? as it mere human skill? Could you have seen far ahead? Could you have predicted anything e it? Those old prophets stood looking down the great future, and said a Messiah would be rn, in a certain nation, in a certain tribe, in a certain family, in a certain place, at a certain time, thousands of years ahead. Ages rolled on, ages on ages, and after a while Christ, the only One who has been called Messiah by any great number of people—Christ was born, in that very nation predicted, in that very tribe, in that very family, in that very place, at that very time. Could human skill have predicted it? Does not that prove be- yond all controversion and beyond all doubt that those prophets were inspired of the Lord Almighty, looking down in the future and seeing thousands of years ahead occurrences to take place, just as plainly as I see your faces this morning.

"Well," says some one, "now I am ready to take the New Testament as from the heart of Christ, and I am ready to believe the prophecies. The evidence is beyond all dispute. But you must remember," says my friend, "that the prophecies are only a small part of the old book; you don't expect us to believe all the old book." If you found one of your good, honest letters in an envelope with ten or twenty obscene, cruel, lying, filthy let- ters, how long would you allow that honest letter to stay there. In a half minute you would either snatch it out of the envelope, or you destroy the whole envelope. Now, do you suppose the Lord God would allow these pure prophecies, these prophecies which you admit must have come from the hand of God, from divine inspiration—do you suppose God would allow these pure prophecies to be bound up and put in the same envelope with the Book of Job, and the Book of Psalms, and the Book of Deuteronomy and the other books, if those books were not good books?

Beside all this, you must remember that the most of the writers of this book were

UNEDUCATED MEN.

How can you account for the fact that when Thomas Babington Macaulay, standing in the House of Parliament in London, wants to finish off a magnificent sentence, he quotes from the fisher- men of Galilee? or, sitting in his house, wanting to finish one of his great paragraphs of history, he quotes the words of the fishermen of Galilee? Why is it that those uneducated men have more influence on modern times than all the scholars of antiquity? Because they were divinely inspired, because God stood back of them. They were not educated and scholarly. It was not by force of rhetoric that they triumphed; but to-day those humble fishermen, those uneducated fishermen, wield more influence in all our modern cities than any twenty-five men living in this generation and day. They must have been inspired; there must have been a divine influence behind them and before them and above them and within them.

Beside that, you must remember that this book has been

UNDER FIRE FOR CENTURIES,

and after all the bombardment of the Ingersolls of all the centuries, they have not knocked out of this Bible a piece as large as the small end of a sharp needle. O! how the old book sticks together. Unsantified logicians try to pull away the Book of Genesis. They say they do not believe it; it cannot be there was light before the sun shone; it cannot be all this story about Adam and Eve; and they pull at the Book of Genesis, and they have been pulling a great while, yet where is the Book of Genesis? Standing just where it stood all the time. There is not a man on earth who has ever erased it from his Bible.

Then all the undevout astronomers went to work to pull away the Book of Joshua. They say, "that cannot be true, the sun's halting above Gibeon and the moon over the valley of Ajalon; it cannot be possible, we must pull that book of Joshua away." And they pull away at it, and they pull away at it, and yet what has become of the Book of Joshua? Like the sun above Gibeon and like the moon over the valley of Ajalon, it stands still. All the unde- vout anatomists and physiologists get hold of the Book of Jonah, and they pull away and they say, "that story about Jonah and the whale can't be true." Every infidel carries a harpoon especially for that whale, and they pull away at the Book of Jonah, but where is the Book of Jonah to-day? Just where it has been all the time—the grandest thing that was ever written to prove that when God sends a man to Nineveh, he cannot get to Tarshish, if God to stop him has to upset the Mediterranean Sea with a cyclone.

And so the infidels have been trying to pull away the miracles, pulling away at the blasted fig tree, at the turning of the water into wine, at the raising of Lazarus from the dead. Can you show me a Bible from which one of these miracles has been erased?

HOW MARVELLOUSLY THE OLD BOOK STICKS TOGETHER.

All the striking at these chapters only driving them in deeper until they are clinched on the other side with the hammers of eternity. And the book is going to keep right on until the fires of the last day are kindled. Some of them will begin on one side and some on the other side of the old book. They will not find a bundle of loose manuscripts easily consumed by the fire. When the fires of the last day are kindled, some will burn on this side, from Genesis toward Revelation, and others will burn on this side, from Revelation toward Genesis, and in all their way they will not find a single chapter or a single verse out of place. That will be THE FIRST TIME WE CAN AFFORD TO DO WITH- OUT THE BIBLE.

What will be the use of the Book of Genesis, descriptive of how the world was made, when the world is destroyed? What will be the use of the prophecies when they are all fulfilled? What will be the use of the evangelistic or Pauline description of Jesus Christ when we see Him face to face? What will be the use of His photograph when we have met Him in glory? What will be the use of the Book of Revelation, standing, as you will with your foot on the glassy sea, and your hand on the ringing harp, and your forehead chapleted with eternal coronation amid the amethystine and twelve-gated glories of heaven? The emerald dashing its green against the beryl, and the beryl dashing its blue against the sapphire, and the sapphire throw- ing its light on the jacinth, and the jacinth dash- ing its fire against the chrysoprase, and you and I standing in the chorus of ten thousand sunsets.

But I do not think we will give up the Bible even at that time. I think we will want the Bible in heaven. I really think the fires of the last day will not consume the last copy, for when you and I get our dead children out of the dust, we want to show them just the passages, just the promises, which comforted us here in the dark day of interment, and we will want to talk over with Christians who have had trials and struggles, and we will want to show them the promises that especially refreshed us. I think we shall have the Bible in heaven.

O! I want to hear David with his own voice read: "The Lord is my shepherd." I want to hear Paul with his own voice read: "Thanks be unto God that giveth us the victory." I want to hear the archangel play Paul's march of the resur- rection with the same trumpet with which he awoke the dead. O! blessed book, good enough for earth, good enough for heaven.

DEAR OLD BOOK

—book bespattered with the blood of martyrs who died for its defence—book sprinkled all over with the tears of those who by it were comforted. Put it in the hand of your children on their birthday. Put it on the-table in the sitting room when you begin to keep house. Put it under your head when you die. Dear old book! I press it to my heart, I press it to my lips.

"Where shall I go?" said

A DYING HINDOO

to the Brahmitic priest to whom he had given money to pray for his salvation. "Where shall I go after I die?" The Brahmitic priest said: "You will first of all go into a holy quadruped." "But," said the dying Hindoo, "where shall I go then?" "Then you shall go into a singing bird." "But," said the dying Hindoo, "where then shall I go?" "Then," said the Brahmitic priest, "you will go into a beautiful flower." The dying Hindoo threw up his arms in an agony of solicitation as he said; "But where shall I go last of all?" Thank God this Bible tells the Hindoo, tells you, tells me, not where shall I go to-day, not where shall I go to-morrow, not where shall I go next year, but where shall I go last of all!

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 87.)

The Character of Father Murphy—His Horror at Rossiter's Abjuration—The Conspirators' Meeting—The Priest Denounces Rossiter as a Traitor—The Meeting Ends in Confusion.

FATHER John Murphy was the son of a peasant at Ferns, and had been educated for the priesthood at Ferns Seville. He was at this time a large, coarse-featured and powerful man of forty—a bigot in his own faith, and, therefore, a good hater of all who differed from him—but a man made to be a leader and a born general.

Into his ear, all unconscious of the sanguinary part he was soon to play in his country's history, Mrs. Rossiter poured her sad complaint, and sought for direction. Father John was startled at the tidings communicated about Miles. He himself was one of those who had arranged to assemble in secret to learn from this young man what he was sent to disclose by the French Directory. "Ah," he said within himself, "Is this the renegade Miles Rossiter has turned out? and is this the messenger of France to Ireland? They think, the fools, that this struggle, surely coming on, will result in the triumph of their infidel and revolutionary principles. But I know a trick worth two of that. We good Catholics are not to be their tools, but they shall be ours! We'll use them to trample out Protestantism in this land, and then, we'll crush them afterwards. Neither Luther nor his coadjutor, Voltaire, shall reign in Ireland. We'll have no master in this ancient land of Saint Patrick, but our Holy Father the Pope."

Father John, however, gave Mrs. Rossiter no inkling of the thoughts that were passing in his mind. With the astuteness of his order, he kept his own counsel. To her he only expressed his sorrow at Miles's departure from the faith, and promised to have a serious talk with him. "Do, and may the blessing of Heaven and the Holy Virgin attend your endeavors, Father John," she said.

The meeting of the principal Wexford leaders of the coming insurrection, which Miles had, before his mind, was held in the house of a respectable farmer in the barony. Not only was it attended by men from the barony itself, but also by several north and south of the county. To avoid exciting suspicion they came singly, each taking a different route, along field-paths and byways, and, as has been stated, the hour for assembling was late in the evening. Even one or two of the gentry of the county were present, for the disaffected were to be found in all ranks, in this memorable revolutionary year of ninety-eight. The most remarkable of the conspirators, however, were some Roman Catholic priests, and foremost among these were Fathers John and Michael Murphy and Father Roche.

When the meeting was duly constituted watchers were posted at proper intervals around the farmhouse to guard against an unpleasant surprise. Miles was requested to make known his message from the French Directory. We need not give his address, the reader being already in possession of the main substance of it—namely, that a French landing was to be undertaken, and upon the Wexford Coast, as had been suggested to the Directory—a year before—in a letter from the rebel, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, himself.

Most of those who listened to Miles approved and applauded him but in suppressed tones, since it was a secret meeting. A resolution was about to be passed that a manifesto be drawn up in accordance with the spirit of his address, when Father John, rose, and haughtily claimed the right to say a few words.

"Our young friend's language," he said, "sounds to me rather foreign and outlandish; but, no doubt, if I could only understand him, it's exceedingly philosophic and sublime. But, for all that, let me tell him, he hasn't the smallest comprehension of the real condition of affairs in Ireland. He talks about no pillage and no massacre. Is he aware that the most outrageous pillage and torture is being perpetrated this hour, no farther off than in the north of this county? If he doesn't know this, let him go to the town of Gory and its immediate neighborhood, and he'll soon get enlightened upon the subject. He will there see houses by the dozen sacked and burned; and the pitch-cap, the picket, and the lash in full and vigorous operation in the hands of the vile militia and yeomanry, under English pay. And what for, my friends? Why, to make us discover the hiding places of our weapons of defence. Our enemies, then, have resorted to violence, and I hold that it is both wise and just to pay them back in their own coin; and if we find it needful to give them a taste—and a sharp one—of the pike and the fagot."

"No, no!" cried out Miles. "No, Father John; such words are not becoming a teacher of the religion of love, whose Founder has laid it upon us to return good for evil."

"Don't Father John me, young man," was the reply, with a flash of anger. "And, pray what right have you to quote Scripture to an ordained priest, unless you have taken upon you holy orders; and, indeed, you left your native land, we all know, for that purpose; I therefore ask you, sir, are you a priest? though your looks plainly tell us that you are not."

Father John was fully cognizant of the fact that Miles had long given up all thoughts of the priesthood, and we are aware he had information of this from the young man's own mother; but he wished to force from Miles a public confession of what he deemed his apostasy, to prejudice him in the minds of his early friends and acquaintances.

Miles colored deeply at the indirect charge of the priest and sat in some confusion. To evade, however, the crafty inquiry pressed upon him, he ignored it, and simply said "that he quoted the Scripture which had given umbrage to Father John from an idea which he believed was correct: 'That truth was truth, no matter who expressed it.'" But his words, as savouring of disrespect for Church authority, in place of appeasing Father John, served only to fan his displeasure into anger—he started from his seat, and with closed fist and outstretched arm, denounced Miles before them all as a traitor to his parents' creed, and a French infidel, adding, that "a man who had betrayed his Church could not be trusted to be faithful to his country," and proposed that they should expel him from the meeting.

Miles felt that he must defend himself, and ignorant of his mother's visit to the priest, he supposed Father John must have had his knowledge about him through some secret ecclesiastical agency; he therefore looked upon the denunciation he had received as only another proof of the organized conspiracy, in many lands, to prove that the whole Church of Rome was against individual liberty. His indignation rose at the thought, and words long suppressed rushed to his lips for utterance.

Rising to his feet, he said, "I am sorry, friends, that matters of a personal character have been introduced to this gathering, and at a time of pressing public exigency. And I regret, besides this, to have to contradict the words of one whom you revere as your religious teacher, but I cannot help it. Let me then, distinctly and emphatically tell you, friends, that I am no infidel, either French or Irish. He who can deny God, is, to my mind, both wretched and guilty. I do not deny Him—but delight to confess Him—as the source of duty and the object of love. He is to me dearer than fame, or life itself."

Father John here broke in impatient of Miles. Considering his words as either seductive or irrelevant, he said, in a bullying tone, "What has all this you have now said to do with the matter before us? The question, Miles Rossiter, is this, 'Can you honestly say you are a priest, or have you broken the vow of your early manhood?' Answer that, young man."

"Yes, answer that," cried out several who sympathized with Father John's views of the inviolable sacredness of the priestly life—"Yes, answer that! We want nothing about your belief in a God, and the rest of it. What we want to know is, are you still a good Catholic? and you had better keep to the point," was fiercely and menacingly added.

"Ah, friends," said Miles, "I can plainly see that days of anguish are before our beloved country. Religious hatred and intolerance will never conquer a day of civil freedom. Nothing but united Ireland can win the crown of legislative independence, but how can union be between Irish men, who, from differences of creed would clut at each other's throat. No; it cannot be; and much dread that the insurrection now at hand, will sink ere long, into a religious war, and will end violence and massacre."

"You see, friends," said Father John, catching at Miles's last words, "that our young friend here, though not a priest, has, save the martyr turned prophet; and a roar of laughter greeted Father John's sally. "I would recommend him however," he added, "to drop the seer's mantle—it doesn't at all become him—and to return his early vows." This exhortation, though given in a rather sarcastic tone, was spoken, in fulfilment of the promise which Father John had given, earlier in the day, to Miles's mother. He felt that he had relieved his conscience, at all events.

"Yes, Miles, like a good fellow, do as Father John says," said two or three. "The Church is merciful mother, you know, and, though you have insulted her in what you have done, in the regard of holy orders, she will, upon your penitence, receive you."

"Yes, a merciful mother to those who smother their convictions, and blindly bow to her decree; but, let me tell you, cruel as the grave to the man that will assert his intellectual freedom, as the sands and tens of thousands, racked, strangled, gibbeted, burnt, broken on the wheel, in various lands of Europe and elsewhere, testify. I thought to keep within myself the reasons of my conduct—but, friends, you force me to disclose them. Let me inform you, then, that in France was not long until I came to know that what you proudly call Catholicism had for half a century been slowly strangling all civilization; and that priestism, while inexorably insisting upon abstruse and dreary metaphysical dogmas and mystic ceremonies, was, at bottom, a systematic compromise with moral corruption."

"You start, friends, at my words," he said, he observed upon the countenances of those around him the inward commotion which his bold assertion caused, "but you do not start half as much as I did when I awoke in France to the vision of spiritual tyranny, hypocrisy, and superstition rampant around me. Faith! It was a sodden mass of black rottenness, with which I could not endure to be identified. God forgive me, it drove me into scepticism, until I discovered that true Christianity was a very different thing from that compound subtle jargon, of stupid and degrading legend, false miracles, and distorted corruptions of God as His Christ which priests had foisted upon their flocks as the true Gospel of Heaven."

"You charge me, sir, with quoting Scripture," he said to Father John, in a voice that rang with an intrepid and vehement clearness—"You charge me, sir, with trespassing upon your domain I grant it. I was intruding upon your vested interest in darkness, but I shall do it no more. I have delivered my soul—you have compelled me but I now close my lips upon thoughts like these for peace sake, and for my country's sake, forever. Let us, I entreat you, friends, bend our attention to the pressing business which has called us together."

Miles's closing exhortation, however, went for nothing. One or two, perhaps, were slightly influenced by his words, but the great majority of the present were excited almost to madness again. His testimony against the Church and the priesthood of that day, unsupported by their own prejudiced, narrow-minded, and unlettered conception of mind, was utterly discredited, and all that he could urge, however truly and eloquently, in place of justifying his conduct in their eyes, or served the more to condemn him.

Father John, at a glance, saw this. With an air of highly offended dignity he rose from his seat and moved towards the door of the room. The turning round, he said, "This is plainly no place for Christian men, and I command all here, who are my parishioners, to fly this moment from this presence of this blasphemer. Let him know, however, that a portion of his words are true. This will be a religious war; we'll tolerate in this land of old, the 'Island of Saints,' neither heretics nor sceptics. Next Sunday will be Whitsuntide, and ere it dawns, the signal of a holy war shall flame on Corrigra Hill, and by the thousands of our Israel will be joyfully answered. I myself will lead the Sacramental hosts of true Catholics to victory. Come with me, I say, my friends, and leave this wretched man to his tormenting reflections. May they tend to save him ere it be too late. To doubt the Church's doctrine is to be damned, and this wretched young man more than doubts, his soul is poisoned with a very devil's thoughts.

"None but the faithful must wield—on our side—the sword of battle. Thus followed, and seconded I am as sure as that I am a living man, of triumph, for I go forth in this sublime enterprise as a champion of the Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

With these closing words he hastened from the room, and, as his parishioners had been enjoined, they rose to a man from the Council table and left with him; blind followers of a blind guide.

None remained behind save a few delegates from a distance, and the two or three gentlemen of the county who had been present. These could not transact any business, nor make arrangement for future contingencies. They could see, however, that desperate designs were brooding in the air, and that appalling deeds were imminent—that the shrieks of old men and women and children, flying from the red hand of murder, would soon ring out over the land. They felt, too, that matters had now gone so far they could not prevent the consequences. With downcast looks and burdened hearts they bade each other farewell, conscious that if ever they should be spared to meet again, it would be in the remembrance of unutterable horrors.

(To be continued.)

THE GROWTH OF THE KINGDOM.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 26. Mark 4 : 21-34. Golden Text, Ps. 72 : 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The kingdom of God has different aspects. There is the kingdom of God in the world, i.e., outward Christianity, which our Lord likens to a field where wheat and tares grow up together, and to a net cast into the sea which gathered of every kind, and He teaches us that the time of separation will be at the end of the age. Then "the Son of man shall send forth His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." Again "the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 13 : 41, 42, 49, 50). There is also the kingdom of God which is within us (Luke 17 : 21) which the Lord Jesus teaches us to seek first: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6 : 33); and of which the Apostle Paul says, "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost" (Rom. 14 : 17).

Our subject for to-day commences with our Lord's words, "Is a candle brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick? For there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested; neither was any thing kept secret, but that it should come abroad." God intends His church and His people to be lights in the world, and He wills that their light should shine. Whoever there may be among the children of God hiding his light under the bushel or measure of his own self, his own life; whoever makes his own safety to be his great concern, and yet sheds none of the light and heat of God's favor on those around him, is not answering the purpose for which that light was committed to him. We are called to be "blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world; holding forth the word of life" (Phil. 2 : 15, 16), i.e. exhibiting it both in life and by word of mouth.

Our Lord assigns as His reason for this, the ultimate disclosure of every hidden thing. All that is bad and all that is good must some time be revealed. The life of some men is like that of all lived underground, hidden away and carefully concealed from their fellow-men. But while they manifest considerable ingenuity in concealing things from their fellow-creatures, they have not taken into account that "all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do" (Heb. 4 : 13). Sometimes even Christians get into a habit of concealment which makes their lives untrue, even if they do not say what is absolutely false. Now whatever cannot bear the light is sinful. "He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God" (John 3 : 21).

BURROWING ANIMALS,

And it is the law of God that all things shall be made known and come abroad. When Ananias and Sapphira had agreed together to sell their land, and to bring part of the price and lay at the apostles' feet, with the purpose of deceiving them, God was looking on, and it needed but a whisper on His part to apprise Peter of the matter. In neither of these cases was God take into the secret, and these attempts at deception were a terrible, fatal failure. There is a wonderful liberty in hiding nothing, and having nothing to hide.

Our Lord speaks next of hearing. "If any man have ears to hear" i.e., consecrated ears, "let him hear. And He saith unto them. Take heed what ye hear," or, Practise what you hear, receive it, live in the power of it. "For with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you: and unto you that hear shall more be given." In Matthew's Gospel very similar words are spoken about judging: "With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again" (Matt. 7 : 1). If we yield ourselves fully to the power and the claims of God through His word, then God yields Himself fully to us; He measures Himself out to us, so to speak, in the measure in which we lay ourselves out for Him. "To them that have," the receptive soul, "shall more be given." God gives "grace for grace" (John 1 : 16); grace received prepares the soul for farther grace, the grace of pardon prepares for that of consecration, consecration prepares for nothingness and nothingness prepares for power, power leads to greater nothingness, and this again prepares for a deeper and truer union with God. God is infinite in Himself, but He fills us in measure as we yield ourselves to Him. "For he that hath, to him shall be given." For instance, if a man has faith, and learns to walk by faith, not by sight, then our heavenly Father puts him to tests of faith of which others know nothing, and as he accepts them without flinching, a renewed measure of faith is granted him. So with love; as a man of God yields himself to the claims of God's love, the power of love increases, he finds no difficulty in loving those who injure him, all feeling of bearing grudges against those who have wronged him disappears, and God gives him that mighty love, "strong as death" (Cant. 8 : 6), which loves its enemies, which "seeketh not her own," which "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things" (1 Cor. 13 : 5, 7).

BUT "HE THAT HATH NOT,"

he that hath heard without possessing and being possessed by the word, "from him shall be taken away even that which he thinketh he hath" (Luke 8 : 18, Rev. Ver.) Head knowledge of God's truth, powerful rhetoric in preaching, may make the man who possesses it think that he has the truth of God, which he knows and preaches. But the real thing is not a thing of words. Christ Himself is in His word, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words," He classes Himself and His words together, and whoever receiveth His words most surely receives Him; it is the solid substance and no shadow, the living Person of Christ and no mere doctrine, the working power of His presence and no mere opinion; and he that hath heard the word and closed his heart against its rightful Lord, from him shall be taken away even that which he thinketh he hath.

Our Lord proceeds to liken the kingdom of God to a man who "should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how." Many have taken this for a picture of conversion. We thank God that this idea is becoming obsolete. The seed must first be received into the soil before there can be growth in grace, a man must be born before he can grow up; life first, then growth. But this is a precious picture of the growth of Christ in the soul; first the blade, life without either flowers or fruit, then the ear in blossom. The blade is very near the earth, and so is a soul in its first joy, full of its own hopes and aspirations, doings and sayings; but by and by there is a sign of fruit, a long stalk separates the ear from the earth, and bears it up into the air and sunlight, and thus faith raises a soul into a purer and higher atmosphere; the rain and the sunshine, the vicissitudes of life received from God's hand nourish and ripen the fruit. "But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately He putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come." Our God never willingly afflicts (Lam. 3 : 33). He has a purpose in view in every trial which He sends or permits, but when the object is attained, then He says "It is enough."

It is just the same with His outward kingdom. The terrible deadness and unspirituality of the many, exercises the zeal and faith, the love and the patience of the few. While hundreds of thousands deny that conversion is necessary, while of those who are converted thousands do not believe that it is possible to lead a life of victory over sin, while many of those who are leading this life of power yet shrink from trusting to God alone for guidance, for the means to support their work for Him, for physical health according to His word (Ex. 15 : 26; James 5 : 14; Ps. 103 : 3), the few who are seeking to trust Him through and through become increasingly unpopular, increasingly small both in their own eyes and the eyes of others, the fair green of their first spiritual life has faded, now there is hard dried chaff to be seen by the outer world; but the eye of the Owner is gladdened, the golden grain rejoices His heart, and He will come with His welcome sickle, to gather in His firstfruits (Rev. 14 : 4) unto Himself. Come Lord Jesus, come quickly! But when He comes, what is to become of those who have some life; where the blade has appeared, but the fruit is not ripe? "Many shall be purified and made white and tried" (Dan. 12 : 10). Surely these words apply to the time of the great tribulation. Unripe grain cannot be harvested, unholy souls cannot enter heaven, and it may be that many who are now lukewarm will be driven by dire necessity at that time to live lives of real faith in God.

One more picture is given us of the external kingdom. "It is like a grain of mustard seed." This is certainly not a type of Christ's life, the mustard seed is not the bread of life, it cannot feed, but only season; and this is just what outward Christianity does, it civilizes, but it does not change the heart. The mustard seed, when sown in the earth is very small, and so was Christianity when its great Founder went back to heaven, and left some hundred and twenty representatives, and they were despised, but "it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and shooteth out great branches so that the fowls of the air may lodge under the shadow of it." Outward Christianity is not greater in the number of its adherents than heathenism, only one-third of the world's population is nominally Christian, though it is greater in the influence possessed by the peoples who profess it. But alas "the fowls of the air," Satan's emissaries (comp. ver. 4, 15, 32), lodge under the shadow of it. It is a fearful truth that under the name of Christianity, hypocrisy, superstition, and rationalism find room; the Lord has said it would be so. Jesus went on to speak many parables to the people, probably those which are contained in Matt. 13; He spoke "as they were able to bear it," and when He was alone, He expounded all unto His disciples. Lord, give us the hearing ear, to learn also from Thee!

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS
SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives admitted Mr. George Q. Cannon, who claims to be delegate-elect from Utah, to a hearing on February 8th, in connection with its consideration of the bill introduced by Mr. Shallenberger depriving polygamists of the privilege of voting. Mr. Cannon made an address, in which he intimated that immorality in Washington needed attention more urgently than polygamy in Utah. Being interrogated as to the principles and practices of Mormons Mr. Cannon answered frankly. Some of the replies were wholly unfit for publication, but among the points elicited was one that spiritual marriage meant that no woman could secure exaltation in heaven unless united in marriage to a member of the Mormon Church on earth. In reply to further questions as to whether the rising generation of Utah was not growing up in strong opposition to polygamy, he said there were many cases where young married couples were opposed to it, sometimes because the first wife objected and sometimes because the husband did not feel himself equal to the pecuniary support of two wives. But he believed the general tendency of the present outcry was to solidify the sentiment in Utah in favor of polygamy. The general disgust produced by Mr. Cannon's statement is likely to cause the committee to report the bill favorably.

The Protracted Debate on Apportionment was continued in the House last week without reaching a vote. The feature on which opinion differs most decidedly is the representation of the remainders. According to the old method the total population of the United States was divided by the number of members of which the next House would consist. The quotient was the unit of representation. Then it was ascertained how many times the population of each State contained that unit, which gave the number of members to which that State was entitled. Every State would thus in all probability show a remainder not equal to the unit, and the total number of members provided would be, of course, less than the whole number fixed upon for the House of Representatives. The unassigned members were then given to the States having the large remainders, in the order of size of those remainders, until the limit of the membership of the House was reached. The Seaton method recommended by the committee works on a different principle and is somewhat intricate. Instead of giving an extra member to a particular State on the ground that it had a large remainder, it proposes to assign the additional members to those States which would, when the population was divided by the number of members it would then have, render a quotient the nearest to the unit for the country. The system will be best understood by an example. The number of the new House is fixed by the committee at 320. Dividing the population by this number, it is found that it allows a member to every 154,285 persons. But in distributing them to the respective States only 304 members are assigned; the other sixteen represent the aggregate of the remainders in each State. By the new plan it is found that if an additional member were given to Tennessee she would have a member for every 154,235 of her population, and she is therefore entitled to ten members. But if the unassigned sixteen members were distributed according to the largest remainders there would be States in which there would be a member for every 100,000 or less of population. The effect of the Seaton method would be to give one Representative less to Rhode Island, Florida, and California, and one more to New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois than would be accorded them by the old plan.

The Inter-Oceanic Canal Project, though not formally before Congress, is a prominent subject of debate among members of both branches. There is according to reports received an absence of party feeling on the subject, except so far as Mr. Blaine's action is concerned. The prevalent opinion is that a canal should be cut or controlled by our government, so that in time of war it may be used for the passage of our war ships, that no other government should have power over the canal, and that the route by Nicaragua is the more advantageous line. It appears probable that during the present session the project of constructing such a canal will be definitely introduced. An American company already holds a charter which it is considered will protect the rights of the United States in the matter.

The Proposal of Senator Miller, of New York, that the proceedings of Congress be printed in such a form and in sufficient quantity to supply every family in the United States with a copy free of cost was adversely reported by the Senate Committee on Printing on January 31st. The committee found by a computation that the cost of this publication would be not less than $70,000,000 a year. The committee also thought that the publication was not needed by the people, as copious reports appear in all the daily journals, and that it was unwise to increase the annual expenditure by $70,000,000 a year unless there were serious need therefor. Senator Anthony, through whom the committee reported, suggested that the demand for the bill emanated from paper makers and dealers, who with their connections would profit largely by its enactment. This suggestion reflected on Senator Miller, whose business connections are with the paper trade.

The Degrading Spectacle of a Prize Fight was witnessed at Mississippi City on February 7th, by thousands of people from all parts of the Union. So long ago as September 25th arrangements were made for a fight between an Irishman named Ryan, and Sullivan, who is a native of Boston. It was arranged that the encounter should take place near New Orleans, but prompt action was taken by the Governor of Louisiana, and a change of place was agreed upon. The details of the fight, in which nine rounds were fought in eleven minutes, are of the most sickening character. Yet as Ryan, the defeated champion, received blows which broke his jaw in two places, and the two men with their left arms thrown around each other's necks pounded away with their right fists on each other's faces, loud shouts of delight and approval were raised. The shameful exhibition disgraces those who witnessed it as much as those who participated in it.

A Visit to a New York Opium Den was made on February 11th, by a reporter, who thus describes what he witnessed. "The haunt is at No. 48 First Street. The smoking-room, admission to which is twenty-five cents, is a small place in the centre of the basement. In it are two beds, on which lay six men and one woman. In the centre of each bed was a small oil lamp, used for preparing the drug for smoking. The occupants of the room were all well-dressed Americans. Their glassy eyes and hoarse voices, however, showed that they were habitual smokers. One of them said he had not left the place in three weeks, and that he had spent in that time about two dollars per day for opium. The woman said she was a Californian, and that she came to this city because the laws in California prohibited opium smoking. Bowls of strong tea without milk or sugar were occasionally brought to the smokers, and they drank copiously of it. One of the attendants said that most of the patrons of the place were actors and actresses, some of whom were well known and very popular." Few people have any idea how rapidly the use of opium is spreading among the citizens of this and other cities. Opium smoking establishments are springing up everywhere, and besides the patrons of these places there are thousands of intelligent and cultured men and women who use the drug hypodermically, injecting it by means of a syringe under the skin. Cases of emancipation from the habit are rare, but there have been lately several well authenticated instances where the only remedies used were faith and prayer.

The Advocates of Civil Service Reform are encouraged by the report that General N. M. Curtis' connection with the Treasury Department as expert in charge of the examination of commission charges in the Southern district of New York will cease on February 28th. Complaints against General Curtis were recently filed in the Treasury Department by the Civil Service Reform Association, charging him with using his position to collect political assessments in defiance of the statutes on that subject. These complaints have been referred to the District Attorney of New York for such action as he may deem proper. General Curtis held the position of treasurer of the Republican Campaign Committee in the last election in New York. It appears certain that General Curtis will cease to hold his position, but whether the charges made by the Association are those that have weighed with Mr. Folger in taking that step is disputed. There is no doubt that the most urgent need exists for relieving civil service employees of these oppressive exactions.

The Effort to Rescue the Entombed Men in the Midlothian Mine at Coalfield, Va., has been abandoned. On Tuesday, February 7th, the heroic party of miners who descended the pit at the risk of their lives to attempt the rescue of the imprisoned men, found that the pit was on fire. They had proceeded sixteen hundred and fifty feet from the shaft when they saw what seemed a solid bank of smoke. They were so near to it that they almost entered it. Immediately there was a run for life, for flames might burst from the smoke at any moment and devour them. The leader of the party was an old man with a wooden leg, and it speaks well for the courage and humanity of the party that two of the men, seeing that the old man was falling behind in the race, stayed with him and actually carried him between them to the foot of the shaft, and the entire party escaped. The mine, with its sleeping fire and twenty-seven unrecovered victims, was then closely shut in, so as to prevent the admission of atmospheric air and give the pit time to cool off. It is admitted that it would be dangerous to reopen the mine within two months. A subscription has been opened for the families of the men whose lives are now hopelessly lost.

The Woman's Union Missionary Society at its meeting in the Bible House last week presented a report, in which the work of the society had been enabled to accomplish since 1861, when it was organized, was described. The following is a brief summary of the facts: The society has received in America and disbursed, including the $6000 of reserve fund, $584,107.55. In foreign lands, principally from Government grant in Calcutta, $80,000; total, $664,107.55. It has sustained 101 missionaries in 12 different stations, of whom 43 went from this country and 58 were supported in the field. It has sustained or aided 84 schools, and has supported 174 Bible readers and 278 children. Contributions have been given to aid the work in 62 outside stations, namely: 15 in India, 6 in Burmah, 13 in China, 1 in Siam, 6 in Syria, 7 in Turkey, 2 in Japan, 6 in Africa, 4 in Mexico, 1 in California, and 1 in Paris, France.

A Free Railroad Ride for Five Hundred miles is a privilege generally reserved for politicians and office-holders whose friendship and favor the railroad companies find it to their interest to secure. But the Chicago papers say that a little boy about eleven years of age recently had such a gratuitous ride, and he is not anxious to repeat the adventure under the same circumstances. He and his companions were playing hide and seek near the depot at Beaver Falls, Pa. He made his hiding place in an empty freight car, but he was no sooner hidden, than to his horror the doors were closed, the car coupled on to a train going West, and in a few minutes he was carried off an unwilling passenger. Whenever the train stopped he shouted his loudest, but his cries were not heard. It was not until he had travelled five hundred miles and the doors of the car were opened to admit freight, that the boy was released. He was then in a strange city, friendless and alone, and was glad when a remittance from his father enabled him to return home. In after life he may witness scenes that may remind him of his boyish escapade. He may then reflect that his journey from his father's house was occasioned by thoughtless fun, was continued involuntarily, and that he was unable to return until his father answered his appeal for assistance (Ezek. 34 : 12).

A Family has been Reunited through a dream, after a separation of over sixteen years. In Akron, O., lived a freedman who had fought in the war and had lost all traces of his family since peace was declared, and had even forgotten the name of his last owner. A few weeks ago he had a dream in which the name "Alcorn" returned to him. He straightway wrote to ex-Governor Alcorn, of Mississippi, and through his assistance has rejoined his mother, brothers, and sisters. The long interval that elapsed before the needed clue was obtained must have forced the freedman to fear that he would die in loneliness and separation from his family, but the one name led him back to family affection. Other men have had a still more happy experience. Lonely and desolate, the name of Christ has revealed to them not only a Saviour but the fact that they have in people hitherto strangers, brethren and sisters, united in one common bond of love (1 Pet. 3 : 8).

An Owl in a Tomb caused an Alarm at a funeral recently at Ottawa, Canada. The funeral took place at Beechwood Cemetery. The casket containing the body was deposited in a vault, and the mourners were about to ascend to the open air when they were startled by a sound like a moan proceeding from the recess where the casket had been placed. A general fright and some distress was the result, and it was some time before any one would venture into the darkness to ascertain the cause. An investigation was made at length by a deputation of the most courageous of the number, and it was found the moan proceeded from a large owl which had gained access to the vault. The dolorous note of the bird, uttered at that solemn time, recalled, after the terror of the moment had subsided, the illustration employed by the prophet mourning over the sin and woe of his people (Micah 1 : 8).

A Tragic Story Revealed by a Trunk is Related in a Boston journal. It appears that at the customary sale of unclaimed baggage on the trunk railroad of one of the Middle States a battered old trunk was disposed of. The purchaser found in it a package of letters from a lady of education and refinement. They were all dated from one place, but their addresses were to various cities in this country and in Europe. The early letters were playful, and their writer was evidently a loving wife and a devoted mother. Those dated 1874 indicate the approach of trouble, for the husband, who seems to have been a commercial traveller, was affectionately warned of his growing enslavement to some unnamed vice. From that time the letters indicate increasing distress and anxiety, and bills also in the trunk show that large sums were being squandered by the man in late suppers and presents of jewelry. The last letter of the package, dated 1876, contains only a warning that the police were searching for him for some crime he had committed, and urging him to fly to America, and begging him passionately, should he reach the States, to go to church, to think of God and his children, and "to come back to his dear old self." She was then reduced to extreme poverty. A few pawn tickets were in the trunk, showing that the man had pawned his clothes in New York and other cities. All that was known of the owner of the trunk was that he was dead. It is a sad story and shows how weak and helpless are men who do not put their trust in God. It is probable that ten years ago had any one told the owner of the trunk of his own fall and his wife's broken heart, he would have answered as Hazael did (2 Kings 8 : 13).

A Lucky Boy is the Title Accorded by his schoolfellows to one of their number, a native of Lewiston, Me. While travelling in New Hampshire a short time ago, he happened to engage in conversation with a wealthy old bachelor from New York, a member of an importing house doing a large business. The New Yorker took an unusual amount of interest in the young Lewistonian. He has sent him his photograph, written him several long letters, and sent him valuable presents. He now wants the young man to go to New York and make his home with him, promising to adopt him as his son and give him a start in life. The youth is much envied, yet had the boy become a Christian, and thus a son of God, he would probably have been despised and scoffed at.

A Man Narrowly Escaped Death Last Week at Allentown, Pa., while endeavoring to enter his own house. He had been absent all day and did not return until after midnight. During his absence, snow had fallen heavily, and a deep drift blocked his garden gate. He had no implement with him to remove it, and his family had retired to rest. He therefore climbed the gate and attempted to jump over the drift, but his feet caught in the top of the gate and he fell head downward into the drift. His struggles to extricate himself failed, and he became senseless from suffocation. A neighbor happened to pass by soon afterward, and startled at the sight of a pair of boots projecting from the drift turned to ascertain the cause, and found and rescued the man from his dangerous position, only just in time to save his life. The situation of the man head-downward in the drift at his own door, has its ludicrous side, but that it was very serious is evident when we consider that his own strength, however great, would avail nothing in such a case, and he could only be rescued by the help of another. In our moral and spiritual troubles we are often similarly situated, and but for the help of our Almighty Saviour would be lost (Rom. 7 : 24).

An Indian Dandy's Costume is thus Described by a correspondent of the Philadelphia Press who saw him recently, and who says that he is considered by the Indian girls very elegantly and tastefully attired. "A red blanket hung over a rope and tied about his neck. Above this is a long scarf of pink calico, tied in a huge bow under his chin. On his head is a much battered plug hat, in the band of which are stuck two or three broken rooster's feathers and a tattered ostrich plume. At the side, pinned with a large steel brooch, floats a blue veil, about two yards in length. Around his dirty, bare ankles are knotted some strips of red calico, but his feet have no ornament but mud. The crowning glory of his attire is his ear-rings. His ears have slits in them over an inch in length. In one, tied with a buckskin string, is the handle of a table-caster and two brass door-keys; in the other an ornamented top of a meerschau pipe, a broken teaspoon and the tin cover from a box of baking-powder. His face is painted with stripes of red mixed with some ill-smelling oil, which diffuses its odor far as well as near, being the rankest compound of villainous smell that ever offended nostrils." Such a costume is not in accord with civilized notions of good taste in dress, but the Indian's object in so attiring himself is probably the same as that sought by many white people who are at great pains to wear the latest fashions; and there is this in his favor, that while they are often despised, the Indian seems to have succeeded in winning admiration. A very contemptible object, when so pursued.

ACCEPTABLE SERVICE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: for our God is a consuming fire."—Hebrews 12 : 28, 29.

A Good Work Done—The King's Approval the Main Thing—What is Essential to Acceptable Service—The Offerer Must Himself be Accepted—The Service Directly Rendered to God—Done with Faith—The Conditions Specified—I. Immeasurable Obligation must be Realized—First Grace then Service—The Gift of a Kingdom—Already Received in Promise—In Principle—In its Power—In Provision and Protection—Incident of Two Brothers—A Permanent Kingdom—II. Divine Grace must be the Power—III. Must be Rendered with Reverence—IV. With Cheerfulness—V. Remembering the Divine Holiness—The God of the Old and New Testament.

As a congregation you have of late been diligently engaged in the service of God by endeavoring to provide a home for fatherless children. I have been astonished and delighted at the liberality which has been shown by all sorts of persons in this good work. I felt sometimes like the king of old, who said, "Who am I, and what is my people, that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort?" I am sure you have well earned all the commendation that your fellow Christians can give to you; for the work has been so well and so heartily done that we all rejoice together. But, now that it is all over, careful thoughts arise in my mind.

It is but a small thing that you and I should be accepted of one another; the great matter is that we should be accepted of the Lord. I, who am but as the doorkeeper of my Master's house, not only approve, but abundantly commend my fellow servants; but what of that? The great point is that the King himself should say, "Well done, good and faithful servant." We do but see the fair externals of things, but the great Father of spirits searches the hearts and tries the reins of the children of men, and judges after a higher standard. Therefore, with holy anxiety have I looked at this text and turned it over, hoping that the Holy Spirit may cause each one who has engaged in our benevolent work to examine himself, and to judge his part in this labor of love, that he may amend any fault which may hinder his work from being a sacrifice of sweet savor unto the Most High.

WHAT IS ESSENTIAL.

Many things are absolutely needful for the acceptance of any service rendered unto God; of these some are not stated in the text, but they are so important that I commence with mentioning them. The first is that the person who attempts to serve God should himself be accepted. The offerer must himself be accepted in the Beloved, or his offering will be tainted by his condition and be inevitably unacceptable. The uncleanness of the person pollutes his sacrifice. He that hath an impenitent heart, an unrenewed will, a disobedient mind, an unholy life, may perform outward acts of devotion, but the Lord saith, to such, "Who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations unto me."

The next essential is that, the act being performed by a person accepted, it should be distinctly done as unto God. Our text speaks of serving God. Alas, much is done which is in itself externally commendable, but it is not acceptable to God, because it is not rendered unto Him. Some, like the Pharisees of old, give alms out of ostentation; they sound a trumpet before them that they may have praise of men. Verily, I say unto you, they have their reward, and a poor reward it is.

Some are energetic in holy work out of emulation, that they may surpass others, and may have credit for superior ability and goodness. Like Jehu they cry, "Come, see my zeal for the Lord of hosts!" Now, inasmuch as in this they seek their own honor, and not the glory of God, they cannot be accepted of Him. Better far the two mites dropped into the treasury unobserved of all but the great Master Himself, than all the wealth that we could possibly bring if we made the offering with divided intent. If we would serve God we must forget self. There must be the distinct desire to obey and honor the Lord, and we must not act as men-pleasers, or as laboring for our own exaltation; otherwise the Lord will abhor our offering.

And we must take care that all this is done with faith in Christ Jesus; for it is a law of universal observation in the kingdom of heaven that "without faith it is impossible to please God." "Though I give my body to be burned and have not charity," saith Paul, "it profiteth me nothing;" and the same may be said concerning faith. He who does not believe in God, and yet pretends to be religious, is manifestly either a deceiver or deceived; as the unbeliever is condemned already, his service can only be that of a condemned man, and how can it give pleasure to the Lord? We must bring our offering to Jesus, our great High Priest, and He must present it for us, for it can only be acceptable to God by Jesus Christ.

These things being mentioned, I now confine myself to the text itself, which has in it a world of solemn, heart-searching thought with regard to the acceptable service of God.

I. And, first, according to the apostle, if we are to serve God acceptably it must be under a sense of

OUR IMMEASURABLE OBLIGATION to Him. Look, "Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear." See, brethren, whatever service we may render to God, we must begin by being receivers. Our first dealing with the most High must not be our bringing anything to Him, but our accepting of everything from Him. We receive, that is our first stage; and I trow it is our last; for if ever we are able to serve the Lord by our gifts, we shall have to confess, "Of Thine own have we given unto Thee."

We must, then, in approaching to God, remember what we have received of Him; and is it not wonderful that it should be written, "We receiving a kingdom?" What a gift to receive! This is a divine gift; we have received, not a pauper's pension, but a kingdom—"a kingdom which cannot be moved." The old dispensation or kingdom has passed away; its ceremonial laws are abrogated, and its very spirit is superseded by a higher spirit, and we have entered upon another kingdom, in which the ruling principle is not law, but love. We are not under the yoke of Moses, but we are the subjects of King Jesus, whose yoke is easy and whose burden is light. The kingdom of Jesus will never end while time shall last, for He is the King Eternal, and immortal; neither will His laws be changed, nor shall His subjects die. Till that day when He shall deliver up the kingdom unto God, even the Father, and God shall be all in all, Jesus must reign; and even when the earthly mediatorial reign is consummated, the kingdom of God, the kingdom of heaven, shall be continued unto us, and we shall still be members and citizens of it.

"But," say you, "we have not received this kingdom yet." I answer that we have received it in a certain sense; we have received it first in the promise. Our Lord said, "I appoint unto you a kingdom as my Father hath appointed unto me." "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Now, with a man's word, if he be a man of honor, we are content; we count his promissory note as the equivalent of the gold which he promises to pay. Let him set his hand to a promise, and we pass it from hand to hand, regarding it as the thing itself which it promises. Shall we not think as much of the word of God? The promise of God is so firm, so sure, so true, that inasmuch as He hath promised a kingdom unto all them that wait for the appearing of His Son, that kingdom is ours, and by faith we grasp it this morning.

More than this, we have received it in the principles of it, for it is written, "The kingdom of God is within you." As the fairest flower lies packed away within the little shrivelled seed, and wants but time and sun to develop all its beauty, so perfection, glory, immortality and bliss unspeakable lie slumbering and hidden away within the grace which God hath given unto all His people. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." The life of heaven is begun within the believer, it is germinating, it is daily developing, it shall in God's good time come to its absolute perfection. We have the kingdom within us; it is not meat and drink but righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

Moreover, in a measure we have received this kingdom in the power of it. Brethren, in the grace which God has given you you received a measure of kingly power; you who have believed in Jesus have power over yourselves, power over your passions, power over the powers of evil, power in measure over your fellow-men for their good. You have also power in prayer; and what a real power is that, when a man can ask what he wills and it shall be done unto him. God hath endowed you with power from on high by giving you the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. Thus you have received a kingdom in promise, in principle, and in power.

Moreover, you have received much of the provision and protection of that kingdom. You that are children of God are not left in the power of the enemy, but being redeemed the Lord is a wall of fire round about you. You are garrisoned by angelic strength, you are led by unfailing wisdom. The all-sufficiency of God is your treasure-house. The Lord hath said, "No good thing will I withhold from them that walk uprightly." This is a royal charter of boundless liberality. "For all things are yours. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's."

What royal provision is thus set apart for you! "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to His purpose." Everything is arranged for our benefit. There were one of whom had been diligently attentive to his worldly business, to the neglect of true religion. He succeeded in accumulating considerable wealth. The other brother was diligent in the service of the Master, and had learned both to distribute to the poor and for conscience' sake to forego many an opportunity of gain, so that when he lay sick and dying he was in straitened circumstances. His brother somewhat upbraided him, remarking that if it had not been for his religion he would not have been dependent upon others. With great calmness the saintly man replied, "Quiet! quiet! O Tam, I have a kingdom no begun upon, and an inheritance I have na yet seen." Speak of laying up for a rainy day; we have infinite goodness laid up for them that fear the Lord, and none can rob us of it.

TWO BROTHERS,

This kingdom which we have received has come to us by grace alone. We could not have earned it, or merited it, or won it by our own strength, but the Lord has given it to us in Christ Jesus. Gratitude is the only fountain of acceptable service, without it the streams are far too defiled to flow in the paradise of God.

A large measure of the splendor of our kingdom lies in this that it is a "kingdom that cannot be moved." Other kingdoms go to pieces sooner or later. You and I who are in middle life can remember kingdoms that have been blown down by the wind, or toppled over at the blow of one brave man's sword. Empires that have rivalled Cæsar's in apparent strength have been swept down like cobwebs. As houses made of a pack of cards, so have dynasties fallen never to rise again. There was one year in which our great caricaturist pictured kings and princes out at sea in little cock-boats, tossed up and down by the wild waves of revolution. So frail was their tenure of power at that moment.

Even to-day, I warrant you, the last office I should choose would be that of an emperor in any country; a man might wisely prefer to take the post of a common crossing-sweeper rather than be a king, or even a president. As for the Empire of Russia, who would court its deadly honors? If those who deserve the severest imaginable punishment for horrible crimes were compelled to be autocrats, it would be a punishment too heavy. What must be the strain upon the mind, the constant fear, the awful unrest of a man who has the sole control of millions, and has deadly foes upon his track? Glory be to God, our kingdom cannot be moved! With Jesus as our monarch we fear no revolution and no anarchy; for the Lord hath established this kingdom upon a rock, and it cannot be moved or removed.

Receiving such a kingdom, what are we bound to do? I would fain cast silver chains about you to hold you fast to your Lord. I would fasten anew these silken bonds upon you to bind you to your God. You have received a kingdom. You can never pay back the millionth part of what you owe. To-day, however, let the sweet love of Christ constrain you to judge that if He made you kings it is for you to crown Him King with all your hearts, and if He has given you a kingdom that cannot be moved by you, it is for you to be "steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

Is it not a splendid thought that when we do any thing for God, though it be but the simple offering of a prayer, or the helping of a fatherless child, we may do it with the holy dignity of princely priests. A certain set of men arrogate to themselves exclusively the title of priests, and so deny the priesthood of every believer. In this they act like Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, thrusting themselves into an office which belongs not to them, and intruding out the true priests of the living God. Has not the Lord said to all His people, "Ye are a royal priesthood?" As for any who receive a supposed priesthood by laying on of hands of bishops we know nothing of them, except that they do err, not knowing the of every believer; they intrude into this priesthood so far as they pretend to possess priestly power beyond the meanest child of God, for all that believe in Jesus are this day made priests unto Him.

TRUE DIGNITY

With what sacred orderliness, and saintly carefulness ought we to serve God, because we serve Him not as common persons, if we are indeed in Christ, but we worship Him as priests and kings. One of our early Saxon kings was rowed down the river Dee by Kenneth of Scotland, and seven other vassal kings, who each one tugged an oar while their lord reclined in state. The King of kings this day is served by kings; each man, each woman among us is made royal by the very fact of holy service.

Brethren, your high dignity should make you joyful, and you should perform the Lord's service with intense delight because of what He has done for you. It should be heaven upon earth to be allowed to do anything for Jesus. "Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably."

II. There is much to dwell upon in the first clause, but I must now turn to my second point. Acceptable service must be rendered to God

IN THE POWER OF DIVINE GRACE.

What saith the apostle? "Let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably."

Note then that acceptable service to God is not offered in the power of nature, not even of nature at its best, when we call it good nature and philanthropy; but in the service of God everything must be the fruit of grace. You are to serve the Lord, not in the strength of your own wit or experience, or talent, but in the energy of the new life which God has given you, and in the power of the grace which is continually bestowed upon you moment by moment as you seek it of the Lord. "Let us have grace," says the apostle.

I know sometimes you say, and say truly, "What a poor creature I am, how can I serve God? I have not this and that gift." Just so, do not attempt to serve Him in the power of gift. Ask for grace, and then worship Him in the power of grace. It is wonderful how grace can make use of very slender gifts, and turn them to abundant account. It is great grace that greatly honors God; and great grace is always to be had by the least among us. You may never be an orator but you may have great grace. You may never be an organizer and take the lead among your fellow Christians, but you may have much grace. You may never attain to ample wealth so as to be able to distribute largely of your substance to the poor, but you may have great grace. Therefore, let us have grace that we may serve God acceptably.

I should like to take these words out of their connection, and hang it up for our motto as a church—"Let us have grace." Be this our prayer—whatever else we do not have, Lord, let us have grace. If this or that means of usefulness shall be denied us, yet let us have grace, grace in our hearts, grace in our speech, grace in our lives, grace in our every breath. Now, dear friends, have you been trying to serve God in the power of grace, or in the power of nature? Look ye well to it. Only grace can God accept; can He accept your labor?

In the margin of our Testaments—I mean those of the authorized version, which will never be parted with for the so-called revised version—in the margin of the authorized version we read, "Let us hold fast grace." That is another motto I would like to give to this church, "Let us hold fast grace." To find grace is an act, to have grace is a state; to hold it fast is to make the act perpetual and the state continual. "Let us hold fast grace." Now you may look at the new version if you like, and in the margin you will find another reading which is allowable though it has no great certainty about it. There we read—"Let us have thankfulness." That grand word charis or "grace," may be rendered "thankfulness," and it is in a thankful spirit that we should serve God. You have received a kingdom, therefore serve God in the spirit of gratitude. This is the true spirit of service. God keep us always filled with it! Let us have grace! Let us hold fast grace! And in the power of these three sentences we shall be helped to "serve God acceptably, with reverence, and godly fear."

III. But now, thirdly, we must advance another step. To "serve God acceptably" we must do it

WITH REVERENCE.

These two words in the text are much mixed up in the various readings, and it is almost impossible to divide the sense between them with accuracy; but yet I think I shall give the whole sense even if I do not allot a due proportion of meaning to each separate word. Acceptable serving or worshiping of God must be done with "reverence." The word, according to Bishop Hopkins, signifies a holy shamefacedness. Let each one feel "the Lord has made me a king; but what a marvel that this deed should be wrought on me! Oh that I ever should be called to such a noble estate as this!"

This reverence, this shamefacedness, should come upon us when we recollect what we were. When you stand up in a prayer-meeting and pray, dear friends, some of you cannot help recollecting the time when you could swear or sing a questionable song. You are accepted among your brethren and honored by them, but the time was when you kept very different company; do you not blush as you think of it? Moreover bashfulness should be created not only by the thought of what you might be, but by a sight of your service itself. Perhaps your fellow creatures are saying, "That is well done;" but you will go home and lament to yourself, saying, "Ah, they do not know my faults. They little know what mean motives cropped up even when I was trying to glorify my God."

"That was a fine sermon," said one to Mr. Bunyan. The good man answered, "You are too late, the devil told me that before I left the pulpit." The arch-fiend soon suggests to God's servants some lofty notion, and they are tempted to appropriate to themselves the honor which belongs to God only. Ah, what a fool I am that, even when I seek to be lowest at the feet of my Lord, I find myself satisfied with my humility!

IV. The other word is, "with godly fear" and this suggests that we should serve God in the spirit of holy

CHEERFULNESS.

What sort of fear is this? for "perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment." Observe that it is the fear that hath torment which perfect love casts out, but not this godly fear, which is quite consistent with our joy in receiving a kingdom. The more we have of this godly fear the better for us. We ought to fear lest we should offend the Lord even while we are serving Him; fear lest the sacrifice should be a blemished one, and so be rejected at the altar; fear lest there should be something about our spirit and temper which would grieve the Lord. He is a jealous God, and must be served with holy carefulness. O for more of it!

I do not know how my brethren feel who say they are perfect, but I am obliged to confess that when I would do good evil is present with me, and that though I would serve God like a seraph without one stray thought, or one selfish desire, yet I have by no means reached this attainment. I press forward toward the mark, and hope to reach it, but it is at present far beyond me. Oh, brethren and sisters, much of holy fear should be upon us, because we may so easily offend the Lord when we think we are pleasing Him. Beware of presumptuous boldness before God. Let us not be rash with our speech, much less rude and coarse.

I know that modes of worship which offend my taste may, nevertheless, be accepted with God, because He sees through the rough shell, and judges according to the sweet kernel; yet I fear that thoughtless, bragging, noisy service must offend the Lord, for it is so unlike that which was offered by His gentle, tender, well-beloved Son. If Christ be the model which He sets before us, some are far away from the mark. At any rate, let us never wantonly go into a wild, boisterous mannerism; for though we be the Lord's children, and very near to Him, yet He is in heaven and we are upon the earth; He is the thrice holy, and we are sinners. The psalmist says, "Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling."

Knowing that God is to be served in His own way, and in that alone, there ought to be a godly fear as to whether we are walking in His ordinances or are following the traditions of men. God does not care for worship which He has never required at our hands. If a man invents a ceremony, he may think it helpful and instructive; but he has no right to practise it if God has not appointed it. If any of you are practising rites and ceremonies which are not according to God's word, I charge you cease from such will-worship, for the spirit which leads you to practise these things is the spirit of Rome, and of antichrist. If God has not commanded it, God cannot accept it.

V. Now, lastly, there is another thing to be remembered in acceptable services. We must cultivate a profound and of the wrath of God against sin, "For our God is a consuming fire." Observe, then, from this most solemn sentence that the God of the Old Testament is the God of the New Testament. Read Deuteronomy 4, at the twenty-fourth verse, and you will find these words, "For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God." The same words describe the God of the New Testament. I know the boasted wisdom of the age tells us that we have made a great advance upon Old Testament revelation. It is not so. We may understand the Book somewhat better, but the revelation is the same. God wears the same character as in the days of Moses, and David, and the prophets.

SENSE OF THE DIVINE HOLINESS

The Lord God who is to be served by us, even as our covenant God, is a "consuming fire." In love He is severely holy, sternly just. We hear people say—"God out of Christ is a consuming fire," but that is an unwarrantable alteration of the text. The text is "Our God," that is God in Christ is a consuming fire. "Our God" means God in covenant with us; it means our Father God, our God to whom we are reconciled. He, even our God, is still a "consuming fire." A large proportion of nominal Christians do not believe in this God. They profess to reverence a merciful God, but the moment you preach His justice they are indignant; the God who is a consuming fire is not accepted by this proud "nineteenth century."

I do this day most solemnly declare my faith in the God of the Hebrews, who will by no means spare the guilty. The God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob is the one and only God; and I avouch Him this day to be my God. Jehovah is the Holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth shall He be called. He that smote Pharaoh at the Red Sea, He that smote kings and slew mighty kings, is my God, and I believe in Him as the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I know no God but Abraham's God, Jehovah, the I AM. Under the New Testament God is not an atom less severe than under the old; and under the covenant of grace the Lord is not a particle less righteous than under the law.

We are so saved by mercy that no sin goes unpunished; the law is as much honored under the Gospel as under the law. The substitution of Jesus as much displays the wrath of God against sin as even the flames of hell would do. While the Lord is merciful, infinitely so, and His name is love; yet still our God is a consuming fire, and sin shall not live in His sight. If your offering and mine be evil, it will be an abomination unto Him.

You will be rather surprised when I say that this dreadful sentence is my hope; it is a joy to me that our God is a consuming fire. Behold two altars upon Carmel. The Baalites have laid their victim upon one of them. Do you see them as they prance about the altar, and even leap upon it? Do you hear them as they cry and cut themselves with knives and lancets? "O Baal, hear us! O Baal, hear us!" There lies the sacrifice; there is no trace of Baal's hearing them, for their god is not a consuming fire. Now comes Elijah. "Pour water," says he, "on the bullock. Do it a second time; do it a third time;" and they fetch up from the sea huge buckets, and pour the water over everything until the trenches are filled with it. And now the prophet lifts up his prayer to heaven. Down comes the fire! It is God's sacrifice, and God accepts it.

It may be, some of you who have been working this week will think to yourselves, "We did very well, we hope to be honored for it." So you shall be; but if you take credit to yourselves, you will be robbing the altar of God. If God accepts your sacrifice, it will all be consumed by His fire. See

THE ACCEPTED SACRIFICE IS ALL GONE, it is utterly consumed. When God enables us to serve Him, and takes away from us all self-congratulation, we ought to be very thankful. This proves that it is all burned with fire. If God had not accepted it, then we might have reserved portions of it for ourselves, whereon to feed our vanity, but if the Lord has taken every morsel from the mouth of self we have great cause for rejoicing.

When we go home to the Lord above, we dread not His presence, though He be a consuming fire. Those whom He has purified and made white are not afraid of the flames of His holiness. Remember that blessed text, "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? He that walketh righteously and speaketh uprightly; he that dispieth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil; he shall dwell on high." It shall be the glory of the gracious and the true that God is their element; it shall be their bliss to live in the full splendor of His perfect holiness. They shall be like their Lord, for they shall see Him as He is. Everything that is holy will endure the fire, and as for all within us that is impure, let it be consumed speedily. So let us serve the Lord with fear, but not with terror, and let this service be continued all our days. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON
—Hebrews 12.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

Dr. Livingstone in the Grasp of a Lion.

DR. LIVINGSTONE ATTACKED BY A LION.

(See Illustration.)

OUR illustration represents a scene in the life of the distinguished missionary Dr. Livingstone. In the narrative of his life it is stated that at one of the missionary stations he founded, the people suffered much loss of cattle by the depredations of lions. Their footprints had been observed near the places from which the cattle had been stolen, and there were many indications besides of the near haunts of the dreaded beasts.

The lions were wary, and though they succeeded in seizing their prey no one had been near enough to slay or even wound the marauders. At length the losses became so serious that the natives resolved on undertaking the hazardous enterprise of tracking the lions to their lair, and killing them. The day was fixed for the expedition, and Livingstone went with the people to assist in the dangerous hunt. The lions were traced to a small wooded hill, which the people surrounded, and proceeded to beat through the underwood with the view of driving the prey into a position where the shooters could fire at them.

Livingstone, having fired at one of the animals, was in the act of reloading, when he heard a shout of warning from the people near. What followed is thus described in Livingstone's Diary.

"Starting and looking half round, I saw the lion just in the act of springing upon me. I was upon a little height. He caught my shoulder as he sprang, and we both came to the ground below together. Growling horribly close to my ear, he shook me as a terrier dog does a rat. The shock produced a stupor similar to that which seems to be felt by a mouse after the first shake of a cat. . . . The shake annihilated fear, and allowed no sense of horror in looking round at the beast.

"Turning round to relieve myself of the weight (as he had one paw on the back of my head) I saw his eyes directed to Mebalwe, a native schoolmaster, who was trying to shoot him, at a distance of ten or fifteen yards. His gun, a flint one, missed fire in both barrels; the lion immediately left me, and attacking Mebalwe, bit his thigh. Another man whose hip I had cured before, after he had been tossed by a buffalo, attempted to spear the lion while he was biting Mebalwe; he left Mebalwe and caught this man by the shoulder, but at that moment the bullets he had received took effect, and he fell down dead. Besides crunching the bone into splinters, he left eleven teeth wounds in my arm."

The false joint in the crushed arm was the mark by which the body of Livingstone was identified, when carried home to England, in 1874.

THE LAST REQUEST.

(See Illustration on page 109.)

It was at the close of a hard-fought day when death from the cannon ball, death from the rifle bullet, and death from the bayonet thrust had laid low many a brave man, that a stalwart soldier, rifle in hand, knelt on one knee beside a dying comrade. Hand clasped in hand the two men held their last interview. It was very brief and the crack of the rifle and the boom of the distant gun mingled with the solemn words that passed.

"George," said the dying man, "you will see the folks at home though I shall not. Will you take them a message for me?" "I will faithfully, Fred," said his friend. "I feel my time is short," said Fred, as he pressed his arm on a wound from which the life blood was slowly but surely flowing; "but I should like to send some consolation to the home where they will weep for me." "You may trust me, Fred," said the kneeling soldier, who, strong and manly as he was, could scarcely repress his tears. "If I live to see the dear old village again I will surely take your message."

"Thank you, old boy, I am sure you will. You know what I was when I left home, a wild careless boy without a serious thought in my head. Well, my mother gave me a Bible when I came away and made me promise to read it. You know we had to go to church and Sunday-school when we were boys, but afterward I did not go when I could avoid it. Mother grieved, I know; and she was afraid that when I was away I should come to harm. But I read the book every day, George—tell her that—I was among a wild lot and I was careless, but I always found a chance to keep my promise. And the dreadful scenes we have seen have sobered me. I always thought I should get knocked over in some of our fights, as I have, and the thought, though it did not unman me, made me serious. At times I have heard the hymns we used to sing at school, 'Around the throne of God in Heaven,' and 'I think when I read'—you remember them, George?—well I fancied I could hear them above the music of the drum and fife. Odd scraps of sermons too have come into my mind at times, and though I did not care for them when I heard them, they have had a new light with the boys dying around us.

"Well, George, I prayed too, and I have had some talk with the chaplain and—my dear old boy I am dying fast, I cannot see your face now, it is growing dark all around—don't loose my hand, George—I cannot say all I wanted to, but go to my mother and tell her I am a Christian. Tell her I died trusting in Jesus and sure that He will receive me on the shining shore we used to sing about. Tell her I could see—"

But George never told Fred's mother what her boy could see as he lay dying. He told her all beside, but when he had told her that, he had to tell her that a bright flash of joy shot across his face, and he fell back speechless in the arms of death. The old Christian lady shed many tears over her son's death, but the message his friend carried to her was the best consolation she could have had, and it was with a happy face that she said, as the sorrowing king said in the hour of his bereavement: "I shall go to him but he shall not return to me" (2 Sam. 12 : 23).

THIRSTY.

JOB SMALL had just made a discovery. True, it was not a famous one, nor one likely to get into the newspapers. Neither was it one at all likely to be of great public benefit. But though personal in the strictest possible sense, it was nevertheless a discovery as real as will be the discovery of the North Pole, if such should ever be made.

What was Job Small's discovery? That he was thirsty.

Job was on an errand for his master, an urgent errand, an errand, therefore, which required a "quick march" step. His course lay past several public-houses. Some of them supplied a good article. Job had proved the quality more than once, and therefore was a good judge.

It was when abreast of one of these public-houses that he made his discovery. It came upon him suddenly, impetuously, and with a rush.

Having made the discovery, Job made a pause, and looked thoughtfully upon the ground. He then put his hand into his pocket. After this, he moved on a few steps further. Then he paused again. Having at length made up his mind, his face brightened up, and he darted with exceeding quickness into the public-house, from whence, after a short time, he emerged, wiping his mouth with his sleeve. Undoubtedly, Job Small had quenched his thirst.

I say, Job, now that you are in such a good temper, you won't mind a little chat, I know. So, with your permission, I'll just attach myself to your side for a while, and tell you my mind about this thirst of yours.

What an unnatural thirst yours is! That a man should be thirsty now and then is natural enough. Everybody is. And there is no blame attached to it. But to be thirsty often, to be thirsty at odd times, to be thirsty at all hours in the day, surely that is not natural at all. Surely that is plainly unnatural. Don't you think so yourself, Job? One thing I am quite sure of, if your master's dog were to lap, lap, lap as often as you drink, drink, drink, you would think there was something wrong with him. And so there would be.

You are getting worse too, Job. Time was when you were but rarely thirsty, when you used only to drink with your meals. But now, your thirst is always cropping up at the oddest places and times imaginable. I have an idea that it would be possible to draw a scale, in which your thirst could be shown rising and rising, until it reached its present height. And you know this as well as I do, if you would only stop and think a bit. Why in the world don't you give the matter a sober thought or two, instead of going on in the dark like this? I am sure you are making a tremendous mistake.

And, don't you think that it is better to have your thirst really quenched while you are about it? Beer and strong drink do not really quench it. These things only aggravate your thirst. Come now, you don't need to be told this. He is the wisest man, I think, who goes in for long satisfactions, instead of short ones. You wouldn't be so often thirsty if you drank the right sort of stuff.

And just think of what your thirst will lead you to. By and by you will be so thirsty that you will be obliged to get drunk before you can satisfy it, and perhaps not then. Yes, Job, it's a fact that you are fast drifting on to drunkenness. Your thirst is growing, you yourself say. What can it grow to but the drunkard's craving?

Try something else. Cold water is much better. Try tea, or coffee, or chocolate, or lemonade, or ginger beer. There are plenty of other things besides. Give them a fair trial. They will cost you less, satisfy you more, and save you from drunkenness.

And, don't you see how you are playing fast and loose with your constitution? If you become weak, what a useless fellow you will be. Your master will turn you off. You will be a burden to yourself. Your wife and children will suffer. I have an idea that you are not the man you used to be, even now. Your drinking habits have told upon you already, I strongly suspect. Ah! you must be a thirsty man indeed if, for the sake of quenching your thirst with strong drink, you will cripple yourself for life.

And, one more truth before I say good-bye. There's a worse thirst in the next world, and a thirst too which you will never have the means of quenching. Don't you remember how the once rich man pleaded in hell for one drop of water to cool his parched tongue?

Oh! Job, Job, I wish you were thirsty in the best of all senses—thirsty for pardon, thirsty for peace, thirsty for God. For then I could point to One, even the Lord Jesus Christ, who invites you to quench your thirst in Him. Listen to His own words: "Whoso drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst."

The Last Request.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

At Home in London.

BEFORE leaving Upfold Farm, Phebe received the following letter from Felicita:

"DEAR PHEBE: I shall be very glad to have you under my roof. I believe I see in you a freshness and truthfulness of nature on which I can rely for sympathy. I have always felt a sincere regard for you, but of late I have learned to love you, and to think of you as my friend. I love you next to my children. Let me be a friend to you.

"But one favor I must ask. Never mention my husband's name to me. Madame will feel solace in talking of him, but the very sound of his name is intolerable to me. It is my fault; but spare me. You are the dearer to me because you love him, and because he prized your affections so highly; but he must never be mentioned, if possible not thought of, in my presence. I say this before you come that you may spare me as much pain as you can.

"This is the only thing I dread. Otherwise your coming to us would be the happiest thing that has befallen me for the last year. Yours faithfully, "FELICITA."

If Felicita was glad to have her, Phebe knew that Madame and the children would be enraptured. Nor had she judged wrongly. Madame received her as if she had been a favorite child, whose presence was the very comfort and help she stood most in need of. Though she devoted herself to Felicita, there was a distance between them, an impenetrable reserve, that chilled her spirits and threw her love back upon herself. But to Phebe she could pour out her heart unrestrainedly, dwelling upon the memory of her lost son, and mourning openly for him. And Phebe never spoke a word that could lead Roland's mother to think that she believed him to be guilty. With a loving tact she avoided all discussion on that point; and, though again and again the pang of her own loss made itself poignantly felt, she knew how to pour consolation into the heart of Roland's mother.

But to Felix and Hilda, Phebe's companionship was an endless delight. She came from her lonely homestead on the hills into the full stream of London life, and it had a ceaseless interest for her. She could not grow weary of the streets with their crowd of passers-by; and the shop windows filled with wealth and curiosities fascinated her. All the stir and tumult were joyous to her, and the faces she met as she walked along the pavement possessed an unceasing influence over her. The love of humanity, scarcely called into existence before, developed rapidly in her. Felix and Hilda shared in her childish pleasure without understanding the deep springs from which it came.

It was an education in itself for the children. A drive in an omnibus, with its frequent stoppages and its constant change of passengers, was delightful to Phebe, and never lost its charm for her. She and the children explored London, seeing all its sights, which Phebe, in her rustic curiosity, wished to see. From west to east, from north to south, they became acquainted with the great capital as few children, rich or poor, have a chance of doing.

They sought out all its public buildings, every museum and picture gallery, the birthplaces of its famous men, the places where they died, and their tombs if they were within London. Westminster Abbey was as familiar to them as their own home. It seemed as if Phebe was compensating herself for her lonely girlhood on the barren and solitary uplands. Yet it was not simply sight-seeing, but the outcome of an intelligent and genuine curiosity, which was only satisfied by understanding all she could about the things and places she saw.

To the children, as well as to Madame, she often talked of Roland Sefton. Felix loved nothing more than to listen to her recollections of his lost father, who had so strangely disappeared out of his life. On a Sunday evening when, of course, their wanderings were over, she would sit with them in summer by the attic window, which overlooked the river, and in winter by the fireside, recounting again and again all she knew of him, especially of how good he always was to her.

There was a vividness and vivacity in all she said of him which charmed their imagination and kept the memory of him alive in their hearts. Phebe gave dramatic effect to her stories of him. Hilda could scarcely remember him, though she believed she did; but to Felix he remained the tall, handsome, kindly father, who was his ideal of all a man should be; while Phebe, perhaps unconsciously, portrayed him as all that was great and good.

For neither Madame nor Phebe could find it in their hearts to tell the boy, so proud and fond of his father's memory, that any suspicion had ever been attached to his name. Madame, who had mourned so bitterly over his premature death in her native land, but so far from his own, had never believed in his guilt; and Phebe, who knew him to be guilty, had forgiven him with that forgiveness which possesses an almost sacred forgetfulness. If she had been urged to look back and down into that dark abyss in which he had been lost to her, she must have owned reluctantly that he had once done wrong. But it was hard to remember anything against the dead.

Every summer Phebe went down to her own home on the uplands, according to her promise to the Nixey. Felix and Hilda always accompanied her, for a change was necessary for the children, and Felicita seldom cared to go far from London, and then only to some seaside resort near at hand, when Madame always went with her. Every summer Simon Nixey repeated his offer the first evening of Phebe's residence under her own roof; for, as Mrs. Nixey said, as long as she was wed to nobody else there was a chance for him. Though they could see with sharp and envious eyes the change that was coming over her, transforming her from the simple, untaught country girl into an educated and self-possessed woman, marking out her own path in life, yet the sweetness and the frankness of Phebe's nature remained unchanged.

"She's growing a notch or two higher every time she comes down," said Mrs. Nixey regretfully; "she'll be far above thee, lad, next summer."

"She's only old Dummy's daughter after all," answered Simon; "I'll never give her up."

To Phebe they were always old friends, whom she must care for as long as she lived, however far she might travel from them or rise above them. The free, homely life on the hills was as dear to her and the children as their life in London. The little house, with its beautiful and curious decorations; the small fields and twisted trees surrounding it; the wide, purple moor, and all the associations Phebe conjured up for them connected with their father, made the dumb old wood-carver's place a second home to them.

The happiest season of the year to Mr. Clifford was that when Phebe and Roland Sefton's children were in his neighborhood. Felicita remained firm to her resolution that Felix should have nothing to do with his father's business, and the boy himself had decided in his very childhood that he would follow in the footsteps of his ancestor, Felix Merle, the brave pastor of the Jura. There was no hope of having him to train up for the Old Bank. But every summer they spent a few days with him, in the very house where their father had lived, and where Felix could still associate him with the wainscoted rooms and the terraced garden. When Felix talked of his father and asked questions about him, Mr. Clifford always spoke of him in a regretful and affectionate tone. No hint reached the boy that his father's memory was not revered in his native town.

"There is no stone to my father in the church," he said, one Sunday, after he had been looking again and again at a tablet to his grandfather on the church walls.

"No; but I had a granite cross put over his grave in Engelberg," answered Mr. Clifford; "when you can go to Switzerland you'll have no trouble in finding it. Perhaps you and I may go there together some day. I have thoughts of it."

"But my mother will not hear a word of any of us ever going to Switzerland," said Felix. "I've asked her how soon she would think us old enough to go, and she said never! Of course we don't expect she would ever bear to go to the place where he was killed; but Phebe would love to go, and so would I. We've saved enough money, Phebe and I; and my mother will not let me say one word about it. She says I am never, never to think of such a thing."

"She's afraid of losing you as well as him," replied Mr. Clifford; "but when you are more of a man she will let you go. You are all she has."

"Except Hilda," said the boy fondly, "and I know she loves me most of all. I do not wonder she cannot bear to hear about my father. My mother is not like other women."

"You mother is a famous woman," rejoined Mr. Clifford; "you ought to be proud of her."

For as years passed on Felicita had attained some portion of her ambition. In Riversborough it seemed as if she was the first writer of the age; and though in London she had not won one of those extraordinary successes which place an author suddenly at the top of the ladder, she was steadily climbing upward, and was well known for her good and conscientious work. The books she wrote were clever, though cynical and captious; yet here and there they contained passages of pathos and beauty which insured a fair amount of favor. Her work was always welcome and well paid, so well that she could live comfortably on the income she made for herself, without falling back on her marriage settlement. Without an undue strain upon her mental powers she could earn a thousand pounds a year, which was sufficient for her small household.

Though Roland Sefton had lavished upon his high-born wife all the pomp and luxury he considered fitting to the position she had left for him, Felicita's own tastes and habits were simple. Her father, Lord Riversdale, had been but a poor baron with an encumbered estate, and his only child had been brought up in no extravagant ways. Now that she had to earn most of the income of the household, for herself she had very few personal expenses to curtail. Thanks to Madame and Phebe, the house was kept in exquisite order, saving Felicita the shock of seeing the rooms she dwelt in dingy and shabby. Excepting the use of a carriage, there was no luxury that she greatly missed.

As she became more widely known, Felicita was almost compelled to inter into society, though she did it reluctantly. Old friends of her father's, himself a literary man, sought her out; and her cousins from Riversdale insisted upon visiting her and being visited as her relations. She could not altogether resist their overtures, partly on account of her children, who, as they grew up, ought not to find themselves without friends. But she went from home with unwillingness, and returned to the refuge of her quiet study with alacrity.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 95.)

Character of the Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy—Limbs of One Body—Its First Form—More Compact in its Second Form—An European United States—A Napoleonic Koran—The Little Horn a Subsequent Production—Where He may Arise—Why the Napoleonic Dynasty is Indicated—The Seventh-Eighth Head—The Seven Years' League with the Jews—The Three Kings to be Subjugated—The Bonapartes a Royal Greek Family.

THE FOURTH WONDER.

ON November 5th, 1863, the French Emperor issued a proposal for a European Congress to meet at Paris, to adjust international difficulties, but his overture was rejected by England. It is certain, however, that a series of European Congresses will be held in the course of a few years in connection with the formation of the predicted ten-kingdomed confederacy.

The emblematic representation of Cæsar's Roman Empire in the last days as a wild beast—one corporate body—with ten horns, which are stated to signify ten kings, plainly implies that those future ten rulers of its entire territorial area will be allied together in one confederacy, forming a diversity in unity. Ten horns on one body cannot be otherwise than organically and federally united, and must move concurrently in the same direction. Where one horn goes the others must go. One will not be able to act independently of another, as is the case at the present time, when almost all those kingdoms are standing apart from each other; and as regards Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Turkey, etc., there is no formal alliance between any two of them.

The same federal union of the ten kings as component parts of one political corporation is symbolized by their being represented as the Ten Toes of a Human Image in Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream. They are all like branches on one trunk—limbs of one body.

Some extraordinary events must ere long come to pass in order to produce such an astounding result as an offensive and defensive alliance and confederacy of the ten nations of the Roman Empire. It is puzzling to conceive why they should ever resort to such a step, unless it be for mutual defence against some common foe, and where can there be found an antagonist sufficiently formidable to provoke the uprising against itself of such a ten-kingdomed confederacy, unless it be either North Germany or Russia, or both powers combined, as they are the only great powers in Europe that are outside the Roman Empire, and which therefore will not form part of the confederacy.

The transformation of all the existing nineteen countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire into exactly ten kingdoms does not necessarily involve an alliance or confederacy being made between even any two of them. This transformation might be effected, and yet each of the ten might stand aloof from the others in isolated independence, just as at present, Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, etc., are independent of each other.

Hence the prediction that the latter-day ten kingdoms are to be compactly allied together so as to form a ten-kingdomed Confederacy, is a further and distinct fact in addition to the prediction that their number is to be exactly ten. As the thirty-eight States of the American Union under their thirty-eight separate Governors form one United States, so in much the same manner the future ten kingdoms under their separate ten kings will form one United Confederacy.

But the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy in its first form as represented in Daniel 7: 24, just at the first rise of Antichrist as a little horn after and among the Ten Horns, and before he makes the seven years' covenant with the Jews, will not be nearly so compactly united a confederacy as it will be in its second form in Revelation 17, where it appears as a scarlet Red-republican Confederacy carrying aloft the Scarlet Woman, the then Communistic Church of Rome, and under the headship of the Napoleonic Antichrist as a President of its ten Republican Presidents. This will actually be a European United States.

Then the third and last form of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy in Revelation 13 during Antichrist's three and a half years' world-wide reign as a universal monarch, mighty man of war, and false god, and as Imperial Cæsar over the ten kings, will be a very closely knit confederacy with one religion, that of Napoleonism, enjoining the worship of himself as the only deity, and accompanied probably with a Napoleonic Koran—one Code of Laws, the Napoleon Code—one uniform currency with Napoleon's image and superscription stamped on every coin, and buying and selling permitted only to those who shall have Napoleon's name or its number 666 stamped on their forehead or right hand (Rev. 13: 18), and one common Calendar dating from some marked epoch in Antichrist's life, like the Mahomedan Calendar is dated from Mahomet's Hegira, and abolishing the Christian and Mahomedan Calendars, and probably substituting for weeks decimal periods of ten days as the French Revolutionists did in 1793. Thus will he "think to change times and laws" (Dan. 7: 25).

THIS FIRST FORM OF THE TEN-KINGDOMED CONFEDERACY, whatever may be the peculiar course of events which leads to its development, seems to be a monarchical confederacy, if we are to understand its ten kings to be all crowned monarchical and not uncrowned Republican rulers. It is thus described in Daniel 7: 24, The Ten Horns are Ten Kings that shall arise, and another (Little Horn) shall arise after them.

This suggests the inference that in France, at least, Popish Ultramontanism, which has hitherto always been associated with the idea of a monarchy, either of the Bourbons or Orleanists, may be at that time more in the ascendant than Democratic Republicanism, which would place a Presi dent rather than a King upon the throne. Or it may be that a Napoleonic Emperor would sufficiently correspond with the prophetic title of King. But, if so, he, as one of the Ten Horns, cannot be the Antichrist, who is to arise as a Little Horn after them.

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders." By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, 5s.

The probability already mentioned that France's predestined reacquirement of the Rhine frontier may be the result of its engaging in a victorious war against Prussia, suggests a further probability that as France lost the Rhine frontier when its Napoleon headship was "wounded to death" at Waterloo in 1815, so it may regain the Rhine frontier under the Napoleon headship, which thus will begin to be healed of its deadly wound.

But still any Napoleon who might be the sovereign of France would thereby be in the position of the Ten Horns and could not at the same time be the eleventh Little Horn. If, however, he should abdicate or be driven from his sovereignty over France, he might at a subsequent period arise as a Little Horn ruling over some State or principality in or near Greece, somewhat after the fashion of Napoleon I., who, after abdicating the throne of France in 1814, was made the Sovereign of Elba. The Little Horn is to arise out of one of the four Grecian horns according to Daniel 8 : 9, 23, and then is to "wax exceeding great toward the South, and toward the East, and toward the pleasant land (Palestine) : " and is to "subdue three of the ten kings" :—probably the Kings of Greece, Egypt, Thrace, or Syria. Apparently he will not have attained sufficient power to make the seven years' covenant with the Jews until he shall have achieved part or the whole of these exploits.

The Napoleonic Little Horn's first sphere of sovereignty in the East as an Eleventh Little Sovereign in or near Greece will probably be as Sovereign of Macedonia, or Albania, or Montenegro. He comes up on the head of in the very place in which formerly Alexander the Great and Mahomet sprang up as Horns in Daniel 8, and therefore the career of this coming Napoleon will be to a great extent a repetition of the career of Alexander the Great and of Mahomet. Other Scripture types show that his career will also greatly resemble that of Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Julius and Augustus Cæsar, Charlemagne, and the first Napoleon in all the circumstances of his rise to the position of monarch of the world (Rev. 13 : 5, 7).

THE SYMBOLIC GOAT

The Little Horn in Daniel 7 and 8 is identical with the seventh-eighth head of the Wild Beast in Revelation and must therefore be a Napoleon.

The history of the Little Horn under that designation in Daniel 7 and 8 and also under the title of the "Vile Person," or "King who shall do according to his own will," in Daniel 11 : 21, 36, shows that although he is to arise at first as only a Diminutive Horn on the corporate body of the Roman Empire—a mere protuberance or pustular eruption on the body politic—yet he is to grow to such dimensions and to "wax so exceeding great toward the south and the east and the pleasant land," as to become King of Syria and eventually the guiding Head of the gigantic ten-horned Roman Empire.

And thus in Revelation 13 and 17 he no longer appears as a Little Horn or as a horn at all, but appears as the ten-horned wild beast's seventh-eighth head, "wounded to death by a sword but healed of his deadly wound," who then "makes war with the saints for forty and two months and overcomes them." This precisely agrees with what is predicted of him as the Little Horn in Daniel 7 : 21, 25, "He shall make war with the saints and prevail against them and wear them out and they shall be given into his hand for a time, and times and half a time," i.e., three and a half years, the same period as the forty-two months. Thus it is obvious that the Little Horn on the Ten-horned Wild Beast in Daniel, where his rise and earlier actings are more fully recited, is identical with the Seventh-Eighth or Septimo-Octave Head of the same wild beast in Revelation, where his later achievements are especially described.

But this Seventh-Eighth Head, who is so manifestly identical with the Little Horn, must be a Na- oleon, because the Napoleon dynasty is historically the seventh-eighth governmental headship of Cæsar's Roman Empire, as shown by more than sixty expositors.

One of the strangest peculiarities of the coming Napoleonic Antichrist is that his earlier career for two or three years as a conquering sovereign is to be in the East of Europe, and in Asia, and not at all in the West of Europe or France, as we should naturally have supposed : and we cannot find any intimation in Daniel or Revelation that he will acquire his predestined dominion over France and the west of Europe, until he shall become Presidential Head of the Red Republican Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy—as prefigured by the scarlet ten-horned wild beast (Revelation 17)—two and a half years or three years after his covenant with the Jews.

His first rise as a Little Horn or Sovereign will probably not be until a few months after the confederated Ten Horns or Kings shall have arisen allied together in a ten-kingdomed confederacy as predicted in Daniel 7 : 24, but the exact interval of time is not stated. Then there will be a further interval of at least several months, or perhaps a year or more from his first rise until he makes the seven years' covenant with the Jews, so that altogether nearly two years, if not more, may elapse between the formation of the ten-kingdomed confederacy and the making of

THE SEVEN YEARS' JEWISH COVENANT.

For at his first rise as a little horn or sovereign over a little province in Greece, Thrace, or Syria, he will apparently not have the requisite power to make a covenant with the Jews to guarantee them protection in Judea. We may reasonably infer that such a covenant would be worthless until he has attained the position of being practically the territorial ruler of Judea. The Rev. R. A. Purdon, who held that this Little Horn will be a Napoleon, justly remarked in his Last Vials magazine in March, 1856 :

"It is absolutely certain from Daniel 9 : 27, that the man who ultimately becomes the eighth head of the Roman Empire will form a seven years' league with the Jewish nation, and consequently he must be a man of eminence and power from the very beginning of these seven years, since otherwise he would not be in a position to form a league with the Jews, nor would the Jews think it worth their while to form a league with him. His reign as Antichrist is to be for 3½ years ; that is to say, for the second half of the week of seven years. But the first half of the week will be occupied by him in establishing his empire and extending his influence before he ventures to set up his Antichristian apostacy."

"Antichrist, the Prince that shall come, shall make a treaty or covenant with the Jews for one seven or hebdomad, the last of the seventy weeks (Daniel 9 : 27), but after making this seven years' covenant he will break it in the midst of the seven years, and cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, after which the period of the exercise of his open blasphemy exactly corresponds with the time, times and a half of Dan. 7, at the commencement of which the abomination of desolation will be set up, and the worship of him and his image continue until the consummation. The abomination of desolation is probably the image endowed by Satan with the power of speech and breath or life. (Rev. 13 : 15.) That the Gentiles should worship the image of Antichrist is not difficult to conceive, seeing that idols and crucifixes, etc., are even now adored by the nations of European Christendom."

We may therefore conclude that before he makes the covenant he will to a great extent fulfil the prophecy in Daniel 8 : 9, that he "shall wax exceeding great toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land," (Judea). If he first arises as Sovereign of a little province in northern Greece, he will wax great toward the south by gaining power over southern Greece, and toward the east by subduing Thracian Turkey and Asia Minor and Syria ; but if the first arises as ruler of some part of Syria, he will wax great toward the south in the direction of Arabia, and toward the east by gaining dominion in the direction of Persia.

As regards the three of the ten Kings, whom he is foretold in Daniel 7 : 24 to subdue, we may infer that they will probably be the kings of Greece, Thrace and Bulgaria or Egypt, for in reference to the King of Syria he is predicted in Daniel 11 : 21 to "stand up in the place of the King of the North (Syria), and to come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom of Syria by flatteries," without military force. It seems strange that the other seven of the other Ten Allied Kings will stand by quietly and allow him to pluck up and subdue three of those ten Kings without intervening for their protection.

The position of King of Syria appears from Daniel 11 : 21 to 40 to be acquired by him about the period that he makes the covenant with the Jews and retained until about two and a half years after the covenant. Then he will proceed to gain power over the other seven of the Ten Kingdoms in a great Red Republican revolution, when he will be elected military dictator over ten new Red Republican Governors of those ten kingdoms. And several months afterwards they will become ten crowned kings, with this Napoleonic Antichrist as their crowned emperor ; and they will all be elected apparently by universal suffrage or plebiscites to reign for the specific term of 3½ years, which will in fact be the final 3½ years of the seven years of the Jewish covenant week.*

THE BONAPARTES A ROYAL FAMILY.

The coming Napoleonic Antichrist will have no difficulty in basing his claim to a position of sovereignty in the countries of the old Græco-Macedonian Empire upon a title of undoubted antiquity. One of the ancestors of the Napoleon Bonaparte family was David II., Emperor of Trebisonde, who was the rightful heir to the throne of Constantinople, but was put to death by Mahomed II. His only surviving son, George Nicephor Comnène, fled to Mania in Peloponnesus in 1476, and was made Protogeras over the community settled there. This official dignity was held by ten members of the Comnène family, in succession, until 1675, when Constantine Comnène, the tenth protogeras, was induced from fear of being subjugated by the Turks to emigrate from Mania to Italy with 3000 of his fellow countrymen. Arriving in Genoa on January 1st, 1676, he obtained from the Genoese Senate a grant of some tracts of land in Corsica, which were thenceforth colonized by him and his descendants.

One of his sons, Calomeros Comnène, subsequently settled in Florence in Tuscany, and as the Greek word Calomeros (καλὸς μερὸς) signifies in Italian buona parte, he therefore adopted the name of Buonaparte. In 1719 Antonio Buonaparte, a member of this Buonaparte branch of the Comnène family, emigrated from Tuscany to Corsica ; and Napoleon Buonaparte, who was born at Ajaccio in Corsica on August 15th, 1769, was his grandson. Corsica was ceded by the Genoese to France in 1768. The descent of the Comnène family from David II., last Emperor of Trebisonde, was attested by letters patent of Louis XVI., issued on September 1st, 1783. This account of Napoleon's family is given in the Memoirs of the Duchess d'Abrantes, published at Paris in 1835.

This Greek origin of the Napoleon family is further corroborated by a book written by Alfred Addis, B.A., published in London in 1829, which says, "Zopf, in his 'Summary of Universal History,' 20th edition, states that a scion of the Comnena family, who had claims to the throne of Constantinople, retired into Corsica, and that several members of that family bore the name of Calomeros, which is perfectly identical with that of Buonaparte (in Greek, Calos Meros). It may hence be concluded that this name has been Italianized. We do not believe this circumstance was ever known to Napoleon. This is stated in Mountholon and Gourgand's 'Memoirs of Napoleon,' vol. iii. p. 8. If this be true, Napoleon might be Emperor of the Romans by right of birth, as well as of arms."

(To be continued.)

* This new plan of electing a Republican King, like a Republican President, only for a term of years, instead of for life, may possibly be acted upon even in regard to some of the Ten Kings of the first Ten-Kingdomed Confederacy before the Napoleonic Little Horn arises at all.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Search for Lieutenant De Long and the other survivors of the Jeannette expedition is now being conducted by Engineer Melville, who has organized three parties so as to thoroughly cover the ground in the shortest time. The three parties are directed respectively by Mellville, Ninderman, and Bartlett, the last two being the two sailors who were saved in De Long's boat, and sent on by him to Bolonenga for succor. Accompanying each party is a Russian officer. A letter received at Irkutsk from Melville stated that the search parties would start from Yakutsk immediately, and would be in "the Wilderness" by March 1st. Lieutenant Danenhower applied for permission to remain and join in the search for De Long and the crew of the missing boat commanded by Lieutenant Chipp, but Secretary Hunt thought it best that Lieutenant Danenhower and his crew should return to America immediately, as their health is so seriously impaired, and they are accordingly ordered to start without delay.

The Story of the Voyage of the Jeannette is being gradually unfolded. On February 4th the most circumstantial account yet received was telegraphed from Irkutsk by Lieutenant Danenhower. During that weary period of twenty-one months when the Jeannette was drifting in the ice, Danenhower says that, "all possible observations were made, the result showing a northwest course. The ship was keeled over and heavily pressed by the ice most of the time. The mental strain was heavy on some of the ship's company. The result of the drift for the first five months was forty miles. There was a cycloidal movement of the ice. The drift during the last six months was very rapid. The surface water had a temperature of 20 degrees above zero. The extremes of temperature of the air were—greatest cold, 58 below zero, and greatest heat, 44 above zero. The first winter the mean temperature was 33 below zero. The second winter it was 39 below zero. The first summer the mean temperature was 40 degrees above zero. The winter's growth of ice was eight feet. The heaviest ice seen was twenty-three feet." Lieutenant Danenhower also says, "The general health of the crew during the twenty-one months' drift was excellent. No scurvy appeared. We used distilled water and bear and seal meat twice a week. No rum was served out. Divine service was regularly held."

An Acrimonious Debate is Expected on the new rules which Mr. Gladstone proposes shall in future govern the procedure of Parliament. The obstructive policy of the Irish members has rendered some change necessary; but the Conservatives, who are in a minority in the House of Commons, are opposed to giving the majority the power to summarily close a debate by a vote, and there are many Liberals who are reluctant to support any proposal tending to restrict the rights and privileges of Parliament, although they admit that those privileges have been abused. That Mr. Gladstone is resolved on pressing the question is apparent from a cablegram sent on Saturday by the correspondent of the New York Tribune, who says: "The ministers are hopeless of transacting any important business whatever without thorough reform of the rules, especially without cloture, and they have accordingly resolved to make the adoption of cloture, substantially as proposed, a cabinet question. If beaten they will resign or dissolve Parliament, probably the latter."

The British Parliament Assembled for the session on February 7th, when the proceedings were opened by the reading of the Queen's speech. Her Majesty did not attend in person, and the document was read by the Lord Chancellor. The speech is never understood as being the production of the Queen; it is prepared by the cabinet, but is submitted to the Queen for her approval before it is delivered. Its importance consists in the fact that the cabinet generally make it the medium of informing Parliament what measures will be introduced by the government. On this occasion a wide field is mapped out, including reforms of county government, and the administration of the city of London, a new bankruptcy bill, and a bill to prevent bribery and corruption at elections. An education bill for Scotland and Wales is also promised, and a bill to amend the law of entail, which at present requires that all the landed property of a deceased peer should be inherited by his eldest son to the exclusion of the other children. An announcement is also made, at the commencement of the speech, of the approaching marriage of the Queen's youngest son, an intimation which may be understood as a hint that Parliament will be expected to use some of the people's money to endow the young couple.

A Severe Attack on the Liberal Ministry was made in the House of Lords on the first night of the session by the Marquis of Salisbury, who was Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Conservative cabinet. A report of his speech by cable says that he denounced the government policy toward Turkey, Egypt, and Ireland. Mr. Gladstone's utterances in 1880 and the recent conduct of the government with regard to Turkish affairs, he said, tended to separate England from Germany. He hoped the government would co-operate with the Sultan and with France so long as their lines of policy were parallel, but would reserve the liberty to diverge when the interests of the East prompted them to act differently. He deprecated a policy of neutralization. Referring to Ireland he declared that the unexampled state of affairs there would not have been allowed to exist in France or America six months. He considered the royal speech an exhortation to persevere in the course previously pursued, "which is," he said, "let anarchy have its way, and offer a sop to those whom we hope to conciliate, because we are unable to conquer them." He concluded his speech with these words: "The country expects the government to meet the calamity of which the doctrines they have preached have been the cause." A speech of the same tenor was delivered in the House of Commons by the Conservative leader, to which Mr. Gladstone made an eloquent reply.

The Hopes of the Irish Members of Parliament who advocate Home Rule have been encouraged by a speech delivered by Mr. Gladstone which they think indicates that the government are prepared to take the question of Home Rule into consideration. Mr. Gladstone described the Home Rule programme as impracticable so long as the Irish are unable to define clearly where local affairs end and imperial affairs begin. The remark has caused a sensation, because the English people supposed that Mr. Gladstone regarded the scheme as impracticable altogether and not to a certain degree only. The Times considers this manner of meeting the demand of the home rulers showed an unfortunate departure from the settled practices of responsible politicians.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Atheist Member of Parliament, presented himself on February 7th at the table of the House of Commons with the new members to be sworn. Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Conservatives, then moved that he should not be allowed to take the oath. Mr. Gladstone opposed the motion, and Mr. Bradlaugh, with the permission of the Speaker, made an address in his own behalf from the bar of the House, in which he declared solemnly that the Parliamentary oath would be binding upon his honor and conscience. But as he had, previous to his election, ridiculed the oath as a farce, his declaration had but little influence on the House. When the question was put to the vote eighty Liberals abstained from voting, while others voted with the Conservatives. Mr. Bradlaugh's application was consequently rejected, in spite of Mr. Gladstone's support, by a vote of 286 to 227. A ministerial defeat on the first night of the session was regarded as ominous by the politicians.

An Explosive Letter has been Sent to Mr. Forster, the British Secretary of State, for Ireland. It contained a scruple and a half of iodide of nitrogen, which is a fearfully dangerous explosive, and very seldom used, being difficult to obtain. It was addressed to Mr. Forster at Dublin Castle; but happily the secretary had left when the letter arrived. In a speech in the House of Commons he said if he had opened it, as the senders desired, he would certainly have lost his hands, and he might have been killed.

The Outrages on the Jews of Russia still continue. A Jewish refugee who arrived in Liverpool from Kief on February 10th, says he recently saw a number of Jewish maidens stripped naked and flogged through the town. The police refused to interfere. A soldier from Nikolaief says his regiment was not allowed to suppress riots against the Jews. Many women with infants appear to have suffered acutely.

A Champion of the Russian Government has written to the London Daily News excusing the recent outrages on the Jews. He urges that it is no wonder the Russian peasant is willing to join in the riots, because, having borrowed money of Jewish pawnbrokers at a high rate of interest he is anxious to recover some of it. Seldom has such a plea been urged in defence of inhuman barbarities. It is contrary to every principle of morality. There is no defence for usury, but when a man makes a bargain that he will pay a certain specified rate of interest for the use of money which he could get in no other way, he has no right to squander the money, and then, when the time for payment comes, murder his creditor to release himself from his obligation. The writer further says that "Russia is earnestly seeking to do her best for all classes of her subjects." There is plenty of evidence to prove that the police and the soldiers have aided rather than hindered the outrages, and the Russian Governors in their proclamations have encouraged the anti-Jewish spirit; facts which show that if Russia is earnestly seeking to do her best, her effort so far has been a miserable failure.

"The Treasury of David:" by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. A homiletical exposition of the Book of Psalms. Vol. II., comprising psalms 27 to 52; Vol. III., psalms 53 to 78; Vol. IV., psalms 79 to 103. We have not the other volumes. Price $3 a volume, postage free. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS.

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandsoh, Major Trevilian, etc.

By THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1882.

16th Year. No. 8.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF MR. BRAMWELL BOOTH AND MISS CATHERINE BOOTH, and Picture of the Attack on the Salvation Army. GRATITUDE AND HOPEFULNESS. A Sermon by Dr. Talmage. SYLPH SOMERS. By Henry Martin (Continued). Christ Stilling the Tempest. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Continued).

CURRENT EVENTS: The Anti-Polygamy Bill—Settlement of the Apportionment Problem—The Inquest on the Park Row Fire—The Firework Factory Explosion—A Bill to make Idiots—The Y. M. C. A. Convention—The Recalled Chinese Students—Tragic End of a Sinful Life—Life Saved by a Letter, etc. PICTURE OF JOHN BUNYAN IN PRISON.

GREAT SPOIL. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

A Trust, and What Came of it (with Illustration). COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).

PICTURE OF ENTOMBED COLLIERS at PRAYER. FOREIGN TOPICS: The Irish Home-Rule Question—The Slav Revolt—The Czar Admonished by an Archbishop—Mr. Moody in Glasgow, etc.

MR. BRAMWELL BOOTH AND MISS CATHERINE BOOTH—The Attack on the Salvation Army.

MR. BRAMWELL BOOTH,

Chief of Staff of the Salvation Army.

Birth in 1856—His Early Conversion—First Open-air Address at the Age of 15—Visits Sweden and Preaches the Gospel there in 1878—Experience of "Roughs"—Office Duties at Headquarters—Holiness Meetings.

THE portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Booth and the sketches of their lives presented in the last issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we supplement this week with those of their son and daughter, who have from the commencement of the work of the Salvation Army taken an active and enthusiastic interest in its promotion.

Mr. Bramwell Booth is now twenty-six years of age, having been born in the year 1856, at Halifax, Yorkshire, England. His father, closely adhering to the plan of organization he selected, which has its type in the army, has nominated him "chief of the staff," as indicating his close relation to his leader and father.

He was surrounded from his birth by Christian influences, and prayerful believing efforts being untiringly made to lead him to give his young heart to Christ, parental solicitude was abundantly and early gratified; for at a service which his devoted mother was conducting while he was quite a child, the Holy Spirit led him to see and feel his immediate need of Christ as his Saviour, and he there and then resolved to consecrate his youthful life to Christ.

Growing intelligence brought with it only a deeper and stronger attachment to the religion which he professed, and with almost precocious intensity he sought the glory of the Redeemer in the salvation of the lost around him. When his father, General Booth, initiated in 1866 the evangelistic services which subsequently crystallized into the Christian Mission, Bramwell stood by his side; and when he was only fifteen years old he began to speak, and impressively, too, in the open air. In fact, both he and his sister, Miss Catherine Booth, evinced a most decided preference for open-air meetings, in conducting and speaking at which they felt even more interest than at meetings held indoors.

When the multiplied and ever-increasing agencies called into existence by General Booth's unflagging industry and ardent zeal assumed the form and name of the Salvation Army, a very large portion of the work was assigned to Mr. Bramwell Booth, and cheerfully accepted by him; but until its business demanded his almost continual presence in London, he visited, at frequent intervals, the stations connected with the movement, which had been established in all parts of Great Britain.

VISIT TO SWEDEN IN 1878.

Though characterized by marked energy and an unwearied industry, Mr. Bramwell Booth has long suffered from very delicate health, and in the year 1878 was taken by a friend of the family to Sweden, in the hope that complete change and rest might materially strengthen him. He was soon at work, however, his irrepressible love for souls constraining him to make an effort, though in a foreign land, to preach the Gospel of the grace of God, and point dying sinners to "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world."

Availing himself of the kindly services of an interpreter, he spoke every night to immense congregations, besides holding three meetings daily during the last three weeks of his visit. Large numbers professed to have been converted to Christ, and the interest was so widespread that the people came for many miles from all the surrounding district to the Mission House at Wernamo to hear him.

In open-air meetings in England Mr. Bramwell Booth has had considerable experience of opposition from "roughs." One among many instances of this nature was the outrageous conduct of a tumultuous crowd at Salisbury, in 1878, when he had his hat knocked off his head by the hand of an infuriated ruffian, and narrowly escaped serious injury.

DUTIES AT HEADQUARTERS.

Being almost incessantly engaged in office duties at headquarters, in London, Mr. Booth has been unable to attend many services away from the British Metropolis during the past two years; but every Friday evening he has led a Holiness Meeting in one of the eastern districts of the city, which is highly appreciated and has proved beneficial to many. The attendance, which used to number one hundred persons, has increased to many hundreds; and, in addition to this important duty, he has from time to time organized and led whole nights of prayer in different parts of the country.

As a speaker, Mr. Bramwell Booth is distinguished by several valuable qualities, not the least important being his extraordinary power to condense into a few crisp, ringing sentences, the most profound and powerful spiritual truth, which he presents in a popular form, and which seems to go home to the heart of every listener with great power. This gift has made the Holiness Meetings he has conducted a life-long blessing to very many visitors who have attended them only on one occasion.

The weight and number of his cares as Chief of the Staff of The Salvation Army can hardly be imagined by any one not acquainted with the multifarious departments of business at headquarters. The general being constantly engaged in holding meetings for consultation and advice, which, true, to his plan of army discipline, he calls councils of war, and large meetings throughout Great Britain, the management of all the details of the work, the movements of 554 officers, the whole correspondence with 256 stations, the preparation of the Army's publications and literature, together with innumerable matters of business of every description, make demands which it is wonderful that any man should be able to meet.

The average number of letters sent out daily is 200; and the chief is generally engaged in the Army's business from 9 A.M. until 10 P.M., with scarcely a break, and this he is enabled to do all the year round. Yet he is to be found at all times calm and cheerful, and ready to speak a kind word to any inquiring sinner whose heart has been pierced with an arrow of divine truth, and is longing for a consciousness of pardon and peace; and many seekers have, in this manner, been led by him to Christ.

MISS CATHERINE BOOTH,

Leader of the Salvation Army in Paris.

Early Conversion—Commences to Preach the Gospel when 15—An Early Accident and Consequent Weakness—Evangelistic Successes—Introduces the Army into France.

MISS CATHERINE BOOTH, whose portrait accompanies that of her brother on our frontispiece, is the eldest daughter of General and Mrs. Booth, and is about twenty-one years of age. Like her brother, from earliest infancy she had the unspeakable advantage of being "trained in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" and like him, also, when she was still a child she was led to give her heart to Christ.

The memorable scene of this all-important event was one of the weekly prayer-meetings of the evangelists of "The Christian Mission." Six years afterward she spoke for the first time in public, in one of the lowest and most squalid streets in the borough of Hackney, a suburb of London, and has continued to preach the Gospel ever since whenever she had the opportunity, and her efforts have resulted in richest blessing to hundreds of souls.

The after-effect of an accident in early childhood produced a spinal disease, which at one time compelled her to remain in a reclining position for months, and seriously endangered her life. Yet, in spite of weakness and pain, such that she often fainted at the conclusion of meetings, Miss Booth has visited the stations of the Army in all parts of the country, and has conducted thousands of services; God everywhere and always making His grace to triumph in her, and many lost ones being led to Christ for pardon.

HER POWER AS A PUBLIC SPEAKER.

Miss Booth possesses very unusual ability as a speaker, having a clear voice, which she modulates with much skill, and whose tones are frequently most tender and pathetic. She has developed also a fine musical taste, and has been able, by her ad-resses and solo-singing, to hold, in the most enthralled attention, large miscellaneous audiences, whose attention was difficult to secure.

In Whitby, Leeds, Stockton-on-Tees, Sheffield, King's Lynn, and other commercial centres and rural market towns of Great Britain especially, where she held, for a more lengthened period than usual, Gospel services in large public buildings, she was enabled to deal successfully with immense masses of people in a truly marvellous manner. And in all cases the subduing and converting power of the Holy Spirit accompanied her efforts to such an extent that in each town she visited, hundreds of sinners—some of them of a very depraved and dangerous type indeed—responded to her call to yield themselves to Christ, who "came to seek and to save" them.

In the month of March, 1881, Miss Booth went to Paris to inaugurate and establish the work of and amid bodily weakness and pain so intense that she had repeatedly to be carried from the meetings to her room, she fought one of the most desperate battles against infidelity, irreligion, prejudice, and ignorance in which the Army, headed by its most stalwart champions, has ever been engaged.

THE SALVATION ARMY IN FRANCE;

In spite of her necessarily imperfect knowledge of the language, hundreds of men and women in Paris, who were previously regarded as the lowest, most reckless, and abandoned, have listened to her with the greatest attention as she enunciated to them, syllable by syllable, and word by word, of Jesus and His love;" and at the present hour there are more than a hundred converted French witnesses to the fact that "God is with her of a truth." A second station has been opened in Paris—that centre of continental fascination, gayety, and godlessness—and Miss Booth is longing to send out the officers she has brought into the work, and trained, to extend the beneficial operations of the Salvation Army to the provincial towns of France. Much prayer is being offered for her mission by Christians who know what she is doing, and how devotedly she is consecrating her energies in spite of her physical ailments to the work of the Lord.

"THE OLD, OLD STORY,

THE ATTACK ON THE SALVATION ARMY AT SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

THE following graphic account of the attack on the Salvation Army, at Sheffield, which we briefly described last week, has been received.

A most extraordinary and alarming scene was witnessed on Monday, January 16th, at Sheffield. The Salvation Army, which has four distinct "barracks" in that town, held "a grand council of war" in the Albert Hall, on January 15th, and on Sunday there was a "parade of the Army" at 9.30, "ammunition," according to the programme having been laid in at 6.30. At half past ten another meeting took place at the barracks, and at 1.30 there was held "a grand inspection and march from the barracks."

The Albert Hall was reached at half-past two, and a service was held with a crowded audience. Six thousand tickets had been distributed. The General and Mrs. Booth were announced "to preach." The procession through the town was followed by a shouting crowd, but no interference with the Army was attempted, except as 150 of the army left the Albert Hall they were pelted with stones and mud. Emerson Davison, "Lieutenant of No. 3 Corps," who is better known as "the converted wrestler," was struck on the mouth with a stone, but was able to continue the journey and take part in the after proceedings at night. Or Sunday evening there was a second meeting at the Albert Hall, devoted to "signs and wonders."

On Monday, the Army left the barracks in Thomas Street at half past ten in the morning, when the procession consisted of three carriages containing the General and officers of the Army and a brass band. In the procession was "Lieutenant" Emerson Davison, the converted Northumbrian wrestler, who carried the banner at the Stephenson Centenary at Newcastle. On that occasion he was presented with a scarlet uniform and this he wore on Monday. He was mounted on a gray horse, and rode just before General Booth's carriage.

As soon as he appeared in Thomas Street, a crowd of cutlers in their white aprons, laborers, and women, which had gathered in the hope of seeing the procession, began to yell at him, and when the other officers of the Army took their places in the carriages the roar was very great, and the street almost blocked with people. The two police officers on duty near, did what they could to preserve order, but the uproar increased, and as the Salvation Army started on their triumphal march, as they called it in their programme, they were

PELTED WITH MUD AND BRICKBATS.

At the top of Brook Hill the roughs became so daring, throwing stones and mud at the females as well as the male officers of the Army, that "Major" Cadman, who had control of the procession, called a halt, hoping that the crowd, which numbered nearly 2000 persons, would sweep by. Finding they did not, he divided the procession, one party, headed by the Northumbrian wrestler, going down St. Philip's and West Bar towards the centre of the town, and the other making its way to the Albert Hall by a nearer route. That portion of the procession headed by the wrestler had a fearful time of it. On arriving in West Bar the crowd of roughs increased greatly, numbering at least 4000, who ridiculed and jeered at the procession, spat upon the officers, and shouted, "Give it them!" "They want their heads splitting!" and threw mud and stones, seriously injuring the wrestler and many members of the band.

Some of the members of the Army were blinded and almost choked with mud, and their faces cruelly cut and bruised with stones. Major Cadman's nose was hit, and bled profusely. Before the Army got out of West Bar the four standard bearers were attacked by the mob and dragged about by the hair, while an attempt was made to wrest the banners from them. The fight was fierce for some minutes, but ultimately the officers managed to drag the banners safely into one of the vehicles.

At the bottom of Snig Hill, a comparatively narrow and steep thoroughfare, there was a dense crowd, and the temper of the mob became more and more threatening. No stones or mud were thrown; but, instead,

A YOUNG MAN THREW A SHORT STICK with great force at "Lieutenant" Davison. The stick struck him violently on the back of the head, and, rendered almost unconscious, he would have fallen off his horse had not two men held him up. In this way, and every now and then putting his hand in a half-dazed manner to his head, he performed the rest of the journey to the Albert Hall.

Outside of this building there was an immense crowd, who received the Salvation Army with roars, yells, and several volleys of stones. Davison, still almost unconscious, was lifted from his horse, and was carried or dragged into the hall. The band and carriages containing General and Mrs. Booth and other prominent members of the Salvation Army, were driven to a side door, but this, unhappily, was not open. To wait till the all-keeper could open it was impossible, for stones and mud were flying in all directions. The carriage, consequently, had to be driven round the building to reach the door, through which Davison passed, and amid a scene of considerable excitement, a hasty scramble had to be made to reach the friendly shelter of the interior.

Blood was flowing from the heads of several bandmen, and the faces and the dresses of almost all of them were covered with mud. For Davison, who was now lying unconscious in one of the ante-rooms, medical assistance was summoned, and on the arrival of Mr. Hallam, surgeon to the Central Police Division, he discovered that the man was suffering from concussion of the brain, and from shock to the system. His head and face were also covered with mud. His upper lip was cut open while in a procession the previous day. He was moved to the Public Hospital in West Street, here, at the close of the week, he lay in a very dangerous condition, Undeterred by what had happened in the streets, the Salvation Army held the Holiness Convention at the Albert Hall, and had very large and orderly congregations on Monday, and also on Wednesday evening, when Mrs. Booth delivered a lecture on the aims and measures of the Salvation Army.

Mrs. Booth expressed her thanks and those of the whole Army for the kind expressions of sympathy which had been expressed towards them. She hoped that what occurred on Monday would be instrumental in rousing to a greater extent than had hitherto been the case the attention of the Christian portion of the inhabitants of Sheffield to the real conduct of the working classes. The members of the Salvation Army were quite willing to be the sufferers; they expected it, and had made up their minds to a great deal more than they had experienced.

In giving an account of Davison's history, Mrs. Booth said that he was originally one of the better class of wrestlers in Newcastle, and at the time of his conversion was under heavy bets to win a wrestling match which was to come off. When he gave up his engagements in a most honorable way, as much as $150 in one bet was laid that he would fall through drink at Easter, but by the grace of God he still stood. Mrs. Booth then went on to expound the aims, objects, and working of the Army, and concluded her eloquent and earnest address.

An influential deputation waited upon the Mayor of Sheffield on Tuesday, calling his attention to the attack which had been made upon the Salvation Army, when he characterized it as a "disgraceful riot," and deplored its occurrence.

Bills have been issued by the Chief Constable offering a reward of $50 for the detection and conviction of the person who threw the stick which struck Davison upon the head.

Nor has Sheffield been the only town in Great Britain in which this incomprehensible hostility towards the Salvation Army has been manifested during the past month. On Tuesday night, January 17th, a series of riots in connection with the Salvation Army reached a climax in Arbroath, in Scotland. Every window in the place of meeting was smashed with stones and other missiles, and Captain Tomlins, one of the leaders, was so seriously injured that it is feared he will not leave the infirmary for three weeks, and grave fears are expressed as to his recovery. The Army was routed, and chased through several streets till shelter was found. The police were quite powerless to interfere.

A remarkable demonstration in connection with the Salvation Army took place on January 18th, at Bridgewater. At the early hour of six o'clock a crowded meeting was held in the Skating Rink, followed, an hour afterwards, by a monster procession, headed by a brass band belonging to the local contingent of the "Army," to the railway station, whither the two captains who had been stationed in the town for several months past were accompanied on their departure for another sphere of labor. An open-air meeting was then held outside the railway station, at which fully two thousand persons were present.

JOHN BUNYAN IN BEDFORD JAIL.

(See Illustration on page 124.)

ON November 13th, 1660, John Bunyan was committed to prison on the charge of "going about to conventicles in the country, to the great disparagement of the government of the Church of England." Efforts were made to keep him out of jail, but in vain. A Mr. Forbes, among others, endeavored to persuade him to give up his "unseemly ecclesiastical practices," kindly and earnestly telling him that he had no right to preach; but honest John was not to be moved. At the next sessions he was charged with having "devilishly and perniciously abstained from going to church, and with being a common upholder of conventicles, contrary to the laws."

He was required to plead, but refused. He declared that he was one of the old-fashioned persons who coveted to fear God and honor the king; and as He had commanded that every man should minister according to the gift which had been given him, he, the prisoner, must needs minister in the preaching of the Word. He was as ready as any justice on the bench to render unto Cæsar the things which were Cæsar's; but he could not render unto Cæsar the things which were God's. Thereupon he was convicted, and his sentence was as follows: "You must be had back again to prison, and there lie for three months following; and at three months' end if you do not submit, and go to church to hear divine service, and leave your preaching, you must be banished the realm; and if, after such a day as shall be appointed you to be gone, you are found in this realm, you must stretch by the neck for it."

His prison is described as one of the worst in the kingdom, and was fittingly called by himself "a den." It had accommodation for only thirty persons, but sixty were often confined there day and night. Bunyan was then only thirty-two, and to a man of his active habits and religious feeling, confinement in such a place as the companion of felons, must have been peculiarly galling.

When the sessions came, Bunyan firmly refused to violate his conscience by promising not to do that which he felt to be his bounden duty, and stoutly declared his readiness to suffer, if need be, for Christ's sake.

Soon the coronation of the king came, and a free pardon was offered to all prisoners, except the worst; but there was no pardon for John Bunyan. At times his spirit almost sank within him. To be separated from his wife and children was a sore trial. "Poor child!" said he of his blind daughter, "what sorrow thou art like to have for thy portion in this world. Thou must be beaten, suffer hunger, cold, nakedness, and a thousand calamities, though I cannot now endure that the wind should blow upon thee."

The imprisonment continued, as is well known, for twelve years. Some privileges were occasionally extended to him, which he turned to the best account. The great distinction of the imprisonment was, as all the world has long been aware, that Bunyan, while undergoing it, wrote his immortal allegory, "The Pilgrim's Progress," which has passed through innumerable editions, and has had an unparalleled popularity. There cannot be the least doubt that the book has been the means, under God, of leading thousands of souls into the way everlasting.

Ten Thousand Tablets Bearing Ancient Inscriptions have been discovered in a buried city near Bagdad by Mr. Rassam, the eminent Assyrian explorer. In a lecture delivered at the Victoria Institute, London, Mr. Rassam thus described his discovery: "Guided by an Arab I came to an interesting ruin about twelve miles from Bagdad and commenced a thorough search there. The result was that after digging for four days we came upon the top of some walls. This induced us to persevere with increased ardor, and we soon found that we had come upon an enormous building, in which we began to find inscriptions. We first of all discovered four rooms, and then came upon a fifth. They were paved with bricks or stones; but the fifth room was paved with asphalt, the discovery of which brought to my mind Solomon's saying: 'There is nothing new under the sun.' Previous to this I had always thought that asphalt was a modern invention. Singular as this discovery was, we dug through the asphalt, and in a short time we were rewarded by coming upon a coffer in which we found inscriptions. From this coffer we took two cylinders. These were covered with inscriptions which are supposed to be the most important records of the oldest city in the world, founded, as historians tell us, by Noah after the deluge, and where, according to tradition, Noah buried the antediluvian records. After a few days' more digging, in one of the rooms there was a channel, and inside that channel there were records inscribed on 10,000 tablets. These tablets are all coming to England, but we cannot as yet say what they contain. They may contain something of even greater value than anything that has hitherto been discovered in the course of our Eastern researches. It may be, indeed, that we shall really find on them the antediluvian records of which I have spoken."

GRATITUDE AND HOPEFULNESS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"He thanked God and took courage."—ACTS 28:15.

Paul's Reception on the Way to Rome—Inspired with Gratitude and Hopefulness—A Sentiment for the New Year—A Mingled Garland for 1881—Personal Associations—I. Church Associations—A Centenarian Saved by a Sermon after Eighty-five Years—Churches Like Arctic Seas—The Heroism of the Survivors of a Wreck—II. The Church Should be a Great Home Circle—The Pulpit the Fireplace—III. Religion a Practical Matter—A Gospel that will Cure—Ingratitude to a Benefactor of 1857—A Ruined Merchant's Happiness—Do Not Interfere with the Pilot—IV. Comfort for the Bereft—V. Jesus the Only Hope for Life and Death—A Dying Woman's Cry—A Great General's Reply to a Message.

PAUL had just landed at Puteoli and was getting off him the sea dizziness, and was about to cross the country to Rome. Grand Christian people at Rome heard he was coming and went out to greet him and escort him up to the city, and if any man ever deserved a triumphal entrance it was Paul. No sooner had he looked upon these people than two sentiments took possession of his soul:

GRATITUDE AND HOPEFULNESS.

"He thanked God and took courage." Standing here in the first morning of the new year, these two sentiments are dominant in my own soul, and in yours. Gratitude to God for the past—hopefulness for the future.

It is only a few hours ago, at the midnight, that the door of eternity opened and let in amid the great throng of departed centuries the old dying year. Under the twelfth stroke of the brazen hammer on the city clock, the old patriarch fell dead, and the stars of the night were the funeral torches. Three hundred and sixty-five times hath the clock struck twelve for the noon, twelve for the night. During that time, how many marriage garlands have been woven, how many graves dug, how many fortunes won, how many victories achieved, how many defeats suffered, how many souls lost, how many immortals blessed! Year of assassination and of triumph, of conflagration and of harvest, of joy and of sorrow, I twist a garland half of amaranth and half of cypress—the amaranth for the joy and the cypress for the grief—and I put the garland on the brow of the old dead year. And right beside the grave of the dead is the cradle of the new year.

This season of year to me is very suggestive. It is more than an anniversary to me. If I live until next Saturday, I shall be fifty years of age. If I live until next Friday I shall keep the first anniversary of my son's death. So that this season of the year is full of suggestiveness and full of solemnity, and full of gratitude, and full of hopefulness—all kinds of emotion commingling in my soul. I thank God and I take courage.

In our church, it has been a year of great prosperity. We have blown the Gospel trumpet and the people have come in by hundreds and hundreds and yielded their hearts to God, and these altars again and again have been thronged with people who stood up in the presence of three worlds and acknowledged the Lord who bought them, and it has been a perpetual harvest home, and there is a great multitude this morning in the house of God, children of life, who only a year ago were the children of darkness. I have thought this morning it might be well to talk with you in rehearsal of some things we have been trying to do during the past year, and to state some things we hope to do during this coming year.

I. And in the first place, in this church I have during the last year tried to be worthy of your confidence and love—not by sycophancy or by consultation of your prejudices, but by preaching a straightforward Gospel whoever it might hit. When a minister stands in the presence of a congregation who do not believe in him, his usefulness is done. When a congregation comes to believe that a pastor has in his soul the principles of selfishness and worldliness dominant, he had better be away. When a congregation wish that their pastor might be called to some other field of usefulness he really is called to go. A minister has no more right to kill a church than a church has a right to kill a minister. There is a time to come and there is a time to go. I know a minister of religion who had his fourth settlement. His first two churches became extinct as a result of his ministry, the third church was hopelessly crippled, and the fourth was saved simply by the fact that he departed this life.

Well, my friends, on the other hand, I have seen men, I have seen pastorates, which continued year after year, all the time strengthening, and I have heard of instances where the pastoral relation continued twenty years, thirty years, forty years, and all the time the confidence and the love were on the increase. So it was with the pastorate of old Doctor Spencer, so it was with the pastorate of old Doctor Gardiner Spring, so it was with the pastorate of a great multitude of those old ministers of Jesus Christ of whom the world was not worthy.

Many years ago, in England, a lad heard Mr. Flaville preach from the text: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maranatha." Years passed on. The lad became a man. He came to this country. He lived to be a hundred years old and yet had not found the Lord. Standing at that age in the field one day, he bethought himself of a sermon which he had heard eighty-five years before, and of the fact that when Mr. Flaville had finished the discourse and came to the close of the service, he said, "I shall not pronounce the benediction. I cannot pronounce it when there may be in this audience those who love not the Lord Jesus Christ and are anathema maran-atha." The memory of that old scene came over him, and then and there he gave his heart to God—the old sermon eighty-five years before preached coming to resurrection in the man's salvation. Would God that those of us who now preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ might utter some word that will resound in helpfulness and in redemption long after we are dead!

Standing in your midst during the past year you have seen in me many imperfections, but you could not have had such consciousness of them as I have had consciousness of them, and I verily believe that the relation between us is strengthening, and that the friendship that began on earth will be resumed in Heaven.

"'Tis not a cause of small import
The pastor's care demands;
But what might fill an angel's heart,
It filled a Savior's hands.

They watch for souls for which the Lord
Did Heavenly bliss forego;
For souls which must forever live
In raptures or in woe."

II. Again: we have during the past year tried to culture in this congregation, and we shall try to do the same in the years to come, the spirit of Christian sociality. There are churches which are Arctic seas, iceberg grinding against iceberg. People come into such a church and sit down as they sit in a ferryboat, side by side, no nod of recognition, no grasp of the hand, no throb of brotherly or sisterly affection. From Saturday to Monday, they are simply ferried over by Christian ordinances. Now, my brother, if you have a hard nature, if you have a malicious nature, if you have a bad nature, the higher the wall you build around yourselves the better; but if there be in you anything loving, anything kind, anything genial, anything sympathetic, anything useful, let it shine out.

There is a vessel crashing into the rocks. One man crawls up on the beach from the shipwreck. He walks right up the beach, goes into the fisherman's hut and sits down to warm himself, utterly reckless of the fact that there are fifty men struggling in the surf. O! how selfish and how mean, you say that is. How much better the spirit of the survivors of the Atlantic steamer who, having escaped to land themselves, went out as far as they could toward the breakers, and the water were cold, and they tried to bring the suffering and the drowning to the shore, and pulled away until the left arm gave out in the cold water, and then the right arm gave out, and then with their teeth they caught the garments of the suffering and the drowning and pulled them shoreward. Alas! my friends, if you and I having escaped from the wreck, from the dark wave of sin and death and got fairly ashore, we sit down to warm our Christian graces by the fires of the Christian church, utterly reckless of the fact that there are thousands of Christians in the surf.

My friends, the church ought to be of fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters. That would be a very strange home circle where the brothers and sisters did not know each other, and where the parents were characterized by frigidity and heartlessness. The church must be a great home circle—the pulpit the fireplace, the people all gathered around it. Who is that sitting before you? "I don't know," you say. Who is that sitting behind you? You say, "I don't know." Who is that sitting at the right and left of you? You say, "I don't know." You ought to know.

A GREAT HOME CIRCLE

I declare that you have the privilege of giving the right hand of fellowship to every fellow-shipper. Many a time when the Gospel sermon may have failed, and the Christian song may have failed, and the Scripture lesson may have failed one good, hearty shake of the hand on the way to the door and an expression of personal interest in the man's salvation have done that which all the other services of the day could not accomplish. O! let there be sociality in the church of Jesus Christ. If fish go in shoals, if sheep go in flocks, if flowers go in tribes, if stars swing in galaxies then let all those who worship in the same church move in loving and shining bands. "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one glassy sea, one doxology, one Heaven.

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love;
The fellowship of kindred minds
Is like to that above.

From sorrow, toil, and pain
And sin we shall be free,
And perfect love and friendship reign
Through all eternity."

III. But I have also to remark that, during the past year I have tried, as I shall this coming year try, to preach to you

A VERY PRACTICAL RELIGION.

I know, as you know, the vast majority of the people who attend this church are business men and business women. There is no need of me dealing in abstractions. I know what your troubles are, what your annoyances are, what your perplexities are, what your exasperations are. I care very little about the Hittites, and the Hivites and the Jebuzites. I would rather look after your annoyances and your perplexities and your enemies that want to keep you out of the Promise Land. So I only preach a Gospel that is not only appropriate to the home circle but is appropriate to Wall Street, to Broadway, to Fulton Street, to Montague Street, to Atlantic Street, to every street—not only a religion that is good for half past ten o'clock Sunday morning, but good for half past ten o'clock any morning; or good for half past seven o'clock Sabbath night, but good for half past seven o'clock of any night.

Now, suppose here were a case of diphtheria and a physician came in; would he give medicines appropriate to the yellow fever, or to cholera, or to marasmus! O! no. He gives a specific for diphtheria. And there is a large company of promise here, a great collection of promises, and there is one just adapted to your case. It is a specific It will cure, it will cure!

The fact is that a vast multitude of business men get no practical use from their religion. I you are sick, or if a member of your family dies you say, "We must have religious consolation and for the minister." But suppose you are in a business corner, suppose the sheriff is after you, suppose your partner has played you a mean trick, suppose there are half a dozen men in the front office with duns for debts you cannot pay, suppose you can no more sleep at night than you could sleep on the top of a mast in a Mediterranean hurricane, suppose at midnight you walk the floor with flushed cheek and your head aching as though it would split open—do you take practical advantage of your holy religion? O! no. You wait until the morning and then you send for some skinflint and try to borrow a thousand dollars from him at two per cent a month, and he will not do it. Or you go to some friend that you helped the day of trouble. You say he will surely help you. He will not.

*Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday; we therefore publish a sermon delivered by him last New Year's day which we were unable to publish in the number of the CHRISTIAN HERALD of the following Thursday, owing to an unexpected change that week in Dr. Talmage's arrangements.

I knew a man who in the panic of 1857 helped many through their troubles. He loaned a thousand dollars to this man, and five thousand to that man, and ten thousand to another man. He took other men into his own bank and said, "Give this man all the accommodation he wants," and he went many through their financial troubles. They said, "Thank you, thank you, thank you, thank you." Five years passed along and his day of trial came. Where were his friends he had helped? All gone. Most of them out of town, or if they met him it was to say, "God bless you;" knowing quite well that one ounce of financial help would have been worth fifty tons of God bless you! Nothing makes a man so mad as to say God bless you when you ought to bless him.

Well, now, what have you done in the midst of your trial? Not at all what you ought to have done, my dear brother. You ought to have gone to the private office and locked the door, and then knelt down and said: "O! God, Thou hast said, 'call on me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee,' and this is a day of trouble; fulfill thy promise. There is that note in the bank and I cannot pay it, and my credit is due, and I cannot meet it. Lord God, fulfill Thy promise." Could He have done it? Just as certainly as there is a God on the throne. Ah! no. So many of you, my dear friends, instead of making your religion a robe in which to wrap yourself warm from the chill of this world, make it a sort of ring of beads around the neck, that looks very beautiful but nothing more.

In the panic of 1873, there was a business man and in his back office on Wall Street, with a loaded pistol on the table, and he was writing a farewell letter to his family. A friend came in and mistrusted what was going on. He said: "This is my pistol." What did that frenzied merchant want? Did he need advice of the brothers? Did he want help from the note shavers? Not so much as he wanted God.

I saw a man go right through all the perturbations of business life. He was faithful to God. I saw him one day worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. I saw him the next day and he was not worth a farthing. I said: "Mr. Stevens, they

YOU HAVE BEEN UNFORTUNATE." "Yes," said he, "it is all gone." "O, no," I said, "it is not all gone." "Yes," said he, "it is all gone. I put my name where I ought never have signed. It is all gone." I said, "William Stevens, I am your pastor, and I have a right to talk to you plainly. You say it is all gone. It is not all gone. Who put the iron fence around the village church?" Said he, "I did." Said I, "Who gave three thousand dollars toward the building of this village church?" Said he, "I did." Said I, "Do you suppose God has forgotten that? It is not all gone. You have made an investment for eternity." All the rest of his life he was a clerk in the great establishment, the great manufacturing establishment over which he had presided. He was all that time happier than Henry VIII. on the day when Anne Boleyn came to the palace, happier than Napoleon III. at the time of his coronation, happier than any man who trusts his trust in this world when he ought to put his trust in God.

O! how I should like to take the lamp of this Gospel and put it right down in your counting room, right down on your carpenter's table, right down in your importing establishment, right down amid your commercial interests. I cannot help but see that the same trouble that makes one man ruin another. I stood at Long Branch and I looked off on the ocean, and there was a very strong wind blowing, and I saw one vessel going this way, and another vessel going that way. "Why," I said, "that is very strange—vessels going in opposite directions, propelled by the same wind;" but I looked again and I saw it was the way they had the sails up. And I see people under the strong tempest of disaster, one man driven on the rocks, the other man driven into the harbor of God's mercy. It is the way you have the sails up. One man has the sail of pride up, the other man has the sail of faith in God up.

But I see some among you business men trying to put your trust in God; but my brother, you make the dreadful mistake; you put your trust in God and then you take it away. A vessel comes across the sea. It is nearing the "Narrows."

A PILOT COMES on board. "Now," he says, "captain, you have had a very rough time, go and rest; I will take you up to the wharf in safety." The captain goes to rest, but he feels nervous. He says, "Now, how if that pilot doesn't understand his business; how if he should run us on the rocks?" He goes up and says to the pilot: "Here is a very peculiar current and there are headlands, now be very careful. I think I had better help you in this charge." "No," says the pilot; "I will take all the charge of this vessel, or I will take none." We put our confidence in God. We say, "O! Lord, take possession of our heart, our life. We will trust Thee for the future." We get nervous and say: "We are going on this religious rock and that rock, this misfortune and that misfortune." God will take entire charge, or He will take none.

"Only trust Him, only trust Him, just now."

IV. Again: I have during the past year tried, as I shall try this year, to preach

A GOSPEL OF COMFORT.

During this past year how many of my flock have been touched, and during my pastorate of nearly thirteen years there is hardly a family in my congregation but has been sorely touched. Where is Father Voorhees? Where is Father Griffin? Where are those grand old men, those glorious Christian women who used to worship with us? Why, they went away into the next world so gradually that they had concluded the second stanza or the third stanza in Heaven before you knew they were gone. They had on the crown before you thought they had dropped the staff of the earthly pilgrimage.

And then the dear children. O! how many have gone out of this church. You could not keep them. You folded them in your arms and said: "O! God, I cannot, I cannot give them up. Take all else, take my property, take my reputation, but let me keep this treasure. Lord God, I cannot bear this."

O! if we could all die together, if we could keep all the sheep and the lambs of the family folded together until some bright spring day, the birds achant and the waters aglitter, and then we could all together hear the voice of the good Shepherd and hand in hand pass through the flood. No, no, no, no! O! if we only had notice that we are all to depart together, and we could say to our families: "The time has come. The Lord bids us away." And then we could take our little children to their beds, and straighten out their limbs, and say: "Now, sleep the last sleep. Good night, until it is good morning." And then we could go to our own couches and say: "Now, altogether we are ready to go. Our children are gone, now let us depart." No, no! It is one by one. It may be in the midnight. It may be in the winter and in the snow coming down twenty inches deep over our grave. It may be in the strange hotel, and our arm too weak to pull the bell for help. It may be so suddenly we have not time even to say good by. Death is a bitter, crushing, tremendous curse.

I play you three tunes on the Gospel harp of comfort. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." That is one. "All things work together for good to those who love God." That is the second. "And the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." That is the third.

V. Once more, I remark that I have during the past year tried, as I shall this coming year try, to present Jesus Christ as —the only escape from sin and darkness and death. I have tried to show that if a man is not born again he cannot get to Heaven. If the Bible is plain on anything, it is plain on that point. If there is anything about God, or Christ, or the judgment, or Heaven, or hell that I have not presented, I wish you would tell me that I might preach that truth. Believe and live. Refuse and die. That is the Gospel.

THE ONLY HOPE IN LIFE AND DEATH

I have tried as far as I could, by argument, by illustration, and by caricature to fill you with disgust with much of this modern religion which people are trying now to substitute for the religion of Jesus Christ and the religion of the apostles. I have tried to persuade you that the worst of all cant is the cant of scepticism, and instead of your apologizing for Christianity, it was high time that those who do not believe in Christianity should apologize to you; and I have tried to show that the biggest villains in the universe are those who would try to rob us of this Bible, and that the grandest mission of the Church of Jesus Christ is that of bringing souls to the Lord—a soul saving church.

There will be during this coming year, I suppose, 200,000 strangers in this church. The vast multitude of them perhaps we will meet only once. Will you by your prayer, and shall I by my exhortation, meet the case of any of these. How many will you save? A thousand? five hundred? one hundred? twenty? ten? one? or none? All other work seems stale and insipid compared with the work of soul-saving. Now the year is gone. If you have neglected your duty, if I have neglected my duty, it is neglected forever. Each year has its work. If the work is performed within the twelve months, it is done forever. If neglected, it is neglected forever. We cannot call that year 1881 back again.

When a woman was dying, she said, "Call them back." They did not know what she meant. She had been a disciple of the world. She said, "Oh, call them back!" They said, "Who do you want us to call back?" "Oh," she said, "call them back, the days, the months, the years I have wasted. Call them back!" But you cannot call them back; you cannot call a year back, or a month back, or a week back, or an hour back, or a second back. Gone once, it is gone forever.

When a great battle was raging, a messenger came up and said to the general, who was talking with an officer, "General, we have taken

A STANDARD FROM THE ENEMY."

The general kept right on conversing with his fellow-officer, and the messenger said again, "General, we have taken a standard from the enemy." Still the general kept right on, and the messenger lost his patience, not having his message seemingly appreciated, and said again, "General, we have taken a standard from the enemy." The general then looked at him and said, "Take another." Ah! forgetting the things that are behind, let us look to those that are before. Win another castle, take another standard, gain another victory.

Roll on, sweet day of the world's emancipation, when "the mountains and the hills shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the wood shall clap their hands, and instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier will come up the myrtle-tree, and it shall be unto the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that cannot be cut off."

"The song of love, now low now far,
Ere long shall swell from star to star;
That light, the breaking day which tips
The golden-spined apocalypse."

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 103.)

Corny and Hugh Report the Rising—Captain Vaughan and Sylph Alarmed—The Captain Investigates the Report—Flight from the Farm—The Captain Joins in the Affray—The Fight on the Banks—The Soldiers Retreat to the Market-Place—Sylph's Life Saved by Mr. Denzille.

WHEN we took up anew the story of Miles Rossiter's life, bringing it up to the present period, we parted from Sylph and Captain Vaughan, in the roseate atmosphere and dreamland of engaged lovers. Captain Vaughan's wound, though it rendered his left arm comparatively useless, was not painful, and was rapidly healing. He could sit and talk with Sylph, and revel in the music of her voice and the charm of her society. The blissful consummation of marriage was put off for a little, until the Captain's complete convalescence, and until the existing disturbances in Ireland having been quelled, there would be leisure from a soldier's pressing and incumbent call of duty.

The Captain and Sylph were speaking one day—and it was the Sabbath—about the desirableness of recovering the missing half of the letter of Sylph's long-dead mother, and of their surprise at the delay in its coming, when Corny Fagan, Sylph's serving man, with hair on end, and blanched cheek, and in wild excitement, burst unceremoniously into the room where they were sitting.

"Don't be angry with me Captain, jewel, nor you, Miss Sylph, alannah," he gasped out, "for comin' in upon yees in this way without as much as 'be yer leave,' for I have the awfulest news to tell yee. The whole country, north o'this, is up, and there's murder and pillage on all hands. A big, powerful priest—wan Father John Murphy be name—is headin' the rebels, and is sparing no wan. I'm tould he and all his men attacked Parson Burrows' house in Kilmuckridge this mornin', where the parson and most of his congregation had fled for refuge, and barrin' the women, massacred ev'ry mother's soul o' thim. Wan, luckily not in the house, who escaped, has run for miles here with the news. Before he left, looking from a little clump o' trees that helped to hide him, he saw the lawn in front o' the house covered with the dead and still bleeding bodies of piked men—wan o' thim, the parson's own son, only sixteen years of age, and there too—God help us—in the midst o' thim, weeping and tearing her hair, was poor Mrs. Burrows, with her niece and four childer. Oh! isn't it awful? He daren't show his face to help thim, he said. It wud ha' been at the cost of his own life. So he posted off here full speed, where some of his friends live, to rouse the whole neighborhood and git thim to haste fur the dear life into Enniscorthy."

Corny's intelligence was startling, but, was it true? Any doubt upon this matter was soon ended by the confirmation it received from Hugh, the Captain's orderly, who at this moment returned from his mission to Dunannon fort, and entered the room to report his arrival. On the road, as he drew near his journey's end, he declared that he had met several who were flying to Wexford—men, women, and children—and who had come from Ferns. They, too, had news of the cruel murders at Kilmuckridge, and could add to this an account of similar atrocities which had been effected elsewhere.

In addition to the murders, he was told the Protestant bishop's palace in Ferns had been sacked and burned. Father John had aimed at the lives of Dr. Cleaver, the bishop, and his wife, but, happily, warned in time, they had escaped his fury. The bishop's library, however, was all consumed—the vellum bindings of the grand folios having first been torn off them, to serve the rebels for covers to their saddles.

"It's a holy war in the eyes of the rebels," declared Hugh. "I am told for certain that on their way to Ferns they knelt, thousands on thousands o' thim, on the road, and that Father John, and a Father Michael Murphy, a namesake of his, said Mass, to inflame still more their zeal, and sanctify their murders.

"Captain," he added, "the whole crew o' them, screechin' like demons, are on their way, pell-mell, here. And, believe me there isn't a moment to lose, for the gettin' of yourself and Miss Sylph, and Mr. and Mrs. Somerville, and all the lot of us out o' this, and into Enniscorthy."

Captain Vaughan was conscious that he had no good reason to question the main substance of Corny and Hugh's intelligence—it was too well sustained by accumulated facts. Without doubt the hour of widespread insurrection had struck, initiated by wholesale horrors, and that to remain in a house isolated in the country would be to the last degree perilous.

To abandon a well-furnished house, however, and leave it a prey to marauders, was a serious matter, and he felt that before he could counsel Mr. Somerville to flight he must be absolutely sure that it was necessary. He, therefore, although against the remonstrances of Sylph, ordered his charger to be saddled, purposing to ride towards Ferns for direct news of what was occurring. Hugh accompanied his master, who kept his seat with difficulty, from weakness; and Sylph, with an anxious, beating heart, saw them both pass through the gate at the end of the lawn, and disappear upon the highway.

Before an hour passed they were back again. They had found the road for miles alive with fugitives, and the whole district wild with mad excitement. Every Protestant was hurrying with his family, and all the valuables he could carry, into Enniscorthy. "It would have been impossible," he said, "for either Corny or Hugh to exaggerate the danger. And, though it would be to sacrifice much, he feared there was nothing for it but to follow the example of their neighbors, and to hasten, as soon as possible, to the common rendezvous for safety.

"Hurry, Sylph, and you, Mrs. Somerville," he continued. "Pack up in the handiest form you can all that you consider necessary. Meantime, we of the male sex will get a vehicle ready for you, and will attend to some other needful matters. You know, ladies," he said cheerfully, "I am, as a soldier, used to this sort of thing; and with your permission, Mr. Somerville," he added, addressing his host, "I will take the command in our retreat, and in the previous measures connected with it."

"Certainly, Captain," was the response; "and regard me, if you please, as a zealous volunteer in your army."

In a few minutes Mrs. Somerville and Sylph were ready for departure, the latter having in her valise, among other things, her mother's half letter and her trinkets. The gentlemen, who had found the place deserted of all the Roman Catholic servants, with the help of one Protestant domestic and Corny and Hugh, buried in the ground behind the house, in a hole, rapidly dug, a few articles of value, not convenient to carry away; and then barricaded and bolted the windows and doors of the dwelling as securely as haste rendered possible. Mr. Somerville himself pulled to and locked the front door. Then all set off, he, and the Captain, and Hugh on horseback, forming an escort for the carriage driven by Corny, and which contained the two ladies and the servant-maid. Having reached the road, at the word of their appointed leader they placed themselves in due order, and with anxious hearts and sad forebodings hastened away, and speedily entered Enniscorthy. The town was crowded to excess, even the very streets were filled with panic-stricken fugitives, and of all ages; but a good Christian tradesman, well known to Sylph, managed to give her and her party a shelter on his premises.

It is neither our province nor intention to describe fully the desperate assault of the rebels upon the town, which took place next day, nor the brave resistance of its defenders—namely, of the North Cork Militia and some gentlemen and tradesmen volunteers, who were posted on the bridge over the river Slaney, and also of some yeomanry and other volunteers stationed at the back of the town, where the roads entered from the north and west,

From a window in the upper part of the house where she and her friend had found shelter Sylph witnessed a great part of the prolonged and sanguinary conflict. To look on was, indeed, to expose herself to great risk; but she could not bring herself to forego the unwonted spectacle, especially since Captain Vaughan, his blood up at the sound of battle, could not be persuaded, weak as he was, to remain in the house, and had gone out to join the loyalists and give his professional assistance. "Sylph," he said, "you cannot mean me to think only of myself in this dreadful crisis. Every man is wanted for the combat. True, I cannot fight with my wonted vigor, but I can cheer with my presence those who are in the battle; and, above all, as my head is all right, my experience of war will enable me to give our friends good counsel. Let us trust the Lord's goodness." Thus saying, he forced himself from her embrace, and followed by Hugh, hastened to the scene of conflict.

Sylph, with breathless interest, listened to the musketry of the rebel skirmishers swarming behind the garden walls outside the town and along the river bank, whom Father John had sent forward east and west, in two bodies, to drive in the militia and the yeomanry.

After a little, however, another sound caught her ear—the dull heavy trampling of hoofs, mingled with the loud shouts of men. It came from a herd of wild cattle, which, according to ancient Irish custom, the main body of Father John's army was driving before it, and goading into frenzy to make them rush upon the yeomanry line and force it back in disorder. On and on the great animals came, pricked by pikes behind and scared by the flashing of guns before. They tossed their heads madly in the air and bellowed forth their rage and agony and terror. The soldiers, outnumbered by twenty to one, and falling fast under the fire of the rebel sharpshooters, could not stand their ground, especially since the thatched houses on each side of the street, on the outskirts of the town, had been set in flames by the rebels. Pressed back by the plunging cattle, and assailed on three sides by a shower of bullets, the soldiers fell back upon the market-place, but stubbornly and slowly, literally retreating under an arch of fire. And here it was that Sylph first caught sight of the actual combat. Oh! the sight of infuriated men falling in death by the score, for the loyalists and soldiers poured in a destructive fire upon the rebel mass within ten paces of their guns, and soon the ground was covered with the slain and the dying.

Sylph, trembling with emotion, leaned forth from the upper window where she stood, irresistibly impelled to seek a good view of the dreadful spectacle, and her eyes riveted upon the unwonted sight before her, she did not observe that her own life was marked out for destruction. A rebel, armed with a long fowling-piece, a man of unerring aim as a Barony Forth duck shooter—of whom there were many in the rebel army—seeing her gloating as he supposed, over the slaughter of his comrades, with a curse upon his lips for the fearful heretic, levelled his piece to slay her. The weapon was steadied for its deadly deed, and the barrel was truly sighted, his finger was on the very trigger—another moment, and Sylph would have been numbered with the dead—and that in spite of Captain Vaughan, too—for, thrilled with horror, he had noticed the action of the rebel chieftain, and as he thought, the coming doom of his betrothed. But, in the merciful arrangements of God, her day of departure had not yet come. At the last instant the rebel chief wildly leaped into the air, and fell dead, pierced to the heart, and the long fowling piece, dropping from his hands to the ground harmlessly discharged itself in the air.

Sylph never knew it, but the strange fact is that in the providence of God—using a sinful man as the instrument of His goodness—her intending slayer fell beneath the hand of Mr. Denzille, under whose roof she had once lived, and who was the father of the youth who tried to force her to become his wife. In the fight, some distance from where Captain Vaughan stood, Mr. Denzille had also noticed the deadly purpose of the rebel, barbarously meaning to shoot a woman. Who the woman was the elder Denzille could not distinctly see, nor did he care to inquire, but to save her life was his instant endeavor. Skillful as the rebel's aim was, the old fire-eating duellist could more than match him. Never did human life escape his weapon; and so it proved that Sylph's intending slayer became himself the slain. And her lover, witnessing her miraculous escape, though not recognizing the agent of it—in the heat and fury of the battle still raging—raised to heaven the homage of a grateful soul that the dearest earthly object of his heart had been spared to him.

The battle had commenced at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and now, at two o'clock in the afternoon, it was not decided. Soon after this hour, however, Father John, seeing that his men could make no progress either at the bridge or at the market place, and that he was throwing brave lives uselessly away, called them back to the fields outside the town, prepared, however to try conclusions again at nightfall.

What a scene of woe they left behind them. Half the town was in flames; five hundred rebels lay upon the streets, dead or dying. Of the scanty garrison a third had been killed, and many more were wounded, and death had also reaped a dreadful harvest among the Protestant gentlemen and tradesmen who had given their services. "The prisons were crowded with desperate men whom there was no force to guard," and the Catholic inhabitants—their partisans—baffled and slaughtered—were furious. Outside the town was a fast increasing insurgent army "savage for revenge," and within it were hundreds of unfortunate refugees, young and old, rich and poor, gentle and simple, clergymen and laymen, magistrates, tradesmen and artisans, ladies and serving-women—"all now on a common level of misery."

(To be continued.)

CHRIST STILLING THE TEMPEST.

S.S. Lesson for March 5, Mark 4 : 35-41. Golden Text, Ps. 107 : 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It had been a long day's work. Jesus had been teaching in the house, and afterwards by the seashore, "and the same day when the even was come, He saith unto them, Let us pass over unto the other side. And when they had sent away the multitude, they took Him even as He was in the ship." It is not quite clear whether He had been all the previous night in prayer to God before that day of labor, or whether any time had intervened between the choosing of His disciples and His conversation with the scribes about the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost; in any case, we may well believe the Master was exhausted. This was not the weariness of an overstrained brain, for as the Father gave Him commandment even so He did (John 14 : 31); just the work of the day in the day. It was not the weariness of a digestion which stimulants, tobacco, or tonics, or sedentary habits had injured. There was no disease about the Lord's fatigue, the time for rest had come, and He fell asleep.

And so sound was His sleep, so undisturbed by fear or by nervous wakefulness, that when the wind began to rise and howl, He slept on; when the little bark was tossed like a nutshell, and even when the waves grew high and dashed in full force into the ship, wetting all the crew to the skin, the Sleeper did not wake. This was healthy sleep; well earned sleep; but it was soon to be broken. There were others in the ship who were not so calm as He was; their hearts beat with terror, a watery grave seemed to open beneath them, and every lurch of their little vessel threatened to capsize her. The disciples awoke Him. That sleep which no fury of the elements could interrupt, yielded at the first cry of His disciples for help, their need had a louder voice for Him than the howling tempest; so deeply Jesus loved His own.

In their cry of terror they made no appeal to Him, but only said, "Master, carest Thou not that we perish?" They wondered that He should be so insensible to their danger, and sought at least some sign of sympathy. "And He arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still." The deafening roar ceased in an instant, and the high waves sank to their normal level.

The disciples looked round; where was the storm? had they been dreaming? No, the ship was still full of water, everything within was saturated, but the vessel was becalmed, and the storm had yielded to its Ruler. "He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still." "Thou rulest the raging of the sea: when the waves thereof arise, Thou stillest them" (Ps. 89 : 9). Only when the cause of their terror was removed, He turned to His disciples and said, "Why are ye so fearful? How is it that ye have no faith?" They had been present when Jesus had turned the water into wine, they had witnessed many marvellous cases of healing, and yet they were far from believing that Jesus was able and willing to exercise His power at all times on their behalf. Instead of believing that He was the Son of God, they feared exceedingly, and instead of speaking to Him they said one to another, "What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey Him?"

God has never led us to expect a life of uninterrupted calm. The trial of our faith is more precious than of gold which perisheth (1 Pet. 1 : 7), and it is only when He hath tried us that we shall come forth as gold (Job 23 : 10). His fatherly eye alone can see the trial which His children individually need. Perhaps when the storm arose in the tent of Jacob, and raged with all its force against the young Joseph, he felt at first that there was no sorrow like unto his sorrow, but he stood the test and his faith was strengthened for the harder and fiercer storm when at Dothan his brethren sought his life; and finally sold him for a slave. The work of God was going on, he did not sink under it, and the witness remains to this day, "the Lord was with Joseph." Even when the heaviest trial fell upon him which an upright man can know on earth, when he, a child of God, lay under the imputation of grievous sin, and it seemed as though all things were against him, we see his faith did not fail, and in the midst of all, the Lord was with him. And when at the last, God brought forth His gold from the furnace, and His vessel was called unto honor, we may well believe that the infamous woman who had accused him was put to shame, and humbled in his presence, just as his brethren were later on; and the storms having served their purpose, there was a great calm.

God must try us, "If ye be without chastisement [or education] whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons" (Heb. 12 : 8). Now, as God has pledged Himself that with the temptation (or trial) He will make a way for us to escape, that we may be able to bear it (1 Cor. 10 : 13) fear becomes thorough unbelief. For instance: the head of a family is taken ill, his affairs are in a bad state, he is in fact insolvent. What is to be done? If he gives up his establishment, and sends his children to cheaper schools, if his daughters do the housework, and all which is possible is sold to pay the debts, the world will look down upon him as a man who has lost his position. The storm is severe, the winds of adversity seem to be trying faith and patience to the utmost; but they are not almighty, God has sent them for a purpose, and if His tried child takes them from His hand the trial will either be removed or cease to be a trial. That which He is aiming at is the entire conquest of His child's will, and the full exercise of His child's trust. It may be that He sees it needful that the position which he formerly held shall be renounced. He is measuring all things in the light of eternity, and He sees His child needs to learn by stern necessity the blessedness of God's deliverances. But Jesus, although while we look at the winds and the waves He appears to be asleep, yet is sensitive to the first cry of need: "He will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry; when He shall hear it, He shall answer thee" (Is. 30 : 19).

Another child of God has embarked in a large work of Christian usefulness, for the maintenance of orphans or the rescue of the lost; for a time all goes well, and while He is little in his own eyes he experiences wonderful tokens of God's favor and support; money flows in, souls are blest, and he is in the heyday of prosperity. But God will prove to himself and others what stuff he is made of, and whether he knows how to be abased as well as to be exalted, how to suffer much as well as to abound (Phil. 4 : 12). The donations fall off, strife and bitterness arise in his institution, perhaps also his character is maligned; the winds are strong, the waves beat upon his little ship, so frail now that the wind is boisterous, although it seemed so strong before the storm arose. What is it? is Jesus asleep? Alas! too often a Christian worker in such circumstances puts forth strong appeals to man for help, couched in such terms as to show that he is afraid, he redoubles his own efforts to maintain order in his institution, and seeks to vindicate himself from the charges brought against him. But doing thus, the Master's end is not attained, and He is forced to let the wind still blow, the waves still beat; that precious gold must be refined; perhaps sickness comes or bereavement. What does it all mean? It is the voice of God saying, "Let go, give up the reins to Me, reduce your work, give up this or that." "But then the poor girls, or the poor children?" you say. God loves them better than you do, and He will take care that they are well cared for and that every real prayer on their behalf shall be answered. Don't go on tugging at the ropes or handling the oars or bailing out the water; wake Jesus, put it into His hands, He will make the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still.

Another child of God is full of zeal, enjoys winning souls, has been much blest, and feels that they will perish if he does not work might and main to win them; he has gone beyond his measure, and is relying more than he knows upon his own efforts. The watchful eye of his heavenly Father detects it, and he is laid low with sickness, an overworked brain, loss of voice or something similar. It is easy to one who has been graduating in the school of God to read His purpose; but too often the dear earnest child of God, who is unconscious of the training to which he is being subjected, thinks only of the work, and gives himself credit for still greater devotion when he sedulously obeys the discipline imposed upon him by his doctors, in the hope of returning soon to his loved work. He will submit to any régime, travel any distance, if he can afford it; but the Lord has the worker as well as the work in His eye, and He is seeking to take a primary place in His child's heart and to exercise that child in implicit confidence in His wisdom. Very often in such cases the doctors, even dear conscientious Christian men, are baffled; the regimen which has succeeded in the restoration of men of the world, fails entirely when applied to one who is in the school of God; there is a lesson which must be learned, there is a conquest which God must make, before He can say to the wind and waves, "Peace, be still," and then that soul enters into a rest undreamed of before; then there is "a great calm," "the peace of God which passeth all understanding," and the power of it is felt in his subsequent work.

"Why are ye fearful; how is it that ye have no faith?" this is our Lord's question to us under all circumstances. We know that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose;" if so, how distrust His love and wisdom in anything which happens? "Not a sparrow falls to the ground without My Father," said our Lord, "and even the very hairs of your head are all numbered." How then be fearful? It is just when our eyes are off Him when we are awake and we let Him sleep on, when we are considering persons and things instead of "looking [off] unto Jesus" (Heb. 12 : 2), that we fall into fear. If we do practically commit into His hand everything as it arises, renouncing all will and choice, He cannot but undertake the steerage of our vessel, and exercise His control upon the winds and waves which toss us about. He asks but to be trusted and to be obeyed. O how foolish are we to have a care, when He careth for us; how sinful are we to fear when He has said, "Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art Mine. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee" (Isa. 43 : 1, 2).

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS
SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President has Sent to the Senate the correspondence between Mr. Blaine and Lord Granville, the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Lord Granville's replies to the instructions of Mr. Blaine are couched in courteous and respectful terms, and present the views of the British Government on the question of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in a forcible manner. Their tenor is that when the treaty was arranged the rapid development of the Western States was foreseen, and that Mr. Blaine's plea that such development changed the conditions of the question so materially as to demand the abrogation of the treaty is therefore not sustained. In arguing on the merits of the question Lord Granville contends that the whole world is concerned in the canal, and that the interests of every maritime nation, and especially of the nations contiguous to the canal, would be promoted by an agreement guaranteeing its neutrality. Mr. Frelinghuysen, who will have the advantage of approaching the subject untrammelled by the acerbities which were imported into the discussion at the outset, may possibly be able to remove the misapprehensions under which Lord Granville appears to labor as to the meaning and scope of the Monroe doctrine.

The Senate Passed the Anti-Polygamy Bill on Thursday, in the shape reported by the Judiciary Committee. Senator Sherman, though voting for the bill, expressed his fears that it would be inoperative, as would any measure depending for its success on the will of a majority of the people of Utah, and he predicted that in spite of the bill polygamists would still fill the legislature and the elective offices. Mr. Sherman stated his conviction that a remedy for existing evils could not be found except in the entire abolition of elective government and the temporary substitution of a government of commissioners with full executive powers. Senator Edmunds admitted that Senator Sherman was right in inferring that the bill would not accomplish all that was desirable, but said the committee had decided to try the mildest measures first.

The House of Representatives Finally Rejected the McCoid Apportionment Bill on Friday last. In its stead a bill was passed adhering to the old method of distribution of unassigned members, and fixing the number of the new House at 325. Under this arrangement Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont will lose one member each. One member each will be gained by Arkansas, Georgia, Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin; two each will be gained by California, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, and South Carolina; four will be gained by Kansas, and five by Texas. Thus the number of the House is increased by thirty-two, of which the South gains fifteen representatives, while the North gains twenty and loses three, making a net gain of seventeen. Should the bill in its present shape become law the electoral college will consist of 401 members, of which 153 will be chosen by the South, including West Virginia. Classifying the States according to their votes in 1880, the Democrats would gain seventeen electoral votes and the Republicans fifteen.

A Bill to Make Idiots is the Title Suggested by a prominent daily journal as appropriate for a legislative proposal introduced into Congress by a territorial delegate. The introducer calls it "A bill to reduce the internal revenue tax on cigarettes." The suggested change of title is accompanied by the following weighty remarks on the evil of cigarette smoking. "It would have been difficult to hit upon a more certain method of killing off a large portion of the rising generation and of making idiots of the one that is to follow it. The cigarette annually kills thousands and thousands of children and young men, and those whom it does not destroy physically it mentally ruins. The tax on it should be increased, not reduced. It would be well to place it so high as to put these poisonous packages beyond the reach of the small boy."

The Verdict of the Coroner's Jury in the case of the victims burned in the death-trap called the Potter building on January 31st, was rendered on February 15th. The jury said in its verdict: "We find that the fire originated from an overtaxed flue, which was improperly constructed and defective from age. We censure the owner of the building, O. B. Potter, his agents or employes, for neglecting to apply to the Department of Buildings for the proper permit for repairs or alterations, which would have caused an inspection of the premises by an officer of the department, and might have led to the discovery of the imperfections in question causing this disaster and the deplorable loss of life." The jury also deprecated the employment of the firemen by the Building Department in distributing notices, in which occupation one fourth of the force were engaged when the fire occurred. It is not surprising that the owner of the building should be censured, but the omission on his part which the jury assigns as ground for censure seems singularly inappropriate under the circumstances. The employment of the firemen, which the jury mildly deprecates, is a practice to which a much stronger word might be justly applied.

The Report that Mrs. Scoville had made an appeal to Mrs. Garfield on behalf of her brother, Guiteau, has occasioned a feeling of indignation in which disgust is largely mingled. Mrs. Scoville applied to the stricken widow asking her to intercede for mercy to the murderer of her husband. There was something singularly shameless in this intrusion on the sorrow of the desolated home. A moment's consideration ought to have convinced any friend of Guiteau's that his unseemly jokes during his trial and his boast after his sentence was pronounced that he had done a good deed in murdering the President, were such evidence of his lack of contrition as to shut him out from hope of mercy. Least of all would one who loved the murdered man and watched his eighty days of patient suffering be likely to commiserate the brutal wretch who caused the affliction. Mrs. Garfield protested against the outrage on her feelings, and very properly declined to interfere.

An Appalling Catastrophe Occurred at Chester, Pa., on Friday last. There had been a fire in the city the previous night, in which the military academy had been destroyed, and the firemen had only just returned to their homes when the alarm on the City Hall bell announced another conflagration. The city has no paid fire department, and it is customary for the more energetic of the inhabitants when an alarm is given to go to the aid of the volunteer firemen. The news quickly spread that the second alarm was caused by a fire in the old family mansion of the Porter family on the bank of the Delaware, which since Admiral Porter ceased to reside in it has been used as a firework manufactory. A large crowd assembled around the burning pile and watched with interest the ascent of rockets and stars, which as the fire reached them rose in the air and burst into beautiful designs. The firemen did their utmost to get the fire under control, and some of them climbed on to the roof of an extension of the building the more readily to throw an effective stream on the main block. In the upper room of the extension, right under the feet of these men, were stored about a hundred bombs, and directly the fire reached them the whole building seemed to lift bodily, a loud explosion was heard, and the roof was blown up. The spectators were thrown to the ground by the violence of the shock, and many of them were severely injured by the falling debris. The firemen on the roof were all killed, some of them were blown to the height of 140 feet, and their bodies descended into the burning ruin. Eighteen lives were instantly lost, and several spectators were so seriously hurt that their lives are despaired of.

The Sixteenth Annual Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the State of New York assembled at Auburn, N. Y., on February 16th. The following encouraging facts were contained in the report of the Executive Committee. There are now ninety-five associations in the State. Fourteen associations were formed during the year and five disbanded. Fifty-six general secretaries are employed. The nine association buildings in the State are valued at $672,000. Twelve other branches have buildings funds amounting to $133,000. Brooklyn has an offer of $100,000, on condition that $200,000 more be secured. Eighty associations report a membership of 15,068.

Bishop William M. Wightman, D.D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, died at Charleston, S. C., on Wednesday, February 15th. Dr. Wightman has been actively engaged in the work of the ministry for over fifty-five years, and his abilities and acquirements, as well as his energetic labors, have made his name widely known beyond the limits of his own denomination. As a preacher, an editor, a professor, and as a bishop, Dr. Wightman performed a varied succession of duties, and it was often remarked of him that, wherever he might be placed and whatever work he undertook, his thoroughness and conscientious faithfulness would be proved. Licensed to preach in 1827, he has ever since been prominently before the public, and his death at the ripe age of seventy-four is deeply mourned by a large circle of friends. He was elected to the bishopric in 1866.

A Fire which Broke out at Haverhill, Mass., on Friday night last completely destroyed the business portion of the town and consumed property worth two million dollars. The fire was first noticed a little before midnight, and is believed to have originated in an overheated stove in a manufactory on Washington Street. A strong northwest wind was blowing at the rate of thirty miles an hour, and the fire soon consumed the inside of the building. Then the walls fell outwards, blocking the street and setting fire to the surrounding buildings. A telegram says the Haverhill Fire Department fought the flames manfully, but in less than an hour it became apparent that outside help must be secured. Dispatches were sent to six towns in the vicinity, and met with prompt responses. The fire burned two squares from Wingate Street to the river, including the principal business thoroughfare of the city. The efforts of the firemen failed to check the flames, and wooden, stone, and brick structures rapidly fell before its resistless march. It was not until noon on Saturday, when little was left to feed the flames, that they were finally brought under control. It was then found that seventy-three blocks were destroyed. About 2500 persons are thrown out of employment at a season of the year when they are least able to bear the loss of wages. Three hundred firms and business men were burned out. One fireman was killed, and as several persons are missing it is feared that other lives must have been sacrificed.

The Venerable Peter Cooper, of New York, whose philanthropic efforts for the elevation of the masses are well known throughout the Union, celebrated his ninety-first birthday on February 12th. In conversation with a reporter who congratulated him, Mr. Cooper referred to some of the guiding principles to which he attributed his success in life. Among other weighty observations were the following remarks on the burden of debt, which are worthy the attention of all, especially of young men. Mr. Cooper said: "When I was twenty-one years old my employer offered to build me a shop and set me up in business, but as I always had a horror of being burdened with debt, and having no capital of my own, I declined his kind offer. He himself became a bankrupt. I have made it a rule to pay everything as I go. If, in the course of business, anything is due from me to any one, and the money is not called for, I make it my business on the last Saturday before Christmas to take it to his business place."

Letters Received at Northampton, Mass., from the Chinese students recently recalled from America state that the boys are placed in confinement at Shanghai and so ill-treated as to excite the indignation of resident foreigners and missionaries. The primary cause of this treatment was the adverse reports of the Chinese officials in this country, which were aggravated by the avarice of subordinate officers in Shanghai, who sought their own personal gain at the boys' expense, and in one case ran off with their money. The boys would be glad to return to America. One of them writes "I wish I could return to dear philanthropic New England, where teachers are better than mothers, where friends are better than sisters, and classmates more agreeable than brothers." It is, however, some relief to learn that the report circulated of one of them having been beheaded because he had formed an attachment to an American young lady is contradicted.

A Murder and Suicide which Startled the citizens of Grafton, N. Y., on Friday, February 3d, give a warning very much needed by a large class in society. Many years ago two sisters were married respectively to Adam Loux and William Jacobs, who settled at Grafton, near Troy, N. Y. A guilty passion sprang up between William Jacobs and Mrs. Loux and was concealed for some time from their respective partners. It was, however, discovered recently by Adam Loux, but he was averse to instituting legal proceedings, and his wife expressing no contrition for her sin he left his home. Last year Mrs. Jacobs died and then Mrs. Loux entreated the widowed man to leave his family and elope with her. Wicked as he was, he loved his children, of whom he had six, and could not bear to leave them. His friends, however, say that he was so infatuated with his sister-in-law that her temptation and the struggle in his mind between that and his natural affection unsettled his reason. On Friday he visited the woman, and in a fit of frenzy killed her and then shot himself. The thought of those two souls appearing thus before God is too appalling to be realized. There is a growing tendency to disregard the sanctity of the marriage bond, by people who, if they are deaf to the voice of God and the Bible, may well be solemnized by this awful crime which is the outcome of such sins (James I : 15).

An American Traveller's Life was Saved last spring by the possession of a token of friendship. It appears that Mr. E. A. Small, a Chicago lawyer, and his son, were travelling in the East last year when Mr. Small, Jr., was taken ill with typhoid fever. The party were at that time on board the Vesta, a steamer of the Austrian Lloyds' line. The captain and officers of the steamer were much alarmed, believing the illness to be typhus fever of a contagious type. They were so apprehensive that they notified Mr. Small that they should be compelled to put his son ashore at Athens. All appeals and protests were in vain, and Mr. Small felt that to put his son ashore at the place indicated, where care and medical skill could not be obtained, was equivalent to sacrificing his life, and took his stand at the door of his sick boy's room, declaring they must overpower him by force before they could remove his son in that condition from the ship. This would have soon been done had not Mr. Small recollected that he had in his possession a friendly letter from General Grant. This letter, on the suggestion of an English friend, was exhibited to the captain. The letter had a remarkable effect; the captain had a profound reverence for the successful general, and with many bows and apologies declared that the friends of General Grant should at any risk be accommodated. The party remained on board, and the invalid recovered. Proof of a friendship with a famous man was thus of vital service in a time of need. So in the dread time of need that closes the life of all men neither wealth, influence, nor all that is generally held precious, will avail like the possession of the assurance Jesus gives (John 15 : 15).

A Significant Trophy is in the Possession of a gentleman at Elmira, N. Y., who received it a few days ago from a friend in the West. It consists of two pairs of interlocked deer horns so firmly joined that considerable force must be employed even to stir them. It is supposed the two animals became engaged in a fight, and getting their horns inextricably locked together, starved to death. The fate of these two stags reminds us of cases lawyers often describe, in which a dispute over the possession of an estate has been so obstinately contested that the law costs have absorbed the whole, and neither plaintiff nor defendant has been benefited. Many a suitor who has thus contended for property not for a principle has afterward regretted he did not obey the divine precept (Matt. 5 : 40.)

A Long and Futile Journey to Procure liquor was taken recently in Arkansas. The crusade against the liquor traffic has been waged so persistently and successfully that in many localities no liquor can now be purchased in a circuit many miles in extent. This result has been accomplished in great part by the persistent determination of women in various localities that the law should be enforced which forbids the sale of liquor outside of towns within three miles of a place of education. They started petitions, crowded into the court-rooms and eventually beat the dealers. Arkansas papers publish details of the temperance movement, lists of the places where the sale of liquor has been stopped, and amusing instances of the confusion and dismay caused among habitual drinkers. An Osceola official walked all the way to Hearn's Landing and waited there an hour for the steamboat, expecting to get what he wanted at her bar. But the barkeeper, having in mind the applicant's official position, suspected that it was a device to ensnare him, and refused to supply him, and he had to return to his home without the desired stimulant.

A Challenge Accepted.—The Cincinnati Gazette, having been challenged by a liquor dealer for asserting that three fourths of the crime in that city is attributable to liquor, has made a careful investigation, and finds from the public records that it fell short in its charge, as 1938 of 2376 crimes committed in the last three months of 1881, or 81 per cent, were caused by liquor.

A Sick Mare Showed Remarkable Intelligence at Lancaster, Pa., a few days ago. She belonged to Mr. B. J. McGrann and was very valuable. She was stabled at night as usual, but during the night was attacked by colic. She kicked open the stable door, broke her halter, and made her way to the house of Mr. Reilly, her groom. Here she stamped and pawed at the porch until Mr. Reilly got up to see what was the matter. His practised eye at once told him the mare was suffering from colic. He hastened to a veterinary surgeon, and Dr. Tracy was soon in attendance, but too late to be of any service. He said the mare must die, and soon afterward she was dead. She had once or twice before suffered greatly from colic and had been cured, and there is little doubt she broke out of the stable that night and called at Mr. Reilly's hoping to obtain the relief he had procured for her before. Awakened sinners and Christians who are in trouble might follow with advantage the example of this poor dumb creature. If they would give up trying to help themselves and go to the great Helper, relief and salvation would be certain (Matt. 11 : 28).

GREAT SPOIL.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I rejoice at thy word, as one that findeth great spoil."—Psalm 119 : 162.

A Mixed Emotion—A Soldierly Verse—An Expression of Intense Joy—What Arouses the Believer's Joy—I. The Fact that there is a Word of God—A Revealing of God—A Guide of Life—A Sure Pledge of Mercy—God's Side of Conversation—An Instrument of Usefulness—II. The Battle to Obtain a Grasp of It—The Sure Way to Learn a Doctrine—The Root of Dogmatic Teaching—T and P Marks for Bibles—Ministerial Pumice-Stones—III. Peaceful Possession—Spoil Sometimes Found, not Fought for—Who Did Fight for It—IV. Scripture a Spoil—The End of Uncertainty—Weakening of the Adversary—In its Division a Sense of Victory—Gives Profit, Pleasure, and Honor—A Prophecy of Rest.

IN the preceding verse David had avowed his reverence for God's word in the following language: "My heart standeth in awe of thy word." It is clear that holy awe is perfectly consistent with intense delight. Fear seems to stand far apart from joy, and yet in the experience of the child of God they are next of kin. We are familiar with combinations such as this: "They returned from the sepulchre with fear and great joy." "Happy is the man that feareth always." "Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling." These two emotions are like two notes which are widely different apart, but yet sound harmoniously together; the one is far down and the other is high up in the scale, but they melt into one with sweet accord in the experience of God's people. It is a blessed thing both to reverence the word and to have an intense joy in it. May we all know what the mixed emotion means.

The more we think of the Scriptures, the greater will be our delight in them if we see that they relate to us. "Thy word is very pure: therefore Thy servant loveth it." If they become to us the infallible voice of truth, that pure light which never misleads, that metal which is entirely free from alloy, then will our joy in Holy Writ overflow as we read in it the mind and will of our Father in heaven; and then shall we borrow the language of the Psalmist, saying first, "My heart standeth in awe of Thy word," and next, "I rejoice at Thy word, as one that findeth great spoil."

Observe, dear friends, concerning this joy of David in the word which he revered, that he expresses it with a martial figure. My text is quite a soldierly verse: "I rejoice at Thy word, as one that findeth great spoil." It is a figure taken from men of war, who after they have overcome their enemy divide the plunder among them. This expression is most natural as coming from David. David had been a soldier from his youth up, and he knew personally and literally what it was to divide the spoil; hence he did not go far to find his metaphor, but plucked it from the garden of his own life.

How I like to hear men both in prayer and praise speak like themselves! I notice that if a sailor has been converted to God, he can in cool blood utter proper sentences, such as one might borrow from collects and forms of prayer; but if his soul grows warm within him, he ceases to speak according to the books, and begins to pray like an "ancient mariner." When he breaks through the bonds of restraint and gets quite free, he takes you among the rolling billows, and many of his expressions have a salt spray upon them, possibly also a suspicion of yarn and pitch. You soon find that you have fallen in with a shipmate whose soul has done business on the great waters. So must it be with the soldier; if cold, dead propriety rules him you will not know whether he is a soldier or a citizen; but let him grow enthusiastic, let his very heart speak out, and his speech betrayeth him; wars and rumors of wars are in his utterances; he sings and prays to martial music. Hence I like to hear David saying that his heart rejoices at God's word as one that findeth great spoil, for it is his own manner of speech, and sounds fitly from a warrior.

Having thus prefaced my discourse I come to look into this joy of David over God's word, which he compares to the joy of a warrior when he finds great spoil. To such overflowing joy we are not strangers; we feel quite at home with the text.

I. Let me first observe that this great joy is sometimes aroused by the fact that

THERE IS A WORD OF GOD.

This is true if we regard the Scriptures as a revealing of God. After going up and down in the world searching after deity it is a great delight to come upon a book in which the one only living and true God has unveiled Himself to those who care to behold Him. It is a great "find" for a man to discover that after all he is not left in a fog to grope his way, but that God has kindled a sun that honest hearts may walk in the light of it, and in that light see all things clearly. I say that a revelation of God is a great discovery, over which a man rejoices "as one that findeth great spoil."

For, dear friends, there can be no revealing of God except by God Himself. The apostle Paul tells us very truly that the things of a man knoweth no man, but the spirit of a man that is in him. You cannot read a man until that man brings out somewhat from within, and thus reveals himself. A man must speak, or act, or we cannot know his mind. The chief means of a man's revealing himself is by his word; language is the gate of the soul. If the man be true and honest, his word will be a window through which you may see his mind. Even so, saith the apostle, as the heart of a man is only known to the man himself, so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God.

Nor does our valuation of Holy Scripture depend upon this one view of it, for we also prize it as

THE GUIDE OF OUR LIFE.

Often we come to positions in which we know not which way to take. It is a great discomfort to have to be questioning, questioning, and for ever questioning. To hear within the soul the inquiries, "How?" "What?" "Which?" "When?" and to be confused by dubious voices is a great affliction; suspense is killing. How delightful to turn over the sacred page and find therein a guidance like that of the Urim and Thummim of old. This book tells us the right and bids us follow it; it teaches us the way of wisdom, and the path of understanding, and supplies motives for walking therein.

Submitting ourselves to the Spirit of God we hear Him speak in this volume and say, "This is the way, walk ye in it." As a bewildered wanderer in a wood hails the light in a cottage window, hoping there to find a guide to set him his homeward path, so do we hail the light of holy writ which shineth in a dark place. As the mariner prizes his chart and compass, so do we welcome the law of the Lord. Tossed on the changing sea of life our eye is gladdened by the clear ray of this pole-star of heaven, the fixed light of God.

More than this, if you think of it, dear friends, a word from God apprehended in the soul is a sure pledge of mercy. Consider what words those words of God are; how full of love, and grace, and tenderness. I will not stay to quote the exceeding great and precious promises, for they are, I hope, your daily food. You know what great things the Lord has spoken concerning you. But here is a thought worth pondering—these promises are backed by the word of God; nay, they are each one the word of God. When a man has given his word, if he be an upright, honorable man, there is an end to further question; he has pledged his word, and that is enough. Now the Lord hath given to His people His word, His honorable word that cannot be broken, which must stand fast for ever and ever.

Happy are those who are willing to take God at His word, and accept His promise as the equivalent for the thing promised; for what the Lord hath promised He will surely perform. When a man grasps a promise of forgiveness, of acceptance in prayer, of sanctifying grace, of daily providence, of divine anointing, of comfort in death or of eternal glory, he may well rejoice "as one that findeth great spoil." Within the word of promise there lieth the blessing itself; the word is to the apprehension of faith the substance of the thing hoped for. That which is guaranteed by God—that cannot lie—is already ours. Well may he rejoice that findeth it.

Notice still further, that Holy Scripture, when it comes to us with power as the word of God, is the beginning of communion with God. It will strike you in a moment that when the Lord speaks to a man communion has in a measure begun. It may be that God speaketh to a deaf ear, but even then it sheweth great goodness and condescension on God's part that He should speak to men at all, and especially to those who refuse to hear Him; but oh, if you actually hear the voice of God in His word, if it sinks into your soul by the accompanying power of the Holy Ghost, what remaineth then but for you to answer the Lord, and to let Him speak again?

This Bible talks: "When thou awakest, it shall talk with thee." This is God's side of a heavenly conversation, which ought to be kept up throughout all the days of our pilgrimage. God saith this and that in the word, and we in prayer, in faith, in holy action reply to Him; and then He speaks again, and we again answer Him. When you are alone, and wish to have communion with God, you probably begin with prayer. Do so. But sometimes you feel that you cannot pray. Very well; do not try. Say, "I desire to converse with God, and if I cannot speak I will hear Him speak." Get down the Bible; read a Psalm, or some portion of Holy Writ, and after God has thus spoken to you the conversation has begun. God's words will suggest heart-words with which you can speak to the Most High. If it does not do so, read again, till at last within your spirit there is communion with the Eternal One.

Personally I can sometimes realize my text in a peculiar sense, when the word of God becomes to me the instrument of usefulness. How often do I look around me anxiously for the next theme of discourse! My mind inquires, What shall I preach to the people? What shall be my message? Wherewith shall I feed my church? This is a trying question after twenty-eight years preaching to one congregation. At last a passage comes home to my soul with power. I have found it. What joys fills the preacher's heart! No warrior was ever gladder when he heaped up the mountains of prey.

You meet with a person who is anxious; you want to say the right word to him, and therefore you look all around prayerfully, until a text suggests itself, which proves to be the exact word for the person whose good you are seeking. Have you not felt great joy in handling such a passage as the instrument of usefulness? Have you not been ready to cry, like the old Greek philosopher, "I have found it; I have found it?" Have you not wanted to be off to tell it not only to the one person you are anxious about, but to fifty thousand more? Ah, yes, you have rejoiced as one that findeth great spoil.

II. Secondly, let us remark that frequently the joy of the believer in the word arises out of his BATTLE TO OBTAIN A GRASP OF IT.

Read the text again: "I rejoice at Thy word, as one that findeth great spoil." Covered with sweat, begrimed with dust, bleeding from many a wound, wearied and faint, the fighting man has smitten the enemy, and now he staggers forward to seize his portion of the prey, finding new strength in the joy of victory. Did you ever have to do that with God's word, for I have had to do so many times, and I will try to describe the battling as I know it. "O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength."

We have had to fight over certain doctrines before we could really come at them. Learning doctrines out of books, or merely learning them as matters of catechism, is never enough. Such teaching is all very useful and helpful, but the sure way to learn a doctrine is to have it burned into your soul as with a hot iron. "Oh," they say of me, "that man speaks so dogmatically." I cannot help it. Why should I speak with bated breath when I feel absolutely certain of what I say? If I were not certain I would hold my tongue until I was. I could not dare to come here to talk of matters which may or may not be true; I dare not thus waste your time and thought.

I have not only found the doctrines of the Gospel in God's word, but I have tested and tried them in my own experience, and they have been so powerfully operative upon my own soul that I must speak as I find. To me the things I preach are as assured as my existence; in fact they are a part of my existence, since they are my life, my hope, my joy, and strength. I am positive in speech because I am assured in mind. Nor can I see the gain which would accrue from the opposite style of speech. Of what avail is this cloudy doubt? Unless a man speaks up to the best of his knowledge and belief, most positively, who is likely to believe him? Wise men will bid the speaker make up his own mind before he can hope to influence other minds.

I have no doubt about the existence of a God. Have you? If you have, do not set up to be a minister for God by any manner of means. I have no doubt about the mediatorial power of His precious blood. Have you? If you have, do not pretend to be a Christian teacher, for your whole weight will be on the wrong side. Faith receives more stabs from waverers than from avowed sceptics. Sowers of doubt are no friends to the Gospel, for men are saved by faith, but nobody was ever saved by unbelief. "We know and have believed the love which God hath towards us." "I believed, therefore have I spoken."

But how do we get to this assurance? Why, by fighting our way to it. A doctrine of God's word comes before us; our heart exclaims, "Yes, this seems to be the teaching of Scripture, and therefore I must believe it." But carnal reason rebels, and conjures up a phalanx of difficulties, while our proud human nature revolts from a truth which is so little to its taste. These things have to be battled with. Faith has to bring all the faculties of the child of God upon their knees, and to say to them, "Be quiet; listen while God speaks; let God be true and every man a liar, and every faculty in the man a liar too, sooner than God be distrusted."

What a fight there is sometimes over a promise. Have you never entered into such a contest? O gracious promise, most suitable to my case! How it would comfort my soul! But may I appropriate it? The devil says, "Certainly not." He pushes us back from it. Our feeble hope assures us that it is too good to be true to us. A thousand doubtful suggestions assail us, till at last the soul, by a desperate effort, seizes the portion and holds it against all comers.

It is a good thing to mark your Bibles when you have received a promise.

MARK THE MARGIN WITH T AND P, and let it stand for "tried and proved." Mark the passage which the Lord fulfils to you with some private seal, bearing witness to its truth. David set his own hand to the margin in many places; as, for instance, when he exhorted us to wait on the Lord, and then added, "Wait, I say, on the Lord." May that which is written with ink in the Bible be written with grace in our hearts. May the public promise become a private promise to each one of us by the living experience of our own soul.

Sometimes the hardest fight is round a precept. God has bidden us do this and that, but carnal ease cries, "Let the precept alone," and love of self says, "That command is too humbling; pass it by." But oh, when you can battle with yourself and win the victory till your heart cries, "I will delight myself in Thy commandments, which I have loved," then your rejoicing will be great indeed! What a joy to conquer yourself! What bliss to master your surroundings, and all the peculiarities of your disposition and temperament, so as to come to love the selfsame precept which a little while ago was irksome. How the believer loves the law when he has fought down his rebellious will, vanquished his obstinacy, crushed his pride, fettered his levity, and yielded himself wholly to the word of the Lord. Holy Spirit, vouchsafe us this joy!

A sharp warfare often goes on over the threatenings. I have had many a wrestling match over them. A voice whispers in my ear, "That threatening of God is too severe; that sentence of Scripture is too harsh." Certain of my brethren carry a bit of pumice stone with them, and rub down the rough texts. Whenever they find God speaking in wrathful indignation against sinners, they meet His terrors with a "larger hope." Things that are revealed belong to me, but things that are not revealed seem to belong to them. They have many learned ways of softening down disagreeable truth.

It is hazardous to take the soul out of texts of Scripture, and to attempt to give them souls of our own invention. Let us learn God's meaning, and then become friends with it. Grow accustomed to the terrible texts till like Daniel you feel safe even in the lions' den. The doctrine of eternal punishment is no longer difficult of belief to me since I am confident that it is taught in the Scriptures; the difficulties of it are for God to solve, and there I leave them, being well assured that in some way or other all that He does will be consistent with His justice and His love. Not without a battle does one consent unto the darker side of sacred writ, but that once fought there is rest.

Yet, once more, this is true about the word which reveals Christ. We know not Christ aright till we are conformed to what we know of Him. If Christ be lovely we shall not understand that loveliness till we are in a measure lovely ourselves. The pure in heart see the pure and holy God because every man sees what he is. When the lady said to Mr. Turner, "Sir, I have seen that spot many times, but I never saw that which you have pictured." "No, ma'am," he replied, "I dare say you have not; but don't you wish you could?" Just so, the artist's eye sees what another eye cannot, and the pure in heart see in God what nobody else can see, because they are like to God.

III. We shall now tarry a moment upon a third thought, which is altogether different from that which has gone before. At times the joy of the believer lies in enjoying God's word

WITHOUT ANY FIGHTING AT ALL.

In the text I am not sure that fighting is certainly mentioned or necessarily implied, though it is highly probable. David says, "I rejoice at Thy word, as one that findeth great spoil," as if he fell upon it all on a sudden, like the lepers at the gate of Samaria, who to their surprise found all the way they traversed covered with garments, and gold and silver vessels. They had not lifted a finger in war, yet they found great spoil; like the man in the parable who, when he was ploughing, found a treasure hid in the field. He had never looked for it, but he had great joy in discovering it. In infinite mercy the Lord makes His word open up before His people when they are not seeking it, according to the promise, "I am found of them that sought me not." Have you never experienced what this means, and have you not rejoiced as one that suddenly finds a spoil?

This spoil, however, must have cost somebody else most dear, though it has cost us nothing. If we did not fight for it somebody else fought for it once. Ah, what a fight was that! Let Gethsemane and Calvary tell. What joy there is in seizing the spoil which Jesus has left us as the result of His life's warfare! We have not trodden the wine-press, but yet we drink the wine. The blessing is free to us, but it cost Him groans and tears, and bloody sweat, and death. "This is David's spoil." Look down and see the mark of the victor's feet! See you not where the nails went in? The Crucified One has been here and smitten all our adversaries, and left this spoil for us poor creatures to divide among ourselves.

What a joy there is in our heart when we recollect what foes our Lord overcame to gain for us all this spoil; sin has been routed, death has been slain, and hell has been stripped of its prey; our direst enemies are broken in pieces, and the crown of their head is crushed by Him who is the seed of the woman, the Messiah of God.

HOW SCRIPTURE IS A SPOIL.

IV. My fourth head is the principal one, and I want all your attention while I dwell on it for a short time. There is a joy arising out of the very fact that Holy Scripture may be considered to be a spoil. I will show you that in five particulars.

First, a spoil is the end of the uncertainty. Whenever a fight begins it is questionable who will win; while it rages the result still hangs quivering in the balances; but we know who has won the battle when the victor begins to divide the spoil. No question now remains; the debate is ended. Blessed is that man who has found in Scripture a spoil in the sense that he has come to the end of uncertainty, and arrived at something like certitude. All men that think crave after certainty, and gradually settle down to one standard or another.

I have heard of two brothers, equally honest and thoughtful men, who commenced life at the same point, but parted in their search after a foundation firm and strong. One of them at last gravitated to the Church of Rome, for he thought he discovered certainty in an historical church, and in one at the head of it whose utterances are regarded as infallible. I do not envy him his ideal certainty; it seems to me to be a mass of fraud, a great historical imposture. The other brother found his resting-place in his own reason, or in the fact that he could not be sure of anything. There is a certainty in being certain that you are not certain of anything; but certainly it is not a certainty which would afford comfort to me; for my reason would be to me a sorry guide for eternal things, since even in every-day concerns it has misled me. We must find certainty somewhere, or believe that we have found it, or else we shall be of all men most miserable.

If a man has no standard of infallibility outside, he tries to find it in himself, and becomes his own pope; and depend upon it a pope in England is as likely to err as a pope in Rome. I would not give twopence for the two of you, and if I threw myself in it would not add an extra farthing to the value. When a man has in experience fought up to confidence in the word of the Lord, or has had it effectually laid home by the Holy Spirit to his own soul, then he reaches so far as he is concerned; he is dividing the spoil, for he says, "We have known and believed the love which God hath toward us."

THE END OF THE CONTROVERSY

Of course, people come round and say, "You are mistaken." Our answer is, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. It may not be certainty to you, but it is to me." If a man should assert, "Oh, that medicine is all quackery," he has a right to speak his mind; but his decision is not final. Not so," cries another, "I have been ill half a dozen times, and on each occasion I have speedily recovered through its use; call it quackery if you like, it is no quackery to me, at any rate, for I am certain about its good effects." So is it when a man has at last, by the application of the Spirit of God, felt the power of God's word over his soul, he says, "I am not going to fight that battle over again. I am sure of the truth of that Scripture." Such a man is restful about that matter.

The next idea that comes out of the figure of spoil is this. It is the weakening of the adversary for any future attacks; for when they divide the spoil they say to one another, "The invaders will be here again, no doubt, before long; but they will not have this great gun to turn upon us; we have spiked it. Their stock of ammunition will be somewhat diminished by the capture of their magazine, and they will not have this huge chest of gold with which to purchase more martial store; for we have taken it from them. We have weakened the adversary. Have we not entered their strongholds? They may again take up arms; but their force is broken." Every doubt a man conquers by resting on the infallible word has weakened the power of unbelief within him, and strengthened his faith.

Next, in dividing the spoil, there is always a sense of victory, and so there is in believing God's word. In getting firm hold upon the faithful testimony of our God, we achieve a conquest over doubts, fears, disquietudes, and all our proud judgments of God. There is a sense of conquest when we overcome our passions and propensities, and do the Lord's bidding according to His precepts and statutes. When that which at one time was difficult, if not impossible, becomes easy and delightful, then we wave the palm-branch over a defeated enemy. When the mind is brought into subjection to all and every revealed truth, then have we done more than if we had taken a strong city. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." May we have more of it, and go from strength to strength, doing valiantly in the name of the Lord.

Again, in dividing the spoil there is profit, pleasure, and honor. I am not about to justify the deeds of war, for these I hate; as to plunder and rapine, such as have been indulged in by the general run of conquerors, they are detestable crimes. Men have made themselves worse than devils to men. No calamities have ever befallen nations that are so much to be deplored as the atrocities of war. I use the warlike metaphor, but condemn the fact. Men conceive when they divide the spoil that there is honor in it. Look at the crowds that gathered along the Via Sacra when the Roman conquerors came down from the Appian Way, passed under the arch, and marched toward the Capitol. Then did the populace crowd the house roofs, and the chimney tops, that they might see a Scipio or a Cæsar expose his captives and display his spoils. Thus men judge of plunder in war.

See how Napoleon thought to glorify himself by placing in Paris the works of art which he had taken from the capitals of Europe. What are most trophies but stolen goods, or that which is purchased by them? But when you and I lay hold on Holy Scripture then have we grasped a prey more precious than royal treasures, a prey which we may hold with justice and honor. When we can say that the things which God has revealed are ours, then we are rich beyond a miser's dream; and when we can hold them against all comers, then that which we believe becomes our honor and gives glory to us, and glory to faith, and chief glory to Him who wrought our faith in us by His almighty Spirit.

Last of all, the spoil is

A PROPHECY OF REST,

and so is that delightful dividing up of the word of God, and the appropriation thereof by faith. "Ah," said the Romans when they spoiled old Carthage, "we shall never see another Hannibal at our gates, nor dread the ships of Carthage on our seas." They had overcome their most potent adversary when they utterly spoiled her, and then they looked for a long period of peace. And that is the joy of receiving the word. When we can believe that Jesus took our sins, and suffered for them on the tree, we are no more troubled as to the guilt of sin. When we believe that our heavenly Father overrules all things for the good of His people, then sorrow and sighing, fear and fretting, flee away. Well may he rest who sees even evil made to work his good. When we believe that Jesus died and rose again from the dead, then the fear of death which haunts so many receives its mortal wound. Knowing the meaning of the word, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live," the dread of death has no more dominion over us.

The appropriation of the divine promise, as the soldier appropriates his share of the booty, is to us the prophecy that the war is over. We may rest now, and be quiet. And oh, what joy, what blessedness is this! How I would that all those who are here present were believers, first in Jesus the great incarnate word, and then in this book, the written word; and that you did not only believe these things to be true, but took them to yourselves as warriors take the spoil. Happy and blessed would you be, and your rejoicing this day would be as the joy of harvest, or as the shouting of them that divide the spoil. God grant it may be so, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON
—Psalm 119: 145-168.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

John Bunyan in Bedford Jail.

Entombed Colliers at Prayer.

ENTOMBED COLLIERIES AT PRAYER.

(See Illustration.)

THE terrible mining disaster at the Grove shaft of the Midlothian coal pit on February 3d recalls to the memory a very similar calamity which occurred in the Rhondda Valley, Wales, on December 10th, 1880, in which 102 men lost their lives:

On the fatal morning the whole neighborhood for miles around was startled by a most terrific report, which echoed and re-echoed through the mountains, and was distinctly heard four miles distant. The whole country was astir, and thousands of workmen who had been awakened from their beds by the concussion were soon hurrying to the scene of the disaster, many carrying a lighted Davy lamp to guide them through the darkness of the night. The roads were also thronged with women whose relatives, either husbands or sons, had an hour or two before descended the shaft.

Preparations were immediately made for the purpose of penetrating, if possible, through the mass of debris lying at the bottom. At five o'clock two men, named T. W. Evans, and D. Davies volunteered to descend in a bucket attached to a wire rope. They went down 400 yards, when they came to an immense heap of boarding which had fallen from the top of the shaft and put a stop to their further progress. It was calculated that the heap was twenty yards in depth, but they shouted to any who might be alive below, and in a few seconds heard a faint response from the bottom of the shaft.

Meantime the most intense anxiety was evinced by the thousands waiting on the surface, for the return of the two explorers. The aspect of the vast throng, as they stood in the dark night on the sloping declivity above the shaft, those in front trying vainly by the light of their lamps to peer into the blackness below, was awfully imposing. As the returned bucket approached the surface, the most painful still prevailed, and when the two men stepped out and reported that voices had been heard in reply to their shouts, a sigh of relief and hope escaped from the multitude.

Another noble band of men then volunteered to go below. They, too, heard a responsive cry to their shouts, and instantly commenced cutting through the heap of broken timber and stones. By nine o'clock they reached the bottom, and made their way in the direction from which they had heard the shouts. Gropping in the darkness they found four men, who were alive, but in a semi-delirious condition. These four, Morris, Rees, Maroney, and Jenkins, were assisted to the top of the wreckage, and were brought to the surface. It is impossible to describe the exciting scene on the pit bank as the wives and children of the rescued men recognized father and husband. To them it appeared verily as a return from the valley of the shadow of death, and their expressions of thankfulness were most affecting.

In the meantime another band of explorers had descended the upcast shaft, three-quarters of a mile distant, and the scene they witnessed by the pale glimmer of their lamps baffles all description. Sixteen dead bodies were discovered in a kneeling position, death having come to them all while they were engaged in prayer. One body, that of a lampman named Lloyd, was found also in the attitude of prayer, one of his arms encircling a young lad, as though to protect him from harm. The bodies, fearfully burned, were taken to the surface at once, but some of them were almost unrecognizable. The majority of the victims were found lying in the stalls where they were working. The pit in which the catastrophe occurred is situated near Penygraig. It is 450 yards in depth.

Rees, one of the men rescued gave the following account of the disaster: "Thomas Morris, David Jenkins, and myself were working together. David Maroney had just hitched the tram at our stall, and gone to the horse's head, when all at once we heard a loud report. We lost our lights, and felt something like little pins going through us. I thought of running away, and called upon the others to come to the parting, because if we could get to the water we should be better off. When we got out got out to the airway we felt a choking sensation, and I ripped off a piece of my shirt-sleeve and held it to my mouth. When we reached the sump-pit, a little pit about five yards deep, we recovered a little from the shock, and as there was a cold air we began to get cold. I told Maroney to stay there, and said I would go back to look for our clothes. Where we left the clothes there was also a box of tools, but when I got back the box was gone to pieces. However, I found the clothes and our water-can. These I took with me, as we felt thirsty, and we all had a drop. At the spot I named near the water we remained huddled together, as it was so cold, when we heard men on the fall, and Evan Jenkins and Thomas and another man came down to us. They placed a plank across the water, and we got over and climbed the brattice with them for 15 or 20 yards, and so were saved."

A Christian gentleman resident in the locality said: "I am very thankful to say that a very large majority of those who died were good men; but there were some awful characters who went to their last destination, leaving behind a sure testimony of what their reward must be. I have been in some few of the homes of the people, and there was one wail going up; little children and great strong men weeping as they walked about the streets, and the scene at the pit bank quite indescribable. Such wringing of hands, such groans, as one after another was brought to bank. The most of them could not be identified but for their clothes or some trinket they wore; and when any one was known a murmur went all round like a wail.

"I have heard of two backsliders from God, who were brought to decision by the Salvation Army (one in Porth and the other at another station), who were always coming to our meetings at Trealow, but always said, when asked to come back, 'Not to-night.'"

A TRUST AND WHAT IT LED TO.

(See Illustration.)

MR. WILLIAM WESTON and his neighbor Mr. Trevelyan had long been on terms of friendship, and the former one evening called upon his friend to request him to be his executor. "I have had some warnings in the form of increasing weakness," said Mr. Weston, "that I am getting near to my journey's end, and now I want you to accept this little gift, and promise me that you'll attend to my request if spared." So saying, Mr. Weston handed to his neighbor a small bag of gold, adding the courteous remark that he hoped Mrs. Trevelyan, who was present, would consider the gift a mark of respect for her also.

"But it's very sad to hear you talk like that, about giving up the ghost," said Mr. Trevelyan. "I can't think how you can speak of it in that cheerful way." "Why should I not look forward to the change calmly and happily?" said Mr. Weston. "Death is solemn, but I am ready for it. Eternity is awful, but it has no terrors for me. He who inhabiteth eternity is my friend; the conqueror of death is my Saviour, and the future is lighted up with the glory of His presence."

Mr. Trevelyan, though not without many excellencies as a neighbor and a man of business, had hitherto bestowed but little thought on the concerns of his soul, but as he listened to Mr. Weston he could not help contrasting the happy assurance and confidence of that gentleman with what he knew his own state of mind would be in the prospect of death. He became alarmed at the thought that, with all his prudence and worldly wisdom, he had lived for half a century without giving the greatest of all questions any serious consideration. His neighbor who now proposed to entrust him with the management of his affairs had often spoken to him about "the one thing needful," but he had generally dismissed the subject with the remark: "You see, Mr. Weston, you have a religious turn of mind. It's all very well, and I've nothing to say against it, but, really, I've got other things to think about just now, but I mean to attend to it soon."

Mr. Weston's presentiments turned out to be well founded. In a few weeks it became evident that his end was at hand. A chronic disease long latent in his system assumed an acute form and his physician warned him that he must die. He, therefore, sent for his executor, and in a few solemn words made one final appeal to him. "I have not the least doubt," said the dying man, "that you will act faithfully in the management of all I have left in your charge; but, my friend, he who has not, as a guilty sinner, fled to Christ as his Saviour, robs God, and there is no kind of dishonesty which in the sight of heaven is worse than that. Recollect that he who robs God robs himself of all that is most lasting and most precious. The interests of the creature and the glory of the Creator are so bound together that no power can separate them." Soon after these words were uttered, the final crisis came, and without a single groan or struggle, the spirit of the earnest Christian calmly passed away.

But the influence he had exerted on the mind of his neighbor did not pass away. The thought of being dishonest toward the great God appalled him, and he knew no rest until the Deliverer of his departed friend became his Deliverer, and he, too, was enabled to look forward to an eternity of happiness through the same all-sufficient atonement. One verse set him at liberty. He had been dwelling upon the last words of his friend about sin as robbery of God until his sense of guilt became well nigh intolerable. While in that state of mind, he happened to hear a street-preacher sing the verse:

"The dying thief rejoiced to see
That Fountain in his day,
And there may I though vile as he Wash all my sins away."

The precious thought that sin's dishonesty as well as its malignity and deep-dyed rebellion had been atoned for, dawned upon him and he realized that even in respect of all his robbery of God there was no condemnation in Christ Jesus. His doubts were dispelled, his fears given to the winds, and his soul filled with "joy unspeakable and full of glory."

The gold he had received from his friend he divided among three poor families as a thank-offering for that crowning mercy of his life—a new heart and a right spirit; nor did he fail to tell them of that heavenly wisdom of which it is declared that, "The merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her."—Prov. 3: 14, 15.

"I want you to accept this little gift."

ANECDOTES.

Related at the Meetings Held in Scotland by Messrs. Moody and Sankey.

A Ministerial Bon-vivant.—At a Prayer meeting on January 13th, on behalf of the intemperate, the Rev. Dr. Adamson referred to an incident that occurred recently at one of the meetings in the Corn Exchange, Edinburgh. He said: "I was called to speak to a young gentleman of good social position, who was considerably under the influence of drink; and after talking a few minutes to him regarding his soul, I asked him to give himself to Christ. 'I cannot yield to Him to-night,' he answered, 'I must have another drink before I go to bed.' I said, 'Why cannot you give up the drink, and take Jesus as your Saviour at the same time?' He rejoined, 'You take a drink yourself, don't you?' 'No,' I replied, 'I have not touched it for forty years.' He then referred me to a minister in the city who, he said, took it, and I told him 'I have nothing to do with that minister.' I added, 'I know very well he takes it; but you would not want him to speak to you if you were on your deathbed?' 'No,' he said, 'certainly not; for I have seen too much of him at table.' I narrate this circumstance as a warning to those ministers who have not yet given up the use of intoxicants."

Sitting at the Golden Gate.—At the Children's service in the Free Church Assembly Hall, Edinburgh, on January 14th, the Rev. J. G. Cunningham said: "Johnny Stewart died on the 27th of May, 1879. He said to his father, shortly before his death, 'It is thirteen weeks, I think, since

I had on my clothes.' 'Yes,' said his father; 'it is a long while, but you have a robe laid up for you in heaven.' 'Yes,' answered Johnny; 'Jesus will give me a robe, a crown, a harp, and a mansion, for He said, 'I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go to prepare a place for you I will come again and receive you to Myself.' Then they sang him the hymn, 'There is a happy land far, far away.' 'Oh, no,' he said, 'not far away from me.' And the last words he said were, 'I am sitting at the gate of the new Jerusalem waiting to receive the crown and the harp,' and with his dying breath he sang the praises of the Lamb."

A Grand Sight.—At the Prayer Meeting on January 16th, the Rev. A. Keay said: "I have been at a good many after-meetings, both here and elsewhere, but I don't think I was ever at an after-meeting like that for the men held in the Free St. John's Church, High Street, last night. The floor of the sanctuary was literally filled. Two classes had been invited: those who had got blessing at the meetings, and those who were anxious to get blessing. Mr. Moody asked in the most solemn way those who had got good in the meetings to give their testimony to that fact by rising, and more than a hundred rose. Some of them were gray-haired men, others were young men; a number of them were little boys. The little boys were as decided as any of them. These young converts were then asked to come forward to a space cleared for them near the pulpit and kneel down that they might be prayed for. Their courage was quite equal to that also, and they nobly confessed Christ."

Taking his Stand.—"I Spoke to Another young man in the same meeting, and he told me that he was the third brother who had been brought to the Lord within a short time of their father's death. Their father's death had been the means of awakening them, and last night, after a conversation, I said to this young man, 'Now, will you take your stand for Christ to-night?' and, bringing down his foot, he said, 'I will take my stand to-night.'"

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 110.)

Dead to the World.

THERE was only one house Felicity visited voluntarily. A distant cousin of hers had married a country clergyman, whose parish was about thirty miles from London, in the flat, green meadows of Essex. The Pascals had children the same age as Felix and Hilda; and when they engaged a tutor for their own boys and girls they proposed to Felicity that her children should join them. In Mr. Pascal's quiet country parsonage were to be met some of the clearest and deepest thinkers of the day, who escaped from the conventionalities of London society to the simple and pleasant freedom they found there. Mr. Pascal himself was a leading spirit among them, with an intellect and a heart large and broad enough to find companionship in every human being who crossed his path. There was no pleasure in life to Felicity equal to going down for a few days' rest to this country parsonage.

That she was still mourning bitterly for the husband, whose name could never be mentioned to her, all the world believed. It made those who loved her most feel very tenderly toward her. Though she never put on a widow's garb, she always wore black dresses. The jewels Roland had bought for her in profusion lay in their cases, and never saw the light. She could not bring herself to look at them; for she understood better now the temptation that had assailed and conquered him. She knew that it was for her chiefly, to gratify an ambition cherished on her account, that he had fallen into crime.

"I worship my mother still," said Felix one day to Phebe, "but I feel more and more awe of her every day. What is it that separates her from us? It would be different if my father had not died."

"Yes, it would have been different," answered Phebe, thinking of how terrible a change it must have made in their young lives if Roland Sefton had not died. She, too, understood better what his crime had been, and how the world regarded it; and she thanked God in her secret soul that Roland was dead, and his wife and children saved from sharing his punishment. It had all been for the best, sad as it was at the time. Madame also was comforted, though she had not forgotten her son. It was the will of God; it was God who had called him, as He would call her some day. There was no bitterness in her grief, and she did not perplex her soul with brooding over the impenetrable mystery of death.

In an hospital at Lucerne a peasant had been lying ill for many weeks of a brain fever, which left him so absolutely helpless that it was impossible to turn him out into the streets on his recovery from the fever, as he had no home or friends to go to. When his mind seemed clear enough to give some account of himself, he was incoherent and bewildered in the few statements he made. He did not answer to his own name, Jean Merle; and he appeared incapable of understanding even a simple question. That his brain had been, perhaps, permanently affected by the fever was highly probable.

When at length the authorities of the hospital were obliged to discharge him, a purse was made up for him, containing enough money to keep him in his own station for the next three months.

By this time Jean Merle was no longer confused and unintelligible when he opened his lips, but he very rarely uttered a word beyond what was absolutely necessary. He appeared to the physicians attending him to be bent on recollecting something that had occurred in the past before his brain gave way. His face was always pre-occupied and moody, and scarcely any sound would catch his ear and make him lift up his head. There must be mania somewhere, but it could not be discovered.

"Have you any plans for the future, Merle?" he was asked the day he was discharged as cured.

"Yes, Monsieur," he replied; "I am a wood-carver by trade."

"And where are you going to now?" was the next question.

"I must go to Engelberg," answered Merle, with a shudder.

"Ah! to Monsieur Nicodemus; then," said the doctor, "you must be a good hand at your work to please him, my good fellow."

"I am a good hand," replied Merle.

The valley of Engelberg lies high, and is little more than a cleft in the huge mass of mountains; a narrow gap where storms gather, and bring themselves into a focus. In the summer thunder-clouds draw together, and fill up the whole valley, while rain falls in torrents, and the streams war and rage along their stony channels. But when Jean Merle returned to it in March, after four months' absence, the valley was covered with snow stretching up to the summits of the mountains around it, save only where the rocks were precipitous.

He had come back to Engelberg because there was the grave of the friendless man who bore his former name. It had a fascination for him, this grave, where he was supposed to be at rest. The handsome granite cross, bearing only the name of Roland Sefton and the date of his death, attracted him, and held him by an irresistible spell. At first, in the strange weakness of his mind, he could hardly believe but that he was dead, and this inexplicable second life as Jean Merle was an illusion. It would not have amazed him if he had been invisible and inaudible to those about him. That which filled him with astonishment and terror was the fact that the people took him to be what he said he was, a Swiss peasant, and a wood carver.

He had no difficulty in getting work as soon as he had done a piece as a specimen of his skill. Monsieur Nicodemus recognized a delicate and cultivated hand, and a faithful delineator of nature. As he acquired more skill with steady practice he surpassed the master's most dexterous helper, and bid fair to rival Monsieur Nicodemus himself. But Jean Merle had no ambition; there was no desire to make himself known, or put his productions forward. He was content with receiving liberal wages, such as the master, with the generosity of a true artist, paid to him. But for the unflagging care he expended upon his work, his fellow-craftsmen would have thought him indifferent to it.

For nine months in the year Jean Merle remained in Engelberg, giving himself no holiday, no leisure, no breathing time. He lived on the poorest fare, and in the meanest lodging. His clothing was often little better than rags. His wages brought him no relaxation from toil, or delivered him from self-chosen wretchedness. Silent and morose, he lived apart from all his fellows, who regarded him as a half-witted miser.

When the summer season brought flights of foreign tourists, Merle disappeared, and was seen no more till autumn. Nobody knew whither he went, but it was believed he acted as a guide to some of the highest and most perilous of the Alps. When he came back to his work at the end of the season, his blackened and swarthy face, from which the skin had peeled, and his hands wounded and torn as if from scaling jagged cliffs, bore testimony to these conjectures.

He never entered the church when mass was performed, or any congregation assembled; but at rare intervals he might be seen kneeling on the steps before the high altar, his shaggy head bent down, and his frame shaken with repressed sobs which no one could hear. The curé had tried to win his confidence, but had failed. Jean Merle was a heretic.

When he was spoken to he would speak, but he never addressed himself to any one. He was not a native-born Swiss, and he did not seek naturalization, or claim any right in the canton. He did not seek permission to marry or to build a house, but as he was skilful and industrious and thrifty, a man in the prime of life, the commune left him alone.

He seemed to have taken it as a self-imposed task that he should have the charge of the granite cross, erected over the man whose death he had witnessed. He was recognized in Engelberg as the man who had spent the last hours with the buried Englishman, but no suspicion attached to him. So careful was he of the monument that it was generally rumored he received a sum of money yearly for keeping it in order. No doubt the friends of the rich Englishman, who had erected so handsome a stone to his memory, made it worth the man's while to attend to it.

Besides this grave, which he could not keep himself from haunting, Engelberg attracted him by its double association with Felicita. Here he had seen her for the first and for the last time. There was no other spot in the world, except the home he had lost forever, so full of memories of her. He could live over again every instant of each interview with her, with all the happy interval that lay between them. The rest of his life was steeped in shadow; the earlier years before he knew Felicita were pale and dim; the time since he lost her was unreal and empty, like a confused dream.

After a while a dull despondency succeeded to the acute misery of his first winter and summer. His second fraud had been terribly successful; in a certain measure he was duped by it himself. All the world believed him to be dead, and he lived as a shadow among shadows. The wild and solitary ice-peaks he sometimes scaled seemed to him the unsubstantial phantasmagoria of a troubled sleep. He wondered with a dull amazement if the crevasses which yawned before him would swallow him up, or the shuddering violence of an avalanche bury him beneath it. His life had been as a tale that is told, even to its last word, death.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 111.)

The Seven Years' Covenant—The Parties—The Napoleonic Prince and the Jews—The Last Week Cut off—The Time—Views of the Ancient Fathers—Archbishop Cyprian—Irenæus—Hippolytus, Bishop of Ostia—Origen—Appollinaris.

FIFTH WONDER.

(TAKING place seven years and two and a half months before the Battle of Armageddon, and descent of Christ upon Mount Olivet, and the commencement of the Millennium.)†

It will indeed be a wonder to behold the children of Israel, who have for many centuries been downtrodden and treated as outcasts among the nations, again flocking to their fatherland, and their nationality recognized by the European powers, whose governments in past ages have so grievously oppressed them. Yet, according to various Scripture predictions, this astonishing spectacle must ere long be witnessed.

And in connection with their national restoration there is to be a covenant for a week of seven years made between many of them and a certain "Prince that shall come" about seven years and seventy-five days before the consummation or end of this age, according to Daniel's prophecy of seventy weeks (9 : 27), so that when the covenant is made we shall know for certain that only seven years and seventy-five days remain before the descent of Christ on Mount Olivet to terminate this dispensation and to commence the Millennium (Rev. 19, 20).

"The Prince that shall come," who is described in the prophecy of the seventy weeks as making or confirming the covenant for seven years with the Jews, is further predicted in that prophecy to cause their sacrifices to cease "in the midst of the week" of seven years, and then "for the overspreading of abominations to make it desolate even until the consummation." This is justly understood by expositors to show that he is the same individual as the little horn or king of fierce countenance who is predicted in Daniel 8 to "take away the daily sacrifice," and to substitute for it "the transgression of desolation," and finally "to stand up against the Prince of Princes." In fact the prophecy of Daniel 9 was stated by the Angel Gabriel to be only a fuller explanation of "the vision" in Daniel 8 (see Daniel 9 : 23), and therefore relates to the acts of one and the same Antichrist. This little horn is further described in Daniel 7 and Revelation 13 and 17 as ultimately becoming supreme over the ten horns or ten kings of the symbolic wild beast or Roman Empire, and wearing out the saints for three and a half years, and then perishing at Christ's descent.

This "Prince that shall come," or little horn, who will eventually become the Great Antichrist and the last head of the Roman Empire, must be a Napoleon, who will, before the final three and a half years, completely re-establish over Europe the Napoleon dynasty as the wild beast's seventh and last political headship healed of its deadly Waterloo wound. Therefore a Napoleon will make a seven years' covenant with the Jews.

Apparently he must rise from his primary littleness as a horn or sovereign, to considerable power

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders," By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, $1.

† The seven years is the period mentioned in Dan. 9 : 27, as reaching from the covenant to the consummation, and the extra two and a half months is the seventy-five additional days mentioned in Dan. 12 : 12, where 1335 days are mentioned—being 75 days more than the 1260 days, or later three and a half years of the seven years described in Dan. 12 : 7.

in the region of Syria and Judea before he can be in a position of sufficient influence to make this covenant.

The covenant is further mentioned no less than five times in Daniel 11 : 22, 23, 28, 30, 32, where a long history of this last great Antichrist is given under the title of the Vile Person or King who shall do according to his own will (verses 21, 36). This covenant is also mentioned in Isaiah 28 : 18 ; 33 : 8 ; Psalm 55 : 20. In the two latter passages Antichrist's breaking of his covenant, which is to take place in the midst of the seven years, is referred to.

The notable prophecy of the seventy weeks of years is in Daniel 9 : 24 to 27, and it is in its last paragraph regarding the final seventieth week that the prediction of Napoleon's coming covenant with the Jews is found.

In explanation of these

SEVENTY WEEKS OF YEARS,

or 490 years, which they are universally understood to mean in their year-day fulfilment, it has generally been admitted by expositors that the first seven and sixty-two weeks, or altogether sixty-nine weeks, amounting in fact to 483 years, were fulfilled before the first coming of Christ, and that they began with the going forth of a decree in Artaxerxes' reign, and reached unto Messiah the Prince's public presentation to Israel either by His public ministry or by His riding on an ass into Jerusalem as its predicted King (Zech. 9 : 9 ; Matt. 21 : 9). Thus were fulfilled the words, "from the going forth of the commandment (or decree in Artaxerxes' reign) to restore and build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks (i.e., sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years) . . . and after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off (or in the Hebrew, be made a covenant), but not for himself (or as the Hebraist Dr. Tregelles translates it, but there shall be nothing for him)."

After this it is said in the twenty-sixth verse, "And the people (the Romans) of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a flood ; and unto the end of the war desolations are determined." Here is described the well-known destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, about forty years after Christ's ascension ; and the Romans its destroyers are called "the people of the prince that shall come," that is, the people of a coming future latter-day Roman Prince, who is here mentioned for the first time, and concerning whom it is immediately added, "And he shall confirm a covenant for many for one week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease even until the consummation," etc.

Hence it is manifest that some future Roman prince "that shall come," is the person who shall confirm a covenant with the Jews for seven years ; and that such covenant could not have been made before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, because, in the regular order of the prophecy, it is detailed as taking place after that destruction, and moreover is described as occurring seven years before the consummation or end of this dispensation.*

Hitherto, there has never been any record in history of such a covenant having been made, and in any case it would have to be followed by the abolition of the restored sacrifices in the midst of the week of seven years, and by the consummation at their termination. It is manifest, then, that it has yet to be made. And "the Prince that shall come" who shall confirm it, although only a little horn, or comparatively little sovereign at that commencing period of his career, will become the Great Antichrist and head of the whole Roman Empire by the midst of the seven years.

There are altogether more than one hundred expositors or anonymous expositions which maintain this view, that Daniel's seventieth week is the final seven years of this dispensation just before the descent of Christ and battle of Armageddon and Millennium, and that the latter half of the seven years will be the three and a half years of the Antichrist's desolations. Among these hundred writers are Archbishop Cyprian, and five bishops—Irenæus, Hippolytus, Victorinus, Apollinaris, and Primasius—Fathers of the Early Church, in which this interpretation of the seventieth week appears to have been quite prevalent.

Archbishop Cyprian, in his "Computus de Pascha," explained this seventieth week in Daniel 9 : 27, as follows : "This is one week which the angel has divided off from the seventy weeks, and placed it at the latest period of this dispensation. And this hebdomad or week we recognize as containing seven years, in which Enoch and Elias are to come. And in the midst of the week, he says, the sacrifice and oblation shall be taken away. But half of the week is shown to be a time, times, and half a time, which is three years and six months ; which become a thousand, two hundred, and threescore days, according to the Apocalypse,* in which days that Antichrist shall commit great devastation, and will begin to sit in the temple of God, and to assert himself to the ignorant to be God ; whom Jesus, our Lord and Saviour, must destroy by the spirit of His mouth and by the brightness of His coming,† and bring the world to its consummation, as it is written, 'even unto the consummation, and that determined, shall be poured upon the desolate.'"

Irenæus, who was a bishop in the primitive church, and a disciple of Polycarp, who was a companion of the Apostle John, wrote in A.D. 180 a work "against the heresies." He considered the worship of Antichrist and his image in the Jewish temple just before the Second Advent, to be the threatened abomination of desolation, and expected Daniel's 70th week to be fulfilled by Antichrist, of whom he says, "Putting away idols to persuade man that he is God, he will set himself up as a sole idol, combining in himself the manifold errors of all the idols. He will sit in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. In the temple of Jerusalem the adversary will sit, striving to show himself to be the Christ : as also the Lord says (Matt. 24 : 15), 'When ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place,' etc. . . . They shall believe, it says, in the False one (the Man of Sin, 2 Thess. 2 : 12), that all may be condemned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness.

"His coming John thus describes in the Apocalypse, 'The Beast which I saw was like unto a leopard,' etc. (Rev. 13). And afterwards of his armor-bearer, whom he calls also 'the false prophet,' 'He spake,' it says, 'like a dragon, and he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him,' etc. (Rev. 13 : 12 ; 19 : 20.) This is said that all may know his miracles to be done not by divine power, but by magic art ; and no wonder, if having demons and apostate spirits to help him, he through them performs miracles by which he deceives those that dwell on the earth. He will also command them to make an image to the Beast. (Cap. 28.)

"At the half of the hebdomad (or week) Daniel saith, the sacrifice and the libation shall be taken away, and in the temple shall be the abomination of desolation and until the consummation of the time, a consummation shall be appointed upon the desolation—but the half of the hebdomad is three years and six months. (Irenæus adver. Heres. ch. 25.) (Daniel 9 : 27.)

"And when this Antichrist shall have laid waste all things in the world, reigning three years and six months, and sitting in the temple of Jerusalem ; then the Lord shall come from heaven in clouds, in the glory of the Father : and casting him and those that obey him into the lake of fire, will bring about to the just the times of the kingdom ; that is, the rest, even the seventh day made holy. And He will restore to Abraham the promise of the inheritance ; in which kingdom, saith the Lord, many shall come from the East and from the West, and shall sit down with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob." (Cap. 30.)

Hippolytus, Bishop of Ostia (A.D. 220), considered 69 of Daniel's 70 weeks to end with the first coming of Christ, and that then, after the Gospel had been universally preached, Antichrist's abomination of desolation would be set up during the last half week of the 70th week, which would terminate with Christ's Second Advent upon the earth. The following are extracts from his works : "When the sixty-two weeks have been fulfilled, and Christ has come, and the Gospel has been preached in every place, and the times have run out, there will remain one week—the last in which Enoch and Elias will come. And in the midst of that week there will appear the abomination of desolation, even Antichrist, who announces desolation to the world.

"And this the prophets Enoch and Elias will declare, saying, Believe not the coming enemy ; for he is an adversary and destroyer, and son of perdition, he will deceive you and bring you to ruin. But the sword shall smite them. And the dragon, it says (Rev. 12), beheld, and he persecuted the woman that brought forth the man-child. And there were given her the two wings of that great eagle, that she should flee to the desert, where she is nourished for a time, times and a half a time, from the face of the serpent. These are the 1260 days, even the half-week during which the tyrant will rule, persecuting the Church as she flees from city to city. . . . Blessed they who will then conquer the tyrant, they will take rank above former martyrs as more exalted and more glorious. With what praises and crowns will they not be adorned by Jesus Christ our King.

"The six thousand years must needs be fulfilled that the Sabbath may come—even the Rest, that holy day on which God rested from all His works. The Sabbath then is a type and image of the future kingdom of the saints when they shall reign with Christ after His coming down from heaven, as John declares in the Apocalypse. For a day of the Lord is as a thousand years."

The Celebrated Origen (A.D. 225) explained Dan. 9 : 27 to be fulfilled by

THE FUTURE ANTICHRIST,

as will be seen from the last paragraph of the following extract from his works : "Through the assistance of his father, the devil, that wicked one will perform miracles, and signs, and wonders for a lie. For as wonders were wrought by magicians, through the help of those demons who seduced man into wickedness, so this man will receive from the devil himself power to do yet greater wonders to deceive the human race. And concerning this Antichrist, Paul speaks of him as the Man of Sin : 'We beseech you, brethren, by the coming of the Lord,' etc., 2 Thess. 2.

"But there is in Daniel a prophecy about this same Antichrist which cannot but excite the admiration of any one who will read it with common sense and candor. For there, in words truly divine and prophetic, are described the kingdoms that were to come, beginning from the time of Daniel, down to the destruction of the world. And this prophecy may be read of all men. Now see if Antichrist is not spoken of there also in these words : 'In the end of their kingdom, when their transgressions are filled up, there shall rise a king impudent of face, and understanding problems,' etc. (Dan. 7 and 8 : 23).

"And that which I have already quoted from the words of Paul, that he will sit in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God—even this also is said by Daniel, and in this manner : 'In the temple shall be the abomination of desolations ; and until the end of the time shall a consummation be given against the desolation' (quoting from the Septuagint of Dan. 9 : 27).

Appollinaris, Bishop of Laodicea (A.D. 380), as quoted by Jerome on Dan. 9, explained Daniel's 70th week to be awaiting its fulfilment at the end of this age in the time of Antichrist, whose three and a half years' persecution will synchronize with its latter half, and whose statue, then set up in the Jewish temple, will be the abomination of desolation.

(To be continued.)

* Neither Christ nor His disciples ever made any seven years' covenant with the Jews. And if they had they certainly would not afterwards have faithlessly broken it.

* St. Cyprian here evidently refers to Revelation, i.e., Apocalypse 11 : 3, and 12 : 6, 14, and Dan. 7 : 25 ; 12 : 7, where Antichrist's three and a half years, or latter half of the seventieth week, is described.

† St. Cyprian is here quoting 2 Thess. 2.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Struggle between Austria and the Insurgents in Herzegovina, Bosnia, and Dalmatia, is continued with vigor. The insurgents are worsted in every encounter, but they retreat to inaccessible fastnesses in the mountains, whither the Austrian soldiers cannot follow them, and from whence they descend at moments that seem to them opportune to renew the conflict. Very little is known here or in England of the causes of the trouble, but it is stated by travellers who visited the disturbed districts last summer, that signs of disaffection might then be observed among the people. They were hostile to Austrian rule, and were so galled and harassed by continued acts of petty tyranny that a very slight cause would incite them to revolt. The spark that started the conflagration appears to have been the determination on the part of Austria to enforce a conscription. The Slavs appear to have thought that if they were forced to become soldiers and fight, they might as well fight against Austria, whom they hate, as for her against other nations.

The Relations of Russia on the one Hand, and Austria and Germany on the other, have been disturbed by the struggle in the agitated provinces. Russia's sympathy with the Slavs is one of long standing, and it is probable that a war on their behalf would be intensely popular with the Russian people. A public avowal of this sympathy was recently made by the Russian General, Skobeloff, who, in an address to some Servian students, declared that a struggle between the Slavs and the Teutons was inevitable, and that it would be long, sanguinary, and terrible, but that the Slavs would triumph. General Skobeloff concluded as follows: "If any one attempts to molest States recognized by treaties, thank Heaven you will not be alone." It is reported that fifteen Russian officers have applied for, and readily obtained, a year's leave of absence and have joined the insurgents. This aid to the enemies of Austria on the part of Russia has not escaped notice, and Bismarck has sent an intimation to the Czar that Germany and Russia must be regarded as allies in this question. Meanwhile Russia is cultivating friendship with France, and had Gambetta remained in office it is not improbable that an anti-German alliance between France and Russia would have been formed.

Conflicting Accounts Continue to Arrive in reference to the outrages on the Jews of Russia. The London Times says it understands that the reports of the British consuls in regard to the outrages do not show that any cases of outrage upon women have been clearly proved. The evidence is clear regarding other serious outrages. On the other hand the correspondents of that journal and the Daily Telegraph reiterate their statements as to the brutalities they reported. The correspondent of the latter journal vouches "for the truth of the statement that at Elizbethgrad, Kieff, Odessa, Niezjin, Peczaer, Kona, and Prioslav over two hundred and fifty women were outraged by Jew baiters during the disturbances. At Kieff General Dreutel, when appealed to for protection, said it was not worth while risking the soldiers' lives. At Odessa petroleum was poured on a man's head and set on fire, and the man died in agony. Subsequently many children were mercilessly killed." The accounts also given by the fugitive Jews who have arrived in America confirm the latter statements, and there appears to be no reason to suspect collusion.

The Significant Remarks of Mr. Gladstone in reference to the Irish demand for home rule have caused so much agitation that he has found it necessary to define his position on the subject. In a speech delivered in the House of Commons on February 17th Mr. Gladstone said he considered that the decentralization of Parliament should be a cardinal rule of policy; that local institutions are a source of great strength, and that the only limit which, in principle, is necessary to them is adequate provision for the supremacy of the central authority. He believed that the wise and just way of meeting the demand for bringing Irish affairs more under Irish control is not to regard it as the first step toward separation, but rather to ask the promoters of the change to formulate the guarantees they proposed to give for the supremacy of Parliament. He had never yet received an adequate and satisfactory explanation on this point. In the absence of Mr. Parnell Mr. McCarthy proposes to state the demands of the Home Rule party, and to explain the guarantees they are prepared to offer that home rule, if granted, shall not lead to the disintegration of the empire. It is remarkable that at this juncture, when other indications of the approaching crisis are noticeable, the legislative separation of Ireland from England should be entertained by the British Premier. Students of prophecy have long believed that this separation will eventually take place.

A Prominent Social Topic in England is a reported coolness existing between the Queen and the Cabinet. It has long been observed that Queen Victoria did not honor the liberal ministry with the marks of favor she conferred on the cabinet of Lord Beaconsfield, and latterly rumors have been current that a serious estrangement has occurred. Probably many of the statements cabled across the Atlantic on the subject are mere gossip, but it was noteworthy that when the Queen went to London last week Mr. Gladstone did not call upon her Majesty, although it is the invariable custom for the premier to attend upon the sovereign on such occasions. It was said that the omission arose from illness, but as Mr. Gladstone went to the House of Commons the same night and made a long speech, the illness pleaded could not have been serious. It is also known that against three members of the Cabinet the Queen entertains feelings of personal dislike.

A Temperance Regulation has been Issued by the British naval authorities. The order is that no one entering the navy shall receive a spirit ration in kind until he is 21 years old; and all officers and men will be allowed in lieu of it to receive its value in money, or a ration of tea or chocolate and sugar.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey began Evangelistic work in Glasgow with a meeting in St. Andrew's Hall, on January 22d. Long before the hour announced for commencing, crowds surrounded the doors eager to obtain admission. Every available inch of room was occupied, and the scene presented was most impressive. The subject of Mr. Moody's address was "Faith," and the after-meeting testified to the accompanying power of the Holy Spirit. The subsequent meetings have been most enthusiastic, and great anticipations are being cherished that the present campaign of the evangelists in Glasgow, will be attended with many conversions, and much spiritual blessing to all, as was the case when the evangelists were in the same city about eight years ago.

A Deadlock in the Affairs of Egypt Exists. The Assembly of Notables insists on its demands to regulate the expenditure and to impose taxes, while the Khédive and his ministers claim that function as a part of their prerogative. The trouble is that the Khédive perceives the necessity of meeting the demands of the foreign bondholders, while the Notables and the army are hostile to all foreign claims, and would only impose sufficient taxes to defray actual internal expenditure. In this crisis both England and France are reluctant to interfere, partly because interference would be likely to provoke revolution, and partly because other European Powers, warned by the results of the French Tunisian intervention, would regard an Anglo-French occupation of Egypt with suspicion. A project is now being mooted to convene a conference of European Powers to consider the situation, in the hope that Europe may authorize England and France to jointly occupy Egypt, as the delegates of Europe, in order to ward off the intervention of Turkey and protect the Suez Canal.

The Czar of Russia has Received an Admonitory letter from the Archbishop of Moscow, who occupies a position of considerable influence in the political and social as well as in the religious world of Russia. The archbishop expostulates with his sovereign with a frankness and freedom unusual in despotic countries. He urges the Czar "to quit his seclusion, which," he says, "suggests poltroonery, and is injurious to the national traditions. The emperor's seclusion," he continues, "will lead to disunion between the emperor and the people, who will finally accustom themselves to dispense with their sovereign." The Czar received the warning with a bad grace, and hinted that it was not unlikely that the archbishop might be deposed for his temerity.

The Spiritual Deposition of the Sultan of Turkey is the object on which a large number of Mohammedans are concentrating their efforts. The conspiracy is at present confined to Arabia, but many of the followers of Mohammed in other lands sympathize with the movement. The Paris Gaulois publishes a detailed account of the insurrection, which it declares to be a much more important affair than people in general suspect or than the Porte is willing to confess. The originators of the movement are the Wahabis, the reformers of the Mohammedan world, who, in the eighteenth century, actually succeeded in driving the Turks for a time out of Arabia. Mecca is now full of the Wahabis, who have proclaimed as their leader a lineal descendant of Abbas, the uncle of Mohammed, and it is said that the tribes of Beni-Thaket and Beni-Arish have actually taken up arms in his behalf. For many years now the Mohammedans have been expecting a deliverer whom the so-called prophets have said would be a lineal descendant of the founder of their faith. Thus while the Sultan is threatened with the loss of his temporal kingdom his spiritual authority is also menaced.

A Fatal Colliery Explosion Occurred near Durham, England, on February 16th. One hundred and twenty men were entombed, and for some hours it was feared that they would all lose their lives. Almost superhuman efforts were made for their rescue, and eventually thirty of the imprisoned men were liberated. Thus encouraged the work was continued, but the only result was the discovery of forty dead bodies and the conviction from the quantity of gas in the mine that the other men must be dead.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

By THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1882.

16th Year. No. 9.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT OF MR. EDWARD W. THOMAS, and Scenes from his Life-Work.

VICTORY FOR GOD. Sixth Reply to Mr. Ingersoll. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Ouffe" (Continued).

CURRENT EVENTS: The Grant Pension Bill—The President's Nominations—Breaking of the Mississippi Levees—The Star Route Indictments—The Utah Delegate Question—Temperance in Connecticut—A Strange Application to a Physician—A Disappointed Heir—Origin of a Quaint Name—A Southern Soldier's Neglected Wound—A Clergyman's Dream—Recalled to Life by a Kiss—A Mountain Melting Away etc.

PICTURE OF PAUL'S CROSS IN LONDON.

"VERILY VERILY." A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Power over Evil Spirits. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

AN ANSWER TO PRAYER.

The Wesleys on Unfulfilled Prophecy.

Ruined in the Panic of '57 (with Illustration).

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Continued).

"Not To-day Thank You." A Temperance Appeal.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).

Eliza Cairns, a Martyr of the Spanish Inquisition (with Illustration).

FOREIGN TOPIOS: The English Lords and the Land Act—Mr. Bradlaugh Trying to Take his Seat—Closing a Parisian Den of Vice—The Slaves and the Latins—The Trial of the Russian Nihilists etc.

THE FIRST RECEPTION.

A MIDNIGHT MEETING.

THE DEATH OF AN UNFORTUNATE

THE HOME CHAPEL.

MR. EDWARD W. THOMAS, the Missionary to the Friendless and Fallen: and Scenes in his Work.

SCENES FROM THE LIFE WORK OF EDWARD W. THOMAS.

The Friend of the Friendless and Fallen.

Four Notable Scenes, as Shown on the Frontispiece—I. The First Reception—II. Around the Coffin of an Unfortunate—III. A Midnight Meeting—IV. The Home Chapel—Among the Friendless and Fallen.

ONE of the most saddening spectacles to a Christian is the scene presented in certain well-known localities of all the great cities of the world between the hours of ten o'clock at night and two o'clock in the morning. In New York, Chicago, and other American cities, in London, in the French capital, and in the chief cities of Europe the same scene may be witnessed.

The Christian man detained away from home beyond his usual hour for retiring to rest by some errand of mercy or some extraordinary emergency is hastening through the deserted streets to his home. Scarcely a passer-by is to be seen, and the lights in the upper windows of the houses show that "Tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," is holding her blissful sway. Suddenly he enters a street which in the daytime seems much like other streets, except that it has a faded, dull, and sleepy look as if the inhabitants were not so bright and alert as those of other streets. Entering this street at night it would seem as if some enchantment had been worked. The stores are all open and blazing with light, the storekeepers have discarded their listlessness and are as active and energetic as their fellow-tradesmen in other localities are in the early morning. Restaurants are crowded and the liquor saloons are doing a thriving business.

On the street are hundreds of men and women, the latter handsomely dressed, but with a showiness that is unusual in ladies on a pedestrian expedition. There is, too, a boldness in their gait and a freedom in their manner which indicate a lack of refinement and modesty instinctively recognized by the most careless observer as unwomanly. If he is near enough to hear their conversation, he often finds it garnished with words shameful on a man's lips, but doubly so on those of a woman. As he shrinks from contact with the throngs of these women he realizes that they are "the strange women" against whom the wise king so solemnly and earnestly warned young men. These women are plying a vile and shameful business, in which they and those who have dealings with them lose body and soul.

But the followers of Him who came to seek and to save those who are lost, cannot consistently neglect this class, abandoned as they are. They that are whole are not they who need the physician but they who are sick, and the Christian as he witnesses this fearful spectacle of sin, is impelled to tell the sinners of One who died to deliver them. This impulse is strengthened by what he learns of the circumstances which have brought many of them to ruin. He finds that in many cases they have been such as to excite pity and sympathy. One such case is typical of thousands. A father had among his children a daughter of rare beauty, who was gentle, loving, and trustful. She was sought in marriage by a young man of attractive appearance and brilliant conversational powers. But the father, anxious for his daughter's welfare, inquired into the young man's antecedents and habits, and found that both were such as deterred him from intrusting his daughter's future to his keeping. He refused his consent to the match, and then to his sorrow discovered that his daughter loved the worthless fellow. Then followed a struggle, the father was firm in his refusal, being convinced that he was acting for his daughter's good. But the girl, thinking her father misunderstood her lover and was prejudiced against him, rebelled against control she thought harsh.

The lover found means of communicating with her and suggested to her that if they were married her father would not withhold his blessing, and that a little boldness at first would insure them a life of happiness. He persuaded her to leave her father's house and go with him secretly to a distant city to be married. She went. But when she arrived there, he postponed under various pretexts the performance of the marriage ceremony, and finally refused altogether to marry her. Then he deserted her, and the girl found herself penniless in a strange city with no means of earning her livelihood; and too much ashamed, even if she had the means, to return home. In that extremity she was met by a woman who, seeing her distress, pretended to pity her, offered her shelter, and then introduced her to a life of vice. That has been the story of thousands, and hearts full of Christian love as they have listened to the recital have been touched by the piteous appeal: "Oh, if you could find me some way of earning an honest living, however laborious, I would gladly quit this wretched life."

Any attempt to render aid in such cases was necessarily attended with difficulty, and it was certain that worldly people, and even many Christian people, would be likely to misconstrue the motives that prompted such an effort, but the love of souls and the recollection of the sympathy our great Example extended to repentant women of the same class (Luke 7: 37-48) triumphed over all other considerations. The attempt was made in London, and it was followed by a similar effort in New York and other great cities, and God has blessed the work. How formidable were the difficulties which attended the initiation of the movement, and how discouraging was the reception of the kindly and disinterested effort to rescue the fallen may be understood from the following narrative. It describes the labors of Mr. Thomas, the pioneer in this field of Christian work, who has consecrated his life and all his energies to its prosecution.

It is now more than thirty years since Mr. Thomas began his work on behalf of the fallen. In the summer of 1851 he heard of a strange resort in London, into which it was scarcely safe for the police, and much less for ordinary visitors, to enter. It was, in fact, a little colony of thieves, harlots, and lawless people of every description, and here, herded together like so many wild beasts, they were living in contempt of every law, human and divine. When he spoke of visiting this place, his friends who were well acquainted with its reputation, did all they could to dissuade him from going, as they would not answer for his life if he ventured into so dangerous a locality. But after some trouble he secured a room in which to hold his first meeting on the following Sunday afternoon. He paid a woman the price which was demanded for the use of it, and he prayed earnestly for the divine blessing to attend the enterprise, to which he looked forward with some anxiety.

On going at the appointed time to the room which he had hired, expecting to find things in readiness for the service, the scene which presented itself was enough to fill him with discouragement if not with dismay. He found the woman in a state of wretched intoxication. The news of the intended service had spread through the colony and measures were taken to turn it into ridicule and to show Mr. Thomas what he might expect if he began mission work in this unclean warren of iniquity. The woman had been plied with liquor, and the sight of her, as the only auditor, appeared to say,

"YOU WILL DO NO GOOD HERE."

Mr. Thomas immediately conferred with two or three friends, and they at length resolved to hold a service in the open air that evening in the foul court. At the appointed time he made his way alone to the filthy little colony. He advanced to the middle of the court, and in a loud, cheerful tone began singing,

"Salvation, O the joyful sound.

'Tis pleasure to our ears;

A sovereign balm for every wound;

A cordial for our fears."

He had not proceeded far before some of the people in the court came out to see what this new feature in the life of Sunday evening could mean. On their ears had often fallen the sounds of ribald songs, but they appeared never to have heard one of the songs of Zion. Some jeered and cracked jokes, but it was encouraging to find a few listening to the words of the hymn as if mentally struggling to find out what the words meant, and what this "Salvation" was, which the singer said was "a sovereign balm for every wound."

SCENE I.—A TROUBLESOME AUDITOR.

On the conclusion of the hymn, a short prayer was offered, after which Mr. Thomas began an address to as strange an audience, surely, as ever preacher talked to. He had not spoken long before a dissolute woman came reeling into the court half intoxicated, and holding in her hand a plate of meat and vegetables. Announcing that she was going to have her dinner, whatever the rest might be inclined to do, she squatted down on the ground, and began eating, but paused every minute or so to jeer at what the preacher was saying, greatly to the fun of the motley audience. It appeared to be some disappointment to her that he was not, visibly at least, affected by her interruptions, and this may have goaded her into taking more active measures. Having finished her meal she turned her plate over, and violently smashed it into fragments with the handle of the knife she was using. Her next step was to hurl, with all the strength she possessed, the broken pieces at the preacher's head.

Her aim, however, was so unsteady that every missile failed of its mark, and her failures appeared more and more to exasperate her. At length she suddenly sprang to her feet, and, with the knife in her hand, rushed towards the spot where the preacher was standing, with the evident intention of doing him some bodily injury. Upon this two women, who belonged to the same miserable class as herself, but who had been attentive listeners to Mr. Thomas's address, intercepted her and caught her in their arms. She was drawn from the spot a most unwilling captive, and was taken away yelling, and frantically brandishing the knife in her hand.

It was a stormy commencement of mission work, but afterwards, for the space of about three years and a half, Mr. Thomas was allowed to visit this locality without opposition, to preach the Gospel, and to visit the poor people in their times of sickness and trouble. Nor, happily, were signs wanting that this first effort had not been made in vain.

SCENE II.—A VICIOUS WOMAN'S DEATHBED.

It so happened that, among those who formed the group around him in the scene just described, was a beautiful girl of about seventeen years of age. Her history was a very painful one, but by no means singular. She had a conscience which was not wholly seared within her, and do what she would to stifle its reproaches, it still asserted its right to condemn, and to fill her heart with fear of the future. She had been frequently and faithfully urged to quit her life of sin and to turn to the Saviour, but entreaties were not of the slightest avail.

ANNIE'S SUDDEN DEATH.

On the Sunday afternoon that Mr. Thomas was speaking in the court above referred to, she was present with a female companion of the same class, and some time afterwards it was this companion, who, one Monday morning, rushed into Mr. Thomas's office, exclaiming, "Oh, Sir! pray come down to — street 'Annie' is dead! She died suddenly yesterday morning."

When the excitement under which the unfortunate woman gave this information had somewhat subsided, Mr. Thomas was able to ask her a few questions, but the only fact present to this poor woman's mind, who in her life of sin had not lost her compassionate woman's heart, was "Poor Annie is dead! Poor Annie!" Mr. Thomas found that the unhappy girl had pursued her vicious course down to the very dawn of the Sabbath. She had then retired to rest, apparently in her usual health. On the Sunday morning, however, just as the church bells were ringing out their invitation to the inhabitants of the city to attend the house of God, Annie had risen up in bed as if startled by the sound. What memories may have suddenly crowded upon her mind as she listened to the bells! What reproach and anguish may have filled her no one can tell, for in a moment she fell back on the bed a lifeless corpse. She had often disregarded the invitation of the Sunday bells, but on that day she had received a summons to a higher court, which she must perforce obey.

AROUND THE COFFIN OF A MAGDALENE.

Upon hearing that the unhappy girl was dead, ness of sobriety, sickness has taken the place of health, and man has attempted to take the place of God. "An enemy hath done this," the adversary of God and man, and has brought ruin upon that work of God which was "very good." But praised be our Lord "for this cause the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil."

Therefore, blessed be God, we have no room to despair of any living man; Jesus was manifested that He might destroy the drunkenness of the drunkard, the slavery of the opium eater, the filthiness of the unclean, the worldliness of the worldly, the untruthfulness of the liar, the unrighteousness of the thief, the wickedness of the swearer and blasphemer, and all the power of sin. He came "to destroy the works of the devil," "that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom. 6 : 6). It is true that "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us" (1 John 1 : 8). "Sin is the transgression of the law;" but the law of Mount Sinai and "the perfect law of liberty" (James 1 : 25) are very different. A man may be fully delivered from lying, stealing, committing adultery, from wanting in love to God, from dishonoring His name or His day, who yet may fail much as being "under the law to Christ" (1 Cor. 9 : 21); he may comprehend but little those principles of resisting not evil, of loving one's enemies, of losing one's own life, and denying one's self, which though not mentioned in the Old Testament, are the very essence of the divine life, Christ in us.

He who is the devil's Conqueror and nature's Lord had just reduced the winds and waves to perfect calmness when, with His disciples, He came to the other side of the sea, into the country of the Gadarenes. No rest for Jesus there; we are told there was one miserable creature who had seen Jesus afar off, and "he ran and worshipped Him." The poor unhappy being was possessed with an unclean spirit, he could find no rest and dwelt alone, not among living men, but "among the tombs." What a picture of an unconverted man! how he shuns those who are alive unto God, he knows not their language, cannot follow their pursuits, feels a stranger among them; away among the dead in trespasses and sins he goes. Amid the drunkards and the unclean, even though he be not so unclean as they, he has some common feeling, he is not so utterly alone there; he can bear with sinners, but he finds saints intolerable. No man could bind this poor creature, "no, not with chains," everything had been tried on him, all to no purpose; chains and fetters were easily broken by the irresistible power which governed him, and "neither could any man tame him."

He was not his own master, he was a conquered man, conquered by the power of darkness; his thoughts, words, and deeds were almost all involuntary, directed by the demons which inhabited the body first made in the image of God. Perhaps the question may be asked: "Are such beings to be found now?" Alas, yes, and more often than many think, and they are often, but not always, unconscious of their bondage. It has more than once been our experience that such have come to us, and said, "I am possessed with an evil spirit, in mercy pray for me." But we need not enter into details in this matter, only let such as know they are possessed, or those friends who know it of them, remember, that "for this purpose the Son of man was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil."

This poor unhappy man could not rest. This is always the case with those who are possessed, the spirit which dwelt in him took away all sleep by night and all tranquillity by day, and in its fiendish cruelty sought to hunt the poor victim to death and to hell. It seems as though an intense desire for deliverance had made him run as though away from himself to Jesus directly he saw Him; but no sooner had he begun to worship Him, than the tyrannical power which bound him forced him to cry with a loud voice, "What have I to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of the most high God? I adjure Thee by God, that Thou torment me not." Awful contest, the poor human soul struggling to be free from its terrible oppressor; the evil spirit holding firmly on to his victim, and dreading to be disembodied. And the theatre of such a conflict is man, created in God's image, redeemed by Christ's blood; how comes it that he can thus become the plaything of the devil? It is not easy to be absolute on such a subject, but sure we are that possession only comes through sin. Often concealed impurity gives the enemy an open door, very often spiritual pride, sometimes spiritualism or anything else which is of the nature of sorcery, prying into "the secret things" which "belong unto the Lord" (Deut. 29 : 29), and nothing can deliver except contact with Jesus, the Destroyer of the devil's works.

At once when he came in his despair to Jesus, even before the devil had made him cry, "What have I to do with Thee?" Jesus had said unto him, "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit." The word of power was spoken, the enemy could hold his fortress no more, and the wretched lost spirit could only begin to supplicate, "I adjure Thee by God, that Thou torment me not." "And He asked him, What is thy name?" And he answered, saying, My name is Legion; for we are many." "My name" "we are many," a unity in plurality among these lost ones. They made no attempt at resistance, but only besought Him not to send them away out of the country. A herd of swine, ministering to the unlawful appetites of the inhabitants, swine's flesh being forbidden by the law, afforded some hope to these wretched spirits. At their request, Jesus gave them leave to enter into the swine, unclean spirits into unclean animals; but even then they had no mercy, "the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea (they were about two thousand;) and were choked in the sea."

Did the swineherds know what had taken place? We know not, but when they saw the swine with one consent rushing into the water, what must have been their amazement. "They fled and told it in the city and in the country."

Their account roused the curiosity of the inhabitants. And they went out to see what it was that was done. "And they come to Jesus;" but their eyes met with an unexpected sight, the well-known maniac of the country, the graveyard sojourner, was there, clothed; sitting still, the restless spirit had departed, and "in his right mind, and they were afraid." Afraid! of what? The power of the enemy was broken in their midst, the swine, the occasion of sin, were removed, the Deliverer was there; but instead of welcoming Him and rejoicing in His deliverance they went to the fearful length of beseeching Him to depart out of their coasts; and He went. He answered the prayer for His own departure, He would not force Himself upon them. Later on men desired a murderer rather than Him, now it was unclean spirits rather than Jesus the Son of God.

O how many things men choose rather than Jesus the Deliverer. The poor slaves of fashion sacrifice ease, comfort, health, everything in subjecting their bodies to exhibit the milliner's and dress-maker's wares. If it is the fashion, then dress must be worn which is not sufficient to preserve warmth, discomfort must be endured; and what has a fashionable woman gained by it all? Applause? Admiration? But from whom? Just those who speak the most bitterly and the most unkindly behind her back. And this is all she gains in the place of Jesus! Look at that poor girl who is about to marry a man because of his money or his position, whom she can neither love nor respect, her very earthly affections unsatisfied, her life of luxury a weary toil of fretfulness and dissatisfaction, and this instead of Jesus. Look at that man who has bent his mind on attaining a position through success in business. Well, he prospers, men say he deserves it, he adds house to house and field to field, but the unsatisfied heart urges him to go on always seeking more wealth, until he dies a beggar for eternity, and only this instead of Jesus. Look at that apparently earnest religious person, full of good works, but going about to establish her own righteousness; attending every service, reading her good books, fasting, anything rather than accepting Jesus. To take Jesus would make her fasting and assiduous devotions all useless, she would have no glory, it would interfere with her religion; so she builds a house upon the sand, glories in her work and rejects Jesus. What unutterable madness it is for any child of man to think he can dispense with Jesus.

One there was, whose heart clung to Him; that man who was a trophy of His grace and mercy, who had been the habitation of demons. Seeing that the rejected Jesus, who had delivered him, went meekly back to His ship, "he prayed Him that he might be with Him." But the heart of Jesus contained no bitterness towards those who would not receive Him, and for their sakes "Jesus suffered him not, but saith unto him, Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee." This man was wholly saved, and he needed but to know the will of Jesus in order to do it: "he departed, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him." It was personal testimony, every one had known the restless, raging maniac, and every one must see the incontrovertible change which had taken place in him. The result was "all men did marvel," the very men who would not suffer the presence of Jesus were thrilled with the story of the restored maniac. Let us not forget that if we are indeed delivered from the power of sin and Satan, we have a story of deliverance to tell, and if we are not telling it, we are guilty of the blood of souls who might be startled out of their sleep of sin if they heard it. O God, deliver us from blood-guiltiness!

ANSWER TO PRAYER.

In a little New England farmhouse a young girl lay dying. Though scarcely sixteen years of age her life had been one of great trial and suffering. Struck down at the age of eight with a malignant form of scarlet fever from which she had never recovered, she had gradually gone into a decline, and now after years of patient endurance her release is at hand. The bleak March wind howls without, piling the snow into huge drifts, and covering the brown earth with a canopy of spotless white. Within, the grief-stricken father watches beside his idolized child, striving to soothe her dying moments, his rough hands, hardened by toil, administering from time to time the necessary draughts.

Her little form wasted by disease is racked with pain, and that too such as none but a consumptive can ever know. Her quick breath and swollen limbs betoken that the end is near; the death-damp gathers upon her forehead, yet the struggle continues. In her agony she writhes upon the couch, grasps the coverlid with her nerveless hands and shrieks with pain. It is too much for her little frame to endure. She gasps: "O father! I can't stand it longer, I must have relief. Pray, O father! pray to the good God that this awful pain may leave me; He says, 'Ask whatsoever ye will in my name and ye shall receive'; ask Him, father, I know He will have pity on me, His servant." That father's faith wavered; 'twas too much to ask, yet to soothe her, he kneels by her bedside and pours out his whole soul in fervent prayer.

Scarcely had he begun to pray when instant relief came to her, all pain left her, and, exhausted by her struggles, she lay calm and mutely thanking God who had given her relief. Then, after a few moments, she continued: "Father, I want you to pray that I may once more arise from this sick bed; I believe your prayer will be answered."

Again that Christian parent wrestled with the angel of God, and although she was just sinking into the grave, God's hand arrested the fell destroyer, and under His guiding care she gradually gained strength and enjoyed better health than she had for some years previous.

But Mamie was only loaned to us for a short time. In about a year she gently passed away, and now robed in spotless white dwells in the paradise of God. Like the tender flower by the wayside, she cheered the hearts of friends by her gentleness and sweetness. Crushed also like the wayside flower, the sweet perfume of her character lingers with us as an unfailing influence for good and a priceless safeguard against sin. May we strive to imitate her virtues and meet her among the white-robed throng around the throne of God!

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS
SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate on Thursday last Passed the bill introduced by Senator Logan to place General Grant on the retired list of the army. Four Southern senators voted with the Republicans in favor of the bill. They were Brown of Georgia, Call and Jones of Florida, and Ransom of North Carolina. Senator Davis, of West Virginia, also voted on the same side. The bill has now been agitated for above two years, and it has been opposed on the ground that General Grant is already wealthy, and that putting him on the retired list would keep back the order of promotion and retirement of officers now in the army. Senator Bayard pointed out this difficulty in the course of the debate, and advocated, as a less objectionable mode of providing for General Grant, a pension for him as an ex-president, but only four senators supported that proposition. Friends of the bill apprehended opposition from the anti-Stalwart section of the Republican party rather than from the Democrats; but after Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, had spoken in its favor, the fear of opposition from that quarter was allayed. He advised that the bill should pass, as it emanated from General Grant's intimate friend and might be taken to represent General Grant's wishes in the matter. The vote was 35 for, 17 against. Opposition to it is expected in the House.

The House Committee on Elections Agreed on a report in the Utah Delegate case on Friday. The report declares that Allen G. Campbell, the non-Mormon who holds the governor's certificate, was not elected because he did not receive a majority of the votes cast; that George Q. Cannon, the Mormon polygamist who did receive a majority, is not entitled to a seat: and that the seat of Delegate from Utah should be declared vacant. Chairman Calkins, expressing the views of a majority of the committee, said: "In the face of the admissions of Mr. Cannon, we feel compelled to say that a representative from that Territory should be free from the taint and obloquy of plural wives. Having admitted that he practises, teaches, and advises others to the commission of that offence, we feel it our duty to say to the people of that Territory that we will exclude such persons from representing them in this House."

The Nomination of Ex-Senator Conkling to be Associate Judge of the Supreme Court, in the place of Judge Hunt, resigned, was sent by the President to the Senate on Friday. It caused a genuine sensation, for not even the President's intimate friends or the nominee himself appears to have known of it until the name was sent to the Senate. Then, as might be expected, there arose a storm. Senators Edmunds, Ingalls, Vest, and Voorhees spoke, and finally Senator Hoar formally objected to the immediate confirmation which is generally given when the nominee has once been a member of the Senate. The nomination was therefore referred to the usual committee. Much speculation was current as to whether Mr. Conkling would accept the office. It was remembered that ten years ago, when the offer of the Chief-Justiceship of the same court was offered him, he declined it, although there would have been less drudgery connected with that office than the one now tendered him. It is believed that the nomination will be confirmed by a large majority, as many opponents of Mr. Conkling will vote to confirm, in the hope that his acceptance of the office may remove a disturbing element from the Republican party in New York. The salary attached to the Associate Judgeship is $10,000 a year.

Indictments were Voted by the Grand Jury at Washington last week against the Star Route men. Among the indicted men are ex-Senator Dorsey, John R. Dorsey, H. M. Vail, and ex-Assistant Postmaster-General Brady. Colonel George Bliss, who has displayed marked energy in collecting evidence, is reported to have brought the cases into an advanced stage of completeness, and fully expects to convict. Some of the witnesses come from the remote north-west, and in several cases it was found necessary in order to serve a subpoena to send men on foot a journey of over a hundred miles over the mountains. Some twenty routes will be the subject of investigation. On twelve of these routes the aggregate increase was $274,586. They were originally let for $30,552, and subsequently raised to $305,138. Beside the charge of dishonesty to the Government, the contractors are accused of mulcting the sub-contractors. In one case it is alleged that "the contractor received from the Government for ten months $6899 57. He paid the sub-contractor who furnished the capital and did the work $825.94. The pay of the sub-contractors seldom ran above one half and often below one third the contractor's pay." It is expected that the cases will be tried in May next.

The Admission of Southern Dakota as a State has been under the consideration of a sub-committee of the House Committee on Territories. The sub-committee consists of Mr. Burrows, of Michigan, the chairman, who is a Republican, and four members, of whom two are Democrats and two Republicans. The sub-committee has now unanimously agreed upon a bill to provide for the admission, and the Republicans on the committee agreed to report it favorably. The bill makes the northern boundary of the proposed State the 46th parallel of latitude, and all parts of the Territory north of that parallel will continue to be governed as a Territory. The sub-committee's draft of the bill provides among other details for the election of a convention, to be composed of 120 delegates, to form a State Constitution. The Constitution so made must make "no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed." The convention must provide that perfect toleration of religious sentiment and freedom of religious worship shall be secured; that lands of non-residents shall not be taxed higher than those of residents; and that the bonded debt heretofore incurred by the Territory of Dakota for the building of a penitentiary and insane asylum, shall be assumed and paid by the State of Dakota.

At the Last Session of the Connecticut Legislature, a commission was appointed to revise the liquor laws of the State. The commission reported on February 9th and submitted a bill which embodies the changes recommended. In the proposed bill, which it is expected will become law, the term spirituous or intoxicating liquors is defined to mean distilled and fermented beverages, except cider, containing only 3 per cent of alcohol. The license fee for the sale of "hard liquors," so called, is $100; for lager beer, ale, and Rhine wine, $50; for lager beer only, $25; druggists, $10, to sell for medicinal and mechanical purposes only. Where buildings are used as dwelling-houses, except taverns and places of public entertainment, access to the saloon from the dwelling-house must be closed. No place shall be licensed which is within two hundred feet of any public school or church. The local option feature of the present law is practically retained. Upon a petition of 20 voters the Selectmen of a town must direct that a town meeting be held on the first Monday in April to decide whether sales shall be authorized. All recommendations for license must be signed by at least five jurors of the town.

Sad Distress Exists in the Mississippi Valley consequent on the breaking of the levees along the river from Memphis to Greenville. Travellers in that locality report the devastation and ruin as appalling. A telegram dated Memphis, February 22d, says: "Washington, Issaquena, Bolivar, Coahoma and Tunica Counties, Mississippi, in fact the whole shore line between Memphis and Vicksburg, on the Mississippi, and the whole eastern shore of Arkansas, are either under water or threatened with inundation. The inhabitants of a vast area of country are in great distress. Many have been forced from their houses and are on rafts, and some on knobs or parts of old levees. The destruction of live stock is beyond calculation. Navigation of the river itself is regarded by steamboat men as dangerous at its present stage on account of the great expanse of water in many localities and the billowy character of the waves when the surface is swept by heavy gusts of wind; also because of the great difficulty of getting to safe ports. The flood is eight inches higher than that of 1876." Governor Lowry, in a telegram of the same date, says "there is great loss of property and stock caused by the flood, and in many localities starvation is imminent."

The Revival Services in Cincinnati Conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison, the boy preacher, have been continued for more than a month, and the number of persons who have made confession of Christ, attributing their conversion to the meetings, is stated to be over four hundred, and about seven hundred have been brought under serious impressions and have solicited the prayers of the church. The Cincinnati correspondent of a contemporary says that "the jubilee service held on February 12th was characterized by a deep feeling of thanksgiving for such generous revival fruits. Though rain was falling, the throng was so great that the church doors had to be closed half an hour before the appointed time for the services, and great difficulty was experienced in keeping back the crowds on the sidewalk. Even officers of the church who were late in arriving were unable to work their way through the crowd, and were obliged to return to their homes. The greatest solemnity prevailed in the meeting."

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has issued its sixteenth annual report, from which it appears that the income of the society last year from all sources was $25,480.25, and the expenditures 23,615.53, leaving a balance of $1865.72. There have been 855 prosecutions in New York State during the year, and 1275 horses were stopped in New York and Brooklyn and sent to their stables as being unfit to perform their work. The report discusses the "hideous spectacle on Long Island last summer, which shocked public propriety, in the form of a pigeon shooting match," and "that grim monster vivisection that still remains master of the situation," and the "transportation of cattle," but congratulates the society that public opinion has been aroused against the wanton cruelties connected with these three subjects.

Revival Services at the Brooklyn Tabernacle commenced on Monday last. Major Cole, of Chicago, conducts the services. Dr. Talmage states that Major Cole has been holding meetings in London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, Chicago, Louisville and other cities, in which thousands were converted, and has the strong approval of Drs. Bonar and Cairns, of Scotland, D. L. Moody, Rev. Stuart Robinson and others. Prayers are desired that the blessing of God so abundantly given last year and the year before on these special efforts, when Mr. Philip Phillips and Mr. Harrison conducted them, may be enjoyed this year.

An Heir to Some Property near Guelph, in Canada, will have to wait a century for his inheritance under his father's will, if its provisions are carried out. He expected that his father's farm would have been left to him absolutely. But when the will was read it was found that the old farmer had directed that his son should pay the other members of the family for the farm by annual instalments of $50, and when he had paid the whole value he should have possession. It will take one hundred years to pay the full amount, and the son is naturally disappointed by the will. There is a hopelessness about the arrangement reminding us of the burdens erroneous teachers of religion attempt to lay on the shoulders of anxious sinners who cannot be too often told that salvation is not of works (Eph. 2 : 8, 9.)

A Mountain is Reported to be Melting away in North Carolina. A telegram from Asheville, N. C., says that on February 13th a loud crash was heard there, but not until the next day was the cause discovered. It was then found that a large piece of rock forming part of Bald Mountain had suddenly disappeared in the fertile and beautiful valley below. A slice of a half mile square melted away. The cause of this remarkable tumble is unknown—whether it is to be attributed to the heavy snow and rain storms which have prevailed in this region for the past few weeks, or whether it is the result of the fissure in the mountains caused by the volcanic outbursts which a few years ago alarmed the inhabitants. The sight of that immense mass of rock lying in the valley is enough to make the most impassive people shudder at the thought of what must have been the fate of any one on whom it might have fallen. Yet we are told that a day is coming in which even that horrible end will be craved rather than the impending one which will be the doom of the impenitent (Rev. 6 : 16).

A Man Died in Georgia Recently of a wound he received nineteen years ago at the battle of Chancellorsville. The Columbus Enquirer, in chronicling the death of an ex-soldier which occurred February 9th, says that in the battle he received a wound in the hip, the ball lodging in the bone. Had an operation been performed at, or shortly after, that time, the ball could have been easily removed, but the wounded man, thinking it would never cause him any trouble, allowed it to remain. Some years after, he suffered severe pain, and an operation was performed in the hope of finding the ball, but without success. Two months ago he was seized with excruciating pains in his back, and in spite of all that his doctors could do, he died after lingering in agony five weeks. A post-mortem examination was made, and the ball was found in the small of the back, lodged against the back-bone. It had worked its way through the bone in the thigh, where it first lodged, to the point at which it was found. This was a case in which much suffering might have been avoided, and life prolonged, if the patient had braced himself up when the injury was first done to undergo an operation. It is of such cases in our spiritual life that our Saviour spoke (Matt. 5 : 29). The pain of overcoming a bad habit or severing a sinful connection is better endured than a life of bondage to sin ending in eternal death.

An Inconsistent Application to a Physician was made in Portland, Me., one night during the first week of last month. It was past midnight, and the physician had retired to rest, when the door bell rang violently. The doctor arose, and going down stairs opened the door and admitted a healthy-looking man and woman, who had come some distance in the bitter night air with the thermometer below zero to consult him. "What is the trouble?" asked the doctor, "you both look well." "The trouble!" replied the man. "Trouble enough! You see, Doctor, we own an old-fashioned clock that has stood on our mantel-piece for years. To-night after we had retired, all at once that old clock started up and struck the hour of 12. Of course, Doctor, that meant my time had come, or a warning that I must soon die. What shall I do, Doctor?" and the man moaned and rocked to and fro while the wife wept to see her husband so affected. The physician gave him a prescription for bromide of potassium, with which man and wife departed. It seemed curious that a man so superstitious as to believe that he had thus received an intimation of approaching death should have applied to a physician for help. If he really believed that he was about to die, as his night journey would seem to prove, one would have expected that his concern would have been about his soul rather than his body. In the same way men who put off seeking God to a death-bed generally find that opportunity fail them, because, when confronted with death their minds are too much occupied with anxiety to get well to think of anything else (Isa. 9 : 13).

A Quaint First Name is thus Explained by a Maryland journal. In the record of the family to which General M. C. Meigs, late Quartermaster-General, belongs, there occurs in every generation since ante-revolutionary days the first name of "Return." It originated in a brief letter. It appears that early in the last century one Jonathan Meigs fell in love with a young lady, who rejected his addresses. Meigs was too proud and sensitive to offer himself a second time, but as he still loved her he determined never to marry any one else, and to live and die a bachelor unless she, of her own volition, relented. After a few years the lady did relent, and sent a letter to her former suitor. Meigs got the letter and found in it only the two words: "Return, Jonathan." It was enough; Jonathan did return and made her his wife. Their first child was baptized "Return Jonathan," to commemorate the brief letter that had made father and mother happy, and from that day to this there has been a Return J. Meigs in every generation. There is a sense in which the same word lives in the grateful memory of every converted sinner, who having turned again from his sins, finds in acceptance eternal joy (Ezek. 18 : 22, 23).

A Clergyman's Presentiment of Sudden death originated in a remarkable dream which he had on January 14th last. The dream was very vivid and impressive, and he described it to his family and to several members of his church at Bloomington, Ind. He spent much of his time on the following day, which was Sunday, in prayer, and on Monday morning started as he had previously arranged to do, on a journey in Ohio. He arrived safely at Greencastle, but in the evening, as he was returning to the depot, he had to cross the track, and while doing so in a blinding snow-storm, a train struck him and he was crushed to death beneath the cars. When the news of the calamity reached his family they remembered the presentiment his dream had caused him, and how on the morning he left home he told his wife he knew not where or how soon he should fall, but for her to be assured that he was ready. The calmness with which he started on his journey and his freedom from distress at the thought of death were also remembered as evidences of the courage religion imparts at a time when the majority of men quail.

Recalled to Life by a Kiss has been the strange experience of a child at Louisville, Ky. In that city a family was in deep distress on February 8th. The father and mother and their little son surrounded the bed of a little girl who was apparently dying, having been in convulsions all through the previous night. The child was barely breathing, and soon respiration stopped altogether. The doctor pronounced the child dead. It lay thus for fully ten minutes. The little boy, who was passionately fond of his sister, suddenly went to her, leaned over and imprinted a kiss upon the pallid lips. The child's mouth was slightly open, and in kissing her the boy, who was sobbing bitterly, blew his breath down her throat. The little lips suddenly moved, the child gave several sudden gasps, and then commenced to breathe—slowly at first, and then gradually stronger until respiration became natural. From that time the child was gradually nursed back to life. The scene was a very impressive one, and though the doctor explained it by natural causes, the parents cannot forget that the brother's embrace was the means of saving their child's life. How many a soul in danger of eternal death has been brought into everlasting life by the love of Him whom we are graciously permitted to call our "Elder brother!"

"VERILY, VERILY."

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."—John 5 : 24.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me hath everlasting life."—John 6 : 47.

A Double Nota Bene—The Ultimate Ground of Faith—I. The Person to whom the Blessing Comes—The Believing Hearer—The Silver Coated Pill—Believers in the Fulllest Sense—Believers in the Lord Jesus—In spite of Errors and Imperfections—The Only Sort of Man Saved—II. The Blessings which Belong to Believing—He hath Everlasting Life—Non-Condemnation—Passed from Death to Life—III. The Assurance in the Text—Christ's Knowledge—His Veracity—The Need of being Assured—What Is Presumption—A Minister's Avowal in a Coach—Mr. Hall's Seal.

THE words "Verily, verily," as they were solemnly used by our divine Lord, indicate an utterance of special importance. If Jesus says, "Verily, verily," there is something coming to which we should attend with all our hearts. The subject which He thus introduces is our possession of eternal life, and our being delivered from condemnation by faith in Himself. Can any theme be more important? Many questions may be asked, but they can all afford to wait till we get the answer to that first inquiry, "What I must do to be saved?" What shall it profit a man if he compass the whole world of knowledge and knows not the way of life? If he wins a world in this life, what will that avail him if he misses the life everlasting? It is very considerate on our Lord's part to call us with such great solemnity to think about our souls and eternal life. Let us attend to His appeal. Come hither, dear hearer, and bend over the words which Jesus commends to you with a double Nota Bene, saying, "Verily, verily."

Our Lord used this "Verily, verily" to denote a clear and certain revelation. There must be an end to all doubt when Jesus says, "Verily, verily." His ordinary word is true; for nothing but truth can come from Him who is "the Truth;" but when He uses His strongest asseveration, "Verily, verily," then we must regard the statement with special reverence if we be indeed His loyal subjects. When Jesus says, "Verily, verily," we see two armies of verities gathered around His royal standard. His declaration is to be accepted as indisputable, immutable, infallible, truth. Do you not agree to this?

Carefully notice where this certainty lies; it rests solely upon the word of Jesus—"I say unto you." In the matter of our salvation carnal reason never arrives at certainty. Mere argument can never bring a troubled heart to a sure anchorage. The certainty which Christ sets before us rests upon His own solemn assertion. Instead of proof the incarnate Son of God gives us—"Verily, verily, I say unto you." If you are His disciples indeed, and would enjoy the benefits of His salvation, you must accept your Lord's statement without question. Doubts and reasonings must lie down at His feet, and it must be enough that Jesus says it. The ipse dixit of a mere man is not enough; but those of us who adore the Lord Jesus as the Son of God desire no better assurance than the word of His lips. Here is our ultimate ground of faith, our main argument with mankind,

OUR FINAL ANSWER TO SATAN, and the eternal quietus of every misgiving—Jesus says it.

We shall never arrive at certainty as to the life everlasting except by a conviction that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is infallible in everything that He says. I had rather have one word from Jesus than volumes of human reasonings, however conclusive they may appear. Our judgment has often deceived us, even our senses play us false, and our emotions are no more to be depended on than the winds and waves; but here is a rocky foundation, firm as the pillars of heaven—"Verily, verily, I say unto you."

I have heard some who call themselves Christians talk about the doctrine of salvation through faith in Christ as if it were a mere theory of what they are pleased to call the Evangelical School; but is it so? Is it not our Lord's own teaching? Our opponents have full liberty to canvass the peculiar tenets of a party, and the more they do so the better; but this teaching is none of ours, it is the teaching of Him whom these critics call Master and Lord. Is this their reverence for the Son of God? Do they challenge Him to His face, and question that which He asserts with a double verily, and certifies by the dignity of His person and the veracity of His character?

I am equally at issue with those who admit the doctrine of justification by faith and then add that it is to be guardedly stated and cautiously presented. Does Jesus teach dangerous doctrine? This truth is constantly assailed by the carnally wise; but is that a reason for mistrusting it when Jesus puts it forward in such a form? Understand clearly that if you reject the doctrine of life through believing you reject the authority of Jesus.

I feel this morning great restfulness of heart as to what I have to say. I shall not speak at haphazard upon a matter of opinion, speculation, or probability, nor shall I beg your consent and agreement thereto as a matter of favor; I stand fair and square before you, and I demand the assent of all who profess and call themselves Christians upon a point which Jesus has set at rest for ever by the solemn declaration, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth in me hath everlasting life." Such as are prepared to reject the authority of the Lord Jesus may do so, to them I have no word this morning; but to all such as own His Messiahship and Deity I present the doctrine of the text as worthy of all acceptance. May the Holy Spirit help me to set it out with clearness, and enable you to receive it into your inmost souls.

Our Saviour is speaking of a great blessing, and our first head is the person to whom this blessing comes—"He that heareth my word and believeth on Him that sent me hath everlasting life." We shall speak, secondly, upon the blessing itself—"He hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life;" and thirdly, and this will be the point I shall lay most stress upon, the singular assurance with which it is stated, the wonderful firmness and distinctness with which it is asserted by the Master, and backed up with, "Verily, verily, I say unto you."

I. First, then,

THE PERSON

to whom this blessing comes. Read the passage, and you notice, first, that the privileged individual is a hearer who is also a believer. "He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life." It does not appear from our text that everlasting life is communicated by drops of water, or in any other ceremonial manner; but the command is, "Hear, and your soul shall live." Men are not expected to believe that which they have never heard; they are not to take the articles of the church rolled up, as it were, into a pill, silver-coated, and to swallow them, be they what they may, without instruction. We are to act towards saving truth as we do in reference to other information; we are to hear it with attention, and so receive it.

But these people, while they are hearers to begin with, do not stop there; they become believers. They believe that Jesus is the appointed Saviour, and they accept Him as such for themselves. They believe that His blood cleanses men from sin, and therefore they trust in His blood to cleanse them, and are cleansed by it. I am talking to some of the best hearers in the world, and yet I fear that many of you come short, because you are hearers only, and not doers of that word which saith, "Believe and live."

Note again, these favored persons are believers who remain hearers in the fullest sense. These persons believe in God who hath sent the Lord Jesus into the world, and consequently they believe that what Jesus says must be true, and then they hear His voice with a discerning, spiritual ear. Our Lord uses the word "hear" in a special sense when He says, "My sheep hear my voice." They hear their Shepherd, but they know not the voice of strangers. "Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound. They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance."

The quickened ones are described in our second text as believers in the Lord Jesus. "He that believeth in me hath everlasting life." They have a personal faith in a personal Saviour. They believe that God must punish sin, that God has punished sin in the person of Jesus, and that He has therefore set forth His Son Jesus Christ to be a propitiation for sin, that "whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life." This they believe, and on this they lean the full weight of their souls. Jesus says, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" and they come to Him for rest, and receive rest. This is the main point in the character of those who have everlasting life; they are not here said to do anything, or achieve anything, but they believe in Jesus the Christ.

But notice, that our Lord has spoken these words of every such believer: "He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life." Whatever else he may have or may not have, this is the vital point. "But, Lord, he is full of fault and imperfection." There is no exception made on that ground; for "by Him all that believe are justified from all things." "But the believing man makes many mistakes in points of theology." Nothing is said in the text as to errors upon other points; but the text positively saith, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life."

If there be genuine faith in Jesus, there will be a sincere desire to understand all His teachings, and a readiness to believe them; but as for ignorances and mistakes, they are covered with all our other sins by the great atonement which is received by faith. "But, Lord, he is himself afraid that he has not attained to everlasting life. He trembles lest he should be found wanting when put into the balances." No exception is made on account of timidity and diffidence. If any man believeth in Christ Jesus, the statement is made absolutely of him and of every one like him, that he "hath everlasting life." Old or young, rich or poor, learned or illiterate, talented or obscure, there is no difference; all believers have everlasting life.

But, mark you, there is no statement made as to the salvation of any other sort of person. Nothing is said about the baptized person who is not a believer. Our text says nothing about the baptized, confirmed, and sacramented unbeliever having everlasting life; there is not a word like it from Genesis to Revelation. Other books may say what they will; but this Book of God makes no account of any man who is devoid of faith. Did you tell me that such a one has been a professor of religion for many years, and his outward life has been most commendable? So far, so good; but that is not all. Indeed, it is beside the mark as to the teaching now before us; for the text saith absolutely nothing about outward morality and correctness of conduct. These things are sure to be found where faith is found; but alone and by themselves they answer not to the qualification laid down by our Lord. If a man believe not on Christ there is no cheering word for him, be he what he may.

We now know the persons to whom the blessings of salvation have come; I hope that many of us are numbered with them.

II. Very briefly let us notice which belong to believing.

THE BLESSINGS

First, our Lord asserts that the believer "hath everlasting life." He was condemned to die, and reckoned as a dead man; but he is now acquitted, and his life is granted him. He was spiritually dead; but the fact that he believes in Jesus is sufficient evidence that he has received spiritual life. John tells us in his epistle, "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life." This spiritual life is not a thing of time only, it is expressly called "everlasting." Those who in these days make out that "everlasting" does not mean unending, will, I dare say, squeeze the life-blood out of our text; but the most of us take the word to mean what it says, and to signify life which will never end.

If I have received life in Jesus Christ I have received a life which will endure as long as the everlasting covenant, as long as everlasting love, as long as the everlasting God. According to a certain theology a man may have life in Christ one day and lose it the next; how, then, is it everlasting life? If a man has lost his life that life could not have been everlasting; that is clear. That which comes to an end could not have been everlasting. But we teach with the authority of Christ that the man that believeth on Christ has at this moment within him a life that can never expire. The believer has this everlasting life now; for it is not said, "shall have," but "hath everlasting life." What a boon is this! To be born in the image of God; to be a partaker of His nature; to be placed beyond all reach of the second death. Glory be to God for this!

Notice next, that the believer is in a condition of non-condemnation. He "shall not come into condemnation." The translation would be more accurate if it were put, "and cometh not into judgment;" that is to say, as soon as a man has believed in Christ he receives the benefit of Christ's substitution, and is no longer under judgment, much less condemnation. In Christ the believer has been judged, condemned, and punished, and the believer is therefore clear of the law and all its penalties.

But will not the righteous be present in the judgment of the last day? Undoubtedly we shall all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; but the judgment of that day will not be a judgment to us in the dreadful sense of the term. When a man is perfectly clear, and called into court on purpose to be publicly acquitted, it is no judgment to him. "The Lord shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that He may judge His people;" and this is our joy, that "our God shall come, and shall not keep silence." It will be no penalty, but a great delight, to stand before the great King and hear Him say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

JUDGMENT PASSED BY.

Our text has another sentence of privilege—he has passed from death unto life. Notice where judgment is. See, here is death! Yonder is life and resurrection! Judgment, as it were, stands between the two. We have passed from death to life, and so we have passed by the judgment. There is a doctrinal error which cannot be too much condemned, that the resurrection is past already; but there is a blessed spiritual truth that cannot be too firmly grasped, that believers are already the children of the resurrection by having received quickening as to their spirits. In regeneration lies the essence and major portion of resurrection. We have already passed from the kingdom of death into the kingdom of life, and so have passed by the judgment, since Jesus was judged for us, condemned for us, and made to die in our stead.

Did I hear some one object, "You make too much of so small a matter as believing. You make out that simply by trusting in Jesus Christ there is a difference made between one man and another of a most extraordinary kind, and that it is made at once?" Yes, I do say that, exactly that, and so far as I am concerned I do not care how much you quarrel with it, I shall not tone down the statement: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

"I hear you mutter, 'I think you are very uncharitable.'" Say so, if you please; I shall prove my charitableness by bearing it. But see! Here is a person standing right in the middle of a railway track, and I say to him, "My dear fellow, if you do not come out of that you will be smashed to atoms within the next five minutes, for an express train is thundering along the line." He laughs and answers, "Do you mean to say that my shifting the position of my body a couple of feet will make all that difference? Do you tell me that if I move I shall be safe, and that if I stand here I shall be cut to pieces?" "Yes, I do say it; and say it with tears ; begging you to believe me, and come out of the track." "Then," he says, "you are very uncharitable." "Yes," I reply, "and you are very insane." What more can I say? It is never uncharitable to speak the truth for the good of the person concerned. A small matter may suffice to shape the destiny of an immortal soul.

I heard a grumbler say, "We do not want this doctrine. What we want is more morality and honesty." Just so. You remind me of a poor little child. His father planted bulbs to come up in the spring, and make the garden gay with golden flowers ; but the boy said, "We don't want bulbs ; we want crocus cups and daffodils." The child forgot that flowers never grow without roots. You, too, good sir, forget that holy lives cannot grow without a cause, and faith is the root of virtue. Flowers stuck into the ground without roots are babes' follies, and good works without faith are childish vanities. We preach faith in order that good works may follow, and they do follow, and are the fruits of that eternal life which men receive by faith. Are you not willing to get the flowers through the roots? Go, silly children, and grow wiser.

III. I close with my last head, which is

THE ASSURANCE

with which this doctrine is stated in my text. It was that which attracted me to it.

First, the doctrine of this text is certified to us by the terms in which our Lord utters it. I have already told you this, but I mean to go over it again. Our Lord Jesus, whose name is Faithful and True, here pledges His honor as God, His veracity as man, upon the certainty of this doctrine. He says, "Verily, verily." These two words sound to me like great guns levelled against unbelief. Like the two brazen pillars called Jachin and Boaz, these two verities stand in the porch of mercy's temple, and show us where there is establishment and strength in the word of the Son of man.

Our Lord then adds, "I say unto you." Then it must be so, or else the Lord speaks in error, and none think that for a moment, for He is Wisdom itself. Is He not the only wise God, our Saviour? Do you dream that these words may mean less than they say? That were to charge the Lord with insincerity, mocking poor souls with great words and small meanings? No, you would count it profane to imagine such a thing. "He that believeth in me hath everlasting life," must, then, mean what it says. Christ knows what is everlasting life and who has it ; for there is no eye like His that can discern life wherever it may be, and discriminate between the false and the true.

The question may be raised, Why does our Lord need to put it so very, very positively? Did I hear any one of you grumbling in your hearts just now at my going over the same ground? I did it on purpose, because it is with such great difficulty that you can get men to accept this humbling truth. Human nature revolts against it. As for the unconverted, even when they begin to feel their need of a Saviour they cannot think it true that by believing in Jesus Christ they will pass from death to life. Salvation must be by faith that it may be of grace, and it must be of grace or not at all ; but proud souls will not have it so. A man must be driven to self-despair before he will agree to be saved by faith in Christ.

You who deal much with souls know how they try to escape their own mercy and avoid the loving-kindness of the Lord. Even you that have believed and are saved are not half as sure as you ought to be. Are there not times with you when you say, "I do not feel as I wish, and therefore I am not saved?" What argument is there in that? Can your feelings make Christ untrue? Recollect the evidence of your being saved as a believer lies wholly in that "I say unto you." Perhaps you are not sure that you have everlasting life, and yet you are sure that you are a believer in Jesus. How is this? This is a questioning of Christ's veracity. His strongest affirmation is, "Verily, verily." Is He not to be believed on this? You, as His dear disciple, lover, and friend, would be very indignant if any one cast a suspicion upon His truthfulness—why will you do it yourself? Accept the truth heartily. Never doubt it, but let it stand as a fact that your faith has saved you.

It is, then, if you are a believer, absolutely certain that you shall never be condemned, but have passed from death unto life ; the Lord puts it so positively that we may be right positive about it. Why are you not, as a believer, absolutely certain of your possession of eternal life? The Master, who knew our unbelief, has put the matter so straight and plain that nobody can get over it without rejecting His word. It is certain that he that believeth in Him hath everlasting life ; certain, then, that we are saved if believers. We need not be afraid to believe this with great confidence, and to rejoice because of it. Some one says, "Ah, but it might be presumption." Presumption to believe that Jesus speaks the truth! I tell you and that is, to question anything that our Lord has said. Is He your Master and Lord? If He be not, say so ; but if He be so, will you venture to sit upon the throne and judge the sayings of your own Lord, and say, "This may be true, and that may be false?"

WHAT IS PRESUMPTION,

Another objector cries, "But I think a person may be too certain." A person may be a great deal too certain if the argument be based upon inference ; but if a statement be based upon the personal testimony of the Lord Jesus, we cannot be too certain of it. Circumstantial evidence is often very powerful, and to some minds irresistible ; yet the inference drawn from it may be false ; but the witness of a person who cannot err is worth all the circumstantial evidence in the world.

Jesus Christ cannot be suspected of falsehood or error, either in His divine character or in His perfect human character, and therefore the basis of our confidence cannot be shaken. Our rest must be found entirely in that grand word, "I say unto you." The weight of your doubt, if you have any, must fall upon His personal character, and there also the stress of your faith must be fixed. If Jesus speak the truth, then the believer has everlasting life ; if the believer questions whether he has life or not, he questions the veracity of Christ. We are bound by our discipleship to be at rest. Happiness becomes a duty, and peace a matter of obligation. Happy men, who are under bonds to be joyful!

One thing I want you to notice, and that is that our Lord does not desire us to keep this doctrine in the background. This doctrine that "whosoever believeth in Him hath everlasting life," is not for our own private comfort alone, it is to be proclaimed upon the housetops. Those Jews in Christ's day were a company of cross-grained fault-finders, who picked holes in Him about everything and nothing. Very harpies were they, full of spite at His excellence. They had just been finding fault with his healing a man on the Sabbath-day, and He had answered them out straight without reserve ; and when He had their ear, He told them a truth which would cut them to the quick. It was not a wanton casting of pearls before swine, and yet the men were not worthy to hear so divine a truth. Jesus tells it to them that we may tell it to all. Never let us conceal what Jesus thus unveiled.

One of our ministers years ago, travelling by coach, asked an erroneous preacher who was on the same coach this question : "How is a sinner justified in the sight of God?" This gentleman replied, "Ah, I know you ; if I were to let you know my views, you would put them in your sermon and spread them all over England." "Ah," cried our friend, "you are ashamed of your notions, are you? Well, I will give you the answer, and I will be glad if you will and publish it all the world over—a man is justified in the sight of God by faith in the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ."

PUT IT IN ALL YOUR LECTURES

Our doctrine is not special truth for the élite and initiated, to be dubiously taught in a back-room among a handful of students ; it is the everlasting Gospel, and we wish to have it proclaimed in market and street, before learned Brahmins and ignorant Hottentots ; we would have it told out in the back slums of London, and preached before lords and ladies and royalty itself. It does not matter where ; salvation by faith is never out of place. This is a doctrine never to be covered up, nor veiled, nor qualified. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life"—out with it and hesitate not.

A MOTTO ON A SEAL.

It is a pretty thing which is told of the father of Mr. Newman Hall, and the author of "The Sinner's Friend," that his common seal that he always delighted to use was a crown with an anchor fixed into it, with just these words, "Other refuge have I none." Well, if you do not use that seal, if you do not write the words over the door of your house, yet take care that you bear their meaning in your hearts. Have my text written in your hearts by the Spirit, so that you are sure and certain of it beyond all doubt upon the matter, and also do so glory over it that you never hesitate to confess that you are saved by faith in Christ Jesus.

Dear hearers, do you really know this truth in your own souls, "Have you believed in Jesus, or have you not?" Are any of you trying to establish a righteousness of your own? Are you laboring as in the very fire to get peace where you will never find it? Oh, come away from your ceremonies and your sacraments ; come away from your feelings, come away even from your prayers and your almsgivings ; come away from everything upon which you rely, and believe in Jesus, the appointed Saviour. Come away even from your own faith, for you must not rely upon it. Come and trust alone in Jesus, who, being very God of very God, made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Himself the form of a servant, and in that servant form bled even to the death in the sinner's room and place, that whosoever will trust Him may be justified in the sight of God. Rest there, one and all of you. Oh may God help you at this very moment so to do, and then we will meet in heaven all of us ; if there be no exception to the believing there shall be no exception in the salvation, for "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life."

THE WESLEYS ON UNFULFILLED PROPHECY

BOTH Samuel Wesley, the father of John Wesley, and John Wesley himself were firm believers in the pre-millennial advent of Christ, as is conclusively shown by Mr. Tyerman in his able and popular Lives of those two men.

Samuel Wesley in an article published in the Athenian Gazette of October 17th, 1691, uses the following language : "We believe, as all Christians of the purest ages did, that the saints shall reign with Christ on earth a thousand years ; that this reign shall be immediately before the general resurrection, and after the calling of the Jews, the fulness of the Gentiles, and the destruction of Antichrist, whom our Saviour shall destroy by the brightness of His coming and appearance in heaven ; that at the beginning of this thousand years shall be the first resurrection, wherein martyrs and holy men shall rise and reign here in spiritual delight in the New Jerusalem, in a new heaven and new earth, as foretold by the holy prophets."

John Wesley, on the receipt and perusal of Mr. Hartley's "Paradise Restored," in 1764, wrote to the author, "Your book on the millennium was lately put into my hands. I cannot but thank you for your strong and seasonable confirmation of that comfortable doctrine ; of which I cannot entertain the least doubt as long as I believe the Bible."

In a letter to Dr. Middleton, published in 1749, John Wesley refers to the millennial creed of Justin Martyr, namely, that at Christ's second coming the martyrs will be raised, and for a thousand years will reign with Christ in Jerusalem, which will be then rebuilt, enlarged, and richly adorned, according to the prophets (Isaiah 65) ; and that at the end of the thousand years there will be a universal resurrection, in order to the final judgment. These were the views of Justin Martyr, which Wesley says Justin deduced from the prophets and the apostles, and which were also adopted by the fathers of the second and third centuries. "In fact," Wesley adds, "to say that they believed this was neither more nor less than to say they believed the Bible."

Eliza Cairns in the Prison of the Spanish Inquisition.

A Ruined Man's Consoler.

A DANGEROUS HERETIC.

ON the wall of a dungeon in the Spanish Inquisition an inscription in the English language was found by the people who broke open that abode of cruelty. Inquiries were made about the prisoner who had scratched the words on the wall, and it was discovered that the only prisoner who spoke English that had been confined in the cell was a young lady of wealth, named Eliza Cairns. She had gone to the Peninsula in the early part of the present century to take charge of the two little children of her sister whose death had left them motherless. Their father, though educated by Protestants, having gone out to Spain without any real regard for religion, was soon led astray by the wiles of Popish priests, and gave up the faith of his forefathers for the creed of Rome.

Eliza Cairns, however, was determined that her young relations should not be brought up in the belief of degrading superstitions. She took every opportunity of inspiring the children with a wholesome dread of the priests and their doctrines, explaining to them in plain and simple language that sinners are saved by faith in Christ alone, and not by masses, or penance or purgatory, or the prayers of saints. It was not long before the watchful foes she was trying to defeat became aware of her efforts to counteract their poison, and bent all their ingenuity to the one object of gaining her over to the side of superstition.

To accomplish this object they left no artifice untried. Her beauty and gifts, as well as the wealth she inherited, made her, in their eyes, one of the most desirable of converts. The most plausible, subtle, and insinuating of their number, therefore, employed all their skill to accomplish her conversion; but she was firm as a rock, and it was not long before she was thrown into prison as a dangerous heretic. Here she was visited by Church dignitaries as well as by the ordinary clergy, and implored not to compel the Holy Church to resort to severer measures. But neither threats nor flatteries nor fears could move her. Strong in the strength of Christ, she repelled every temptation, and was "more than conqueror" over all her enemies.

Her deliverance was not long delayed. The dampness of that dreary dungeon struck its deadly chill into her frame, and soon the angel Death came and led her forth to eternal liberty. On one of the walls of her prison she scratched with the point of a nail the words, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life"—words which she had written there, in her own sweet mother tongue, shortly before her hand forgot its cunning.

She fell a victim to the insatiable cruelty and fanaticism of Rome, but in death, as in life, she was the uncompromising foe of the Papacy. Her brother-in-law, roused from the sleep of superstition and sin by the heartless cruelty of the priests to one so fair, determined that at all hazards he would be free from the bondage of such monsters. Taking with him his children, he returned to the land of his birth, and for ever renounced the soul-destroying errors which he had, in an evil hour, accepted.

RUINED IN THE PANIC OF '57.

IT was in the dark days of the panic of 1857 that a tradesman was seen walking slowly and with an unsteady gait toward his home. Once or twice he reeled and almost fell, so that those who watched him thought he was intoxicated. But George Willoughby was perfectly sober. But he was in sore trouble. His spirit was crushed and in the agony of his mind his sight seemed to have failed and every muscle of his body relaxed. He stopped presently before a house which, though not imposing, had the appearance of unostentatious comfort. Looking at it one would have said the inmates were prosperous and refined people. The garden in front was carefully kept, and in a conservatory at the side were some rare and choice plants. Everything about the place betokened cultivated taste and a careful attention to order and neatness.

George Willoughby opened the door and went straight to the parlor, which at that hour of the day he found unoccupied. Gazing around for a moment with the dazed bewilderment of a man stupefied by an overwhelming sorrow he flung himself on a chair and hid his face in his hands. In that attitude his wife found him a few minutes afterwards. With womanly instinct she saw in the bowed form the signs of poignant suffering. Quietly she knelt down by her husband's side and gently, and with a caressing action rested her hands on his knee. The silent sympathy moved him more than words could have done. He would, in his nervous, irritated state, have resented questions, and though he loved his wife deeply, he would probably have answered her roughly. But this gentle, unobtrusive sympathy touched his heart, and with a sigh which was almost a groan he raised his head and putting an arm around her shoulders he drew her close to him, saying with heartfelt emotion, "Milly, dear, I am a ruined man."

The gentle affectionate woman did not faint or go into hysterics as George Willoughby expected she would under the shock. She did not, as wives too often do, upbraid him with carelessness or recklessness, or want of judgment, and remind him that when she left her father's house to share his fortunes he had promised to keep her in comfort. He had been dreading all day, since the knowledge of his misfortune had come to him, the task of breaking it to his wife, and now he had blurted it out with no preparation, and yet no reproach came from her lips. He was astonished. "Do you understand me, wife?" he said, "we are ruined, utterly ruined." "No, George," she said, "we are not utterly ruined, we cannot be that while we have our health, and our children are good and affectionate. All our money may be lost, but God has given us blessings better than money, and He has not suffered those to be taken from us."

"But, Milly," he said, "look around, your piano, my books and pictures, our beautiful home and our garden that we have watched and tended with so much pride and pleasure, they are ours no longer; and when they are sold they will barely pay our creditors a hundred cents on the dollar. The bank has suspended payment to-day, and every cent I have is there."

Even this crushing intelligence did not overwhelm the faithful wife. She was saying to herself as she listened: "This is the time for my husband to realize the worth of religion, and to see how it can sustain the heart in the day of trouble." George knew nothing of that blessed consolation. In his prosperity he had rejoiced in his own shrewdness, had regarded his success as the result of his own wisdom, and had taken from God's hand unthankfully all the good of life. He had often smiled contemptuously when his wife had spoken of God's kindness and had reminded her of Napoleon's saying that Providence was always on the side of the strongest battalions. She might trust in Providence, but he preferred to trust in his own smartness and energy. Now that both failed she was anxious to let him see that her faith survived the shock. Gently and lovingly she spoke words of courage and of hope, and at length was pleased to see that he was cheered by her undaunted spirit.

It was heart-breaking work to go through the house selecting such articles to be kept as were not likely to realize much at auction, but were precious to them for the sake of old association. It was still worse to see strangers making an inventory of the dear familiar household treasures, but though George's heart quailed under the trial the sight of his wife's patient, hopeful bearing encouraged him. When all was over, the goods sold, the creditors paid, and husband and wife sat in their poor boarding-house looking at the little pile of notes that remained to them, George asked her how it was that she, who was the weaker of the two, she who had never known poverty nor hardship, was able to bear this trial so much better than he. Milly knew that question would come sooner or later, and therefore she had said not a word to her husband through the two weeks of suffering, about religion or the source of her strength. This was her opportunity, the one for which she had waited. She took from the shelf her Bible, and with no other word of explanation read to her husband: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose heart is stayed on Thee: because he trusteth in Thee" (Isaiah 26: 3).

"Do you mean to say," said George, "that your religion has kept you from fretting?" "God has kept me from it," said his wife. "It is not my religion. I put my trust in Him, and He has kept me in peace as He said He would." "You speak, Milly, as though you knew God, and as if you thought He knew all about this trouble." "I do think so, George, and I have proof of His knowledge in the peace He has given me, which even you have noticed. He has kept His promise, that is all, and He always does that."

No more was said at that time, but the stricken man, who had put his trust in many things and relied on many men, and had been deceived and disappointed, was impressed by the thought that God had kept His promise, and he had seen how He had done so. The thought sank deep into his heart, and as he commenced life again in a humble way and gradually won his way back to prosperity he never forgot that view of God's character. It is a quarter of a century since George was ruined, but now, when white hairs outnumber the black ones on his head, and his wife has a grandchild on her knee, George recalls that troubled time with no association of sadness, for the lesson he learned then has changed the current of his life, and he is confident in the face of death and eternity, feeling certain that God will keep His promise, "as He always does."

PREACHING AT PAUL'S CROSS IN LONDON.

(See Illustration.)

AMONG the ancient edifices which were once well known in London, but which the growth of the enormous city has swept away, was Paul's Cross. This ancient memorial used to stand near the spot where St. Paul's Cathedral now stands, and on its site a large wholesale dry goods warehouse has been built. In the stormy days of the sixteenth century the great St. Paul's Cross was often resorted to for public meeting and discussion. The accompanying engraving represents the crowd listening to a popular orator who had taken his stand at "Paul's Cross." We find the following reference to it in Cassell's "Old and New London."

Preaching at Paul's Cross in London in 1521.

Kemp, who was the Yorkist bishop during all these troubled times, rebuilt St. Paul's Cross, which then became one of the chief ornaments of London. In 1521, Wolsey, 'Cardinal of St. Cecilia and Archbishop of York,' was welcomed by Dean Pace to St. Paul's. He had come to sit near Paul's Cross, to hear Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, by the Pope's command, denounce Martin Luther and his accursed works. At the first sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross, Dr. Bourne, a rash Essex clergyman, prayed for the dead, praised Bonner, and denounced Ridley. The mob, inflamed to madness, shouted, 'He preaches damnation! Pull him down! pull him down!' A dagger, thrown at the preacher, stuck quivering in a side-post of the pulpit. With difficulty two good men dragged the rash zealot safely into St. Paul's School. For this riot several persons were sent to the Tower, and a priest and a barber had their ears nailed to the Pillory at St. Paul's Cross. Yet not long after this, when a Dr. Pendleton preached Popish doctrines at St. Paul's Cross, a gun was fired at him.

The last event of Queen Mary's blood-stained reign was the celebration at St. Paul's of the victory over the French at the battle of St. Quintin by Philip and the Spaniards. A sermon was preached at Paul's Cross, and bonfires blazed in every street."

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 126.)

After Many Years.

THE busy, monotonous years ran through their course tranquilly, marked only by a change of residence from the narrow little house suited to Felicity's slender means, to a larger, more commodious, and more fashionable dwelling-place in a West End square. Both Felicity and Phebe had won their share of public favor and a fair measure of fame; and the new home was chosen partly on account of an artist's studio with a separate entrance, through which Phebe could go in and out, and admit her visitors and sitters, in independence of the rest of the household.

Never once had Felix wavered in his desire to take orders and become a clergyman, from the time his boyish imagination had been fired by the stories of his great-grandfather's perils and labors in the Jura. Felicity had looked coldly on his resolution, having a quiet contempt for English clergymen, in spite of her friendship for Mr. Pascal, if friendship it could be called. For each year as it passed over Felicity left her in a separation from her fellow-creatures, always growing more chill and dreary. It seemed to herself as if her tongue was losing even the use of language, and that only with her pen could she find vent in expression.

And these written thoughts of hers, printed and published for any eye to read, how unutterably empty of all but bitterness she found them. She almost marvelled at the popularity of her own books. How could it be that the cynical, scornful pictures she drew of human nature and human fellowship could be read so eagerly? She felt ashamed of her children seeing them, lest they should learn to distrust all men's truth and honor; and she would not suffer a word to be said about them in her own family.

But Madame Sefton, in her failing old age, was always ready to sympathize with Felix, and to help to keep him steady to her own simple faith; and Phebe was on the same side. These two women, with their quiet, unquestioning trust in God, and sweet charity toward their fellow-men, did more for Felix than all the opposing influences of college life could undo; and when his grandmother's peaceful and happy death set the last seal on her truthful life, Felix devoted himself with renewed earnestness to the career he had chosen. To enter the lists in the battle against darkness, and ignorance, and sin, wherever these foes were to be met in close quarters, was his ambition; and the enthusiasm with which he followed it made Felicity smile, yet sigh with unutterable bitterness, as she looked into the midnight gloom of her own soul.

It became quite plain to Felicity as the years passed by that her son was no genius. At present there was a freshness and singleness of purpose about him, which, with the charm of his handsome young face, and the genial simplicity of his manners, made him everywhere a favorite, and carried him into circles where a graver man and a deeper thinker could not find entrance; but let twenty years pass by, and Felix, she said to herself, would be nothing but a commonplace country clergyman, looking after his glebe lands and riding lazily about his parish, talking with old women and consulting farmers about his crops and cattle. She felt disappointed in him; and this disappointment removed him far away from her. The enchanted circle of her own isolation was complete.

The subtle influence of Felicity's dissatisfaction was vaguely felt by Felix. He had done well at Oxford, and had satisfied his friend and tutor, Mr. Pascal; but he knew that his mother wished him to make a great name there, and he had failed to do it. Every day, when he spent a few minutes in Felicity's library, lined with books which were her only companions, their conversation grew more and more vapid, unless his mother gave utterance to some of her sarcastic sayings, which he only half understood and altogether disliked.

But in Phebe's studio all was different; he was at home there. Though it was separate from the house it had from the first been the favorite haunt of all the other members of the family. Madame had been wont to bring her knitting and sit beside Phebe's easel, talking of old times, and of the dear son she had lost so sorrowfully. Felix had read his schoolboy stories aloud to her while she was painting; and Hilda fitted in and out restlessly, carrying every bit of news she picked up from her girl friends to Phebe. Even Felicita was used to steal in silently in the dusk, when no one else was there, and talk in her low sad voice as she talked to no one else.

As soon as Felix was old enough, within a few months of Madame's death, he took orders, and accepted a curacy in a poor and densely populated London district. It was not much more than two miles from home, but it was considered advisable that he should take lodgings near his vicar's church, and dwell in the midst of the people with whom he had to do. The separation was not so complete as if he had gone into a country parish, but it brought another blank into the home, which had not yet ceased to miss the tranquil and quiet presence of the old grandmother.

"I shall not have to fight with wolves like Felix Merle, my great-grandfather," said Felix, the evening before he left home, as he and Phebe were sitting over her studio fire. "I think sometimes I ought to go out as a missionary to some wild country. Yet there are dangers to meet here in London, and risks to run; ay! and battles to fight. I shall have a good fist for drunken men beating helpless women in my parish. I couldn't stand by and see a woman ill-used without striking a blow, could I, Phebe?"

"I hope you'll strike as few blows as you can," she answered smiling.

"How could I help standing up for a woman when I think of my mother, and you, and little Hilda, and her who is gone?" asked Felix.

"Is there nobody else?" inquired Phebe, with a mischievous tone in her pleasant voice.

"When I think of the good women I have known," he answered evasively, "the sweet, true, noble women, I feel my blood boil at the thought of any man ill-using any woman. Phebe, I can just remember my father speaking of it with the utmost contempt and anger, with a fire in his eyes and a sternness in his voice which made me tremble with fear. He was in a righteous passion; it was the other side of his worship of my mother."

"He was always kind and tender towards all women," answered Phebe. "All the Seftons have been like that; they could never be harsh to any women. But your father almost worshipped the ground your mother trod upon; nothing on earth was good enough for her. Look here, my dear boy, I've been trying to paint a picture for you."

She lifted up a stretcher which had been turned with the canvas to the wall, and placed it on her easel in the full light of a shaded lamp. For a moment she stood between him and it, gazing at it with tears in her blue eyes. Then she fell back to his side to look at it with him, clasping his hand in hers, and holding it in a warm, fond grasp.

It was a portrait of Roland Sefton, painted from her faithful memory, which had been aided by a photograph taken when he was the same age Felix was now. Phebe could only see it dimly through her tears, and for a moment or two both of them were silent.

"My father!" said Felix, his face flushing and his voice faltering; "is it like him, Phebe? Yes, yes! I recollect him now, only he looked happier or merrier than he does there. There is something sad about his face that I do not remember. What a king he was among men! I'm not worthy to be the son of such a man and such a woman."

"No, no; don't say that," she answered eagerly; "you're not as handsome, or as strong, or as clever as he was; but you may be as good a man—yes a better man."

She spoke with a deep, low sigh that was almost a sob, as the memory of how she had seen him last—crushed under a weight of sin and flying from the penalty of crime—flashed across her brain. She knew now why there had lurked a subtle sadness in the face she had been painting, which she had not been able to overcome.

"I think," she said, as if speaking to herself, "that the sense of sin links us to God almost as closely as love does. I never understood Jesus Christ until I knew something of the wickedness of the world, and the frailty of our nature at its best.

It is when a good man has to cry, 'Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight,' that we feel something of the awful sinfulness of sin."

"And have you this sense of sin, Phebe?" asked Felix in a low voice. "I have thought sometimes that you, and my mother, and men like my father and Mr. Pascal, felt but little of the inward strength of sin. Your lives stand out so clear and true. If there is a stain upon them it is so slight, so plainly a defect of the physical nature, that it often seems to me you do not know what evil is."

"We all know it," she answered; "and that shadow of sorrow you see in your father's face must bear witness for him to you that he has passed through the same conflict you may be fighting. The sins of good men are greater than the sins of bad men. One lie from a truthful man is more hurtful than all the lies of a liar. The sins of the man after God's own heart have done more harm than all the crimes of all the Pagan emperors."

"It is true," he said thoughtfully.

"If I told you a falsehood, what would you think of me?"

"I believe it would almost break my heart if you or my mother told me a falsehood," he answered.

"I could not paint this portrait while your grandmother was living," said Phebe, after a short silence: "I tried it once or twice, but I could never succeed. See; here is the photograph your father gave me when I was quite a little girl, because I cried so bitterly at his going away for a few months on his wedding trip. There were only two taken, and your mother has the other. They were both very young; he was only your age, and your mother was not twenty. But Lord Riversford was dead, and she was not happy with her cousins; and your grandfather, who was living then, was eager for the match. Everybody said it was a great match for your father."

"They were very happy; they were not too young to be married," answered Felix, with a deep flush on his handsome face. "Why should not people marry young, if they love one another?"

"I would ask Canon Pascal that question if I were you," she said, smiling significantly.

"I have a good mind to ask him to-night," he replied, stooping down to kiss Phebe's cheek; "he is at Westminster, and Alice is there too. Bid me good-speed, Phebe."

"God bless you, my Felix," she whispered.

He turned abruptly away, though he lingered for a minute or two longer, gazing at his father's portrait. How like, and yet how unlike him, he was in Phebe's eyes! Then, with a gentle pressure of her hand, he went away in silence; while she took down the painting, and set it again with its face to the wall, lest Felicita coming in should catch a sight of it.

The massive pile of the old Abbey stood darkly against the sky, with not a glimmer of light shining through its many windows; while behind it the Houses of Parliament, now in full session, glittered from roof to basement with innumerable lamps. All about them there was the rush and rattle of busy life, but the Abbey seemed inclosed in a magic circle of solitude and stillness. Overhead a countless host of little clouds covered the sky, with fine threads and interspaces of dark blue lying between them. The moon, pale and bright, seemed to be drifting slowly among them, sometimes behind them, and faintly veiled by their light vapor; but more often the little clouds made way for her, and clustered round, in a circle of vaguely outlined cherub heads, golden brown in the halo she shed around her. These child-like angel-heads, floating over the greater part of the sky, seemed pressing forward, one behind the other, and hastening into the narrow ring of light, with a gentle eagerness; and fading softly away as the moon passed by.

Felix stood still for a minute or two looking up from the dark and silent front of the Abbey to the silent and swiftly moving clouds above it. Almost every stone of the venerable old walls was familiar and dear to him. For Phebe, when she came from the broad, grand solitude of her native moors, had fixed at once upon the Abbey as the one spot in London where she could find something of the repose she had been accustomed to meet with in the sight of the far-stretching horizon, and the unbroken vault of heaven over-arching it. Felicita, too, had attended the cathedral service every Sunday morning, since she had been wealthy enough to set up a carriage, which was the first luxury she had allowed herself. The music, the chants, the dim light of the colored windows, the long aisle of lofty arches, and the many persistent and dominant associations taking possession of her memory and imagination, made the Abbey almost as dear to Felicita, as its mysterious and sacred repose to Phebe.

Felix had paced along the streets with rapid and headlong haste, but now he hesitated before turning into Dean's Yard. When he did so, he sauntered round the enclosure two or three times, wondering in what words he could best move the Canon, and framing half a dozen speeches in his mind, which seemed ridiculous to himself when he whispered them half aloud. At last, with a sudden determination to trust to the inspiration of the moment, he turned his steps hurriedly into the dark, low arches of the cloisters.

But he had not many steps to take. The tall, somewhat stooping figure of Canon Pascal, so familiar to him, was leaning through one of the archways, with head upturned to the little field of sky above the quadrangle, where the moon was to be seen with her attendant clouds. Felix could see every line in his strongly marked features, and the deep furrows which lay between his thick brows. The tinge of gray in his dark hair was visible in the moonlight, or rather the pale gleam caused all his hair to seem silvery. His eyes were glistening with delight, and as he heard steps pausing at his side, he turned, and at the sight of Felix his harsh face melted into almost a womanly smile of greeting.

"Welcome, my son," he said, in a pleasant and deep voice, "you are just in time to share this glorious sight with me. Pity 'tis it vanishes so soon!"

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 127.)

Exposition by the Early Fathers—Victorinus—Primasius—Modern Expositors—Dr. Burgh—Antichrist will Demand Sincere Worship—Bishop Horsley—The Pruning of the Vine—The Opinion of Revs. Bickersteth and Birks—The Reduplicated Year-Day Fulfillments—The Week Divided Off.

Victorinus, Bishop of Pettau, in Austria, and one of the Diocletian martyrs, wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse about A.D. 290. He is stated, in Elliott's "Appendix on the History of Prophetic Interpretation," and in Maitland's "Apostles' School of Prophecy" (p. 202), to have held the latter half of Daniel's 70th week to be identical with Antichrist's future three and a half years' persecution, and therefore all the 70th week to be yet unfulfilled. He says of this persecution, 'The black horse (under the 3d seal, Rev. 6: 5), means famine, for the Lord says, 'There shall be famine in divers places.' Now this saying properly extends to the time of Antichrist, when there will be a great famine, by which all men shall suffer.

In the trumpets and vials there are described the execution wrought by the plagues sent upon the world, the madness of Antichrist himself, the blasphemy of the people, the variety of their plagues, the hope in the kingdom of the saints, the fall of the cities, and the fall of that great city, Babylon, that is Rome. . . . The Lord says in the Gospel, 'Then let them which be in Judea flee to the mountains,' that is, let as many as are gathered together in Judea, go to that place which is prepared for them, and be nourished there for three years and six months from the face of the devil (Rev. 12: 14, 15). The water which the serpent casts out of his mouth, represents the army which he will send in pursuit of her. By the earth opening its mouth and swallowing the waters, is shown the vengeance that will be inflicted at the moment.

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders," By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, $1.

"The false prophet will cause a golden image to be set up to Antichrist in the temple of Jerusalem, and into this image the vagabond angel will enter, emitting voices and oracles. He will also cause both bond and free to receive a mark on their foreheads, or on their right hands, even, the name, that none may buy or sell without it. Now Daniel had foretold this abomination and provocation, saying, 'He will set up his temple upon the glorious and holy mountain; that is, he will then set up in Jerusalem an image, such as Nebuchadnezzar made. This the Lord explains, admonishing his churches against the last times and dangers, saying, 'When ye shall see the abomination spoken of by Daniel the prophet standing in the holy place,' etc. (Matt. 24 : 15; Dan. 11 : 45.)

Primasius, Bishop of the Carthaginian Province (A.D. 500), who published a treatise on the Apocalypse, similarly considered Daniel's 70th week to be the last seven years of the Christian era, ending with Christ's descent to destroy Antichrist, whose three and a half years' universal reign would be the latter half of the 70th week (as stated in Elliot's "Appendix on the History of Prophetic Interpretation"); this seems to have been the case also with other writers in the primitive Church, such as Barnabas, etc.

The Rev. Dr. Burgh, of the Church of England, published some able lectures on the Second Advent, in Dublin in 1830-32, and also subsequently a very useful literal-day Exposition of the Revelation, both giving the same interpretation of Dan. 9 : 27. In the former he says :

"That Antichrist sets up 'the abomination of desolation' in Matthew 24 : 15, is proved from the prophecies of Daniel, alluded to by the Lord Jesus. 'The abomination of desolation' is twice spoken of by Daniel in his continuous prophecy of chapters 10, 11, 12, but it is very important to observe that the two notices, though rather far asunder, are one; the first foretelling 'the setting up,' and the other, 'the duration' of the abomination, (Dan. 11 : 31; 12 : 11.) The whole prophecy of these chapters, it will be observed, respects what should befall Daniel's people in the latter days (Dan. 10 : 14).

"Another mention of

THE ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION

by Daniel is in connection with the prophecy of the Seventy Weeks (Dan. 9 : 24-27). Whatever difficulty there may be in forming a connected view of this prophecy, there is one thing about which I think there can be no doubt, viz., that it extends to the Second Advent of Christ, and includes its objects, as well as those of the First. For independent of the words 'unto Messiah the Prince,' perhaps 'the determination upon Daniel's people and holy city'—'the finishing of transgression, making an end of sins and reconciliation for iniquity,' are expressions which in their application to the Jewish nation must be referred to another time than the First Advent, which was a day of vengeance to them, and the infliction of a judgment under which they still remain. The whole period is seventy weeks (i.e. 'sevens,' or periods of seven years), and this period is divided into parts of 62 and 7 and 1. The 'sixty-two,' we are informed (verse 26), reach to the First Coming and death of Christ.

"There is yet one week to be accounted for, the last of the seventy, which we perceive is considered in the prophecy distinct from the 'sixty-two' and 'seven.' The events of this last week are stated in verses 26, 27. 'The prince that shall come,' I take to be the last enemy of the Jewish people, the last invader of the holy city, 'the Antichrist.' His confirming the covenant with many for one seven (seven years), I think is the same 'league' and 'deceitful working' and 'corruption by flattery' mentioned in Daniel 11 : 23, 32, by which it would appear he will impose himself on many of the Jews and delude them, as the event proves, to their destruction.

"For half of the week (three and a half years) he is true to this covenant; but he then breaks it, and for the last half, the remaining three and a half years, 'the time, times, and a half,' 42 months,' or '1260 days,' he causes the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the 'overspreading of abominations he makes desolate,' or as the words evidently imply and another prophecy has expressed it, 'he places the abomination that maketh desolate.' That this last 'half-week' applies to the times of Antichrist I find to have been the opinion of the ancient fathers, as, for instance, Irenaeus, Julius Africanus, Hippolytus the martyr, and Apollinaris Bishop of Laodicea" (pp. 140, 147, 152).

Dr. Burgh, like other literal-day expositors, understands "the temple of God" in which the Man of Sin is to sit (2 Thess. 2) to be the rebuilt temple at Jerusalem, in which the Jews will offer sacrifices soon after making the covenant. He also considers that the final Antichristian apostasy will be far worse and more terrible than Popery; and that Antichrist's persecution and slaughter of the saints, who will not worship his image during the last half-week, or three and a half years, will prevail not merely in the Roman earth, but throughout all Christendom, until Christ's descent at Armageddon" (pp. 117, 181).

He says: "No indecision of character or profession, no slackness of devotion or service, no merely nominal religion will be allowed; but his (Antichrist's) pretensions will be enforced by the alternative of life or death, and 'as many as will not worship him shall be killed.' In a word, he will realize his prophetic name of 'Antichrist'—denying Christ, by saying that he is the Christ; denying God, by saying he is the true God—owned by the unbelieving Jew as the Messiah, the Hope of Israel, and taking the wise of the Gentiles in their own craftiness, administering to their pride of reason, and desire for external evidence, 'deceiving them that dwell on the earth by means of the miracles which he doeth' (Rev. 13).

"That a monster of iniquity and blasphemy should accomplish the times of the Gentiles, and precede the establishment of Messiah's kingdom, was apprehended, more or less distinctly, even by the Jews of old, to whom the name 'Antichrist' (i.e. Anti-Messiah) was not unknown; but was fully acknowledged by the first believers in Christianity. Type and prophecy alike foreboded with a wicked one, the fulfiller and consummator of transgression, and thence also of divine indignation—the rod of chastisement to 'the holy people,' and at the same time the scourge of the apostate nations.

A LAST STRUGGLE

"The character of this enemy, moreover, as gathered from the prophecies, was, in general, that he should rival all his types and predecessors in tyranny, blasphemy, and oppression; that he should be supported by a confederacy of the nations, while his fury should be principally directed (as was that of all his precursors) against Israel; and that he should ultimately fall before Messiah standing up to avenge His people 'on the mountains and in the land of Israel,' and by means altogether superhuman.

"The words of Bishop Horsley are well worthy of attention. 'The Son of Perdition, who is to rise out of an open, undisguised apostasy. That Son of Perdition, who shall be neither a Protestant nor a Papist; neither Christian, Jew, nor heathen; who shall worship neither God, angel, nor saint; who will neither supplicate the Invisible Majesty of heaven, nor fall down before an idol. He will magnify himself against everything that is called God, or is worshipped; and with a bold flight of impiety, soaring far above his precursors and types in the times of Paganism—the Sennacheribs, the Nebuchadnezzars, the Antiochuses, and the heathen emperors, will claim divine honors to himself exclusively, and consecrate an image of himself.' Bishop Horsley adds: 'I doubt not but this monster will be made an instrument of that pruning which the vine (Isa. 18 : 5) must undergo.'

The late Rev. Edward Bickersteth and Rev. T. R. Birks, Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, and both of them leading evangelical clergymen of the Church of England, unitedly wrote the chapter on chronological prophecies in Bickersteth's Guide to the Prophecies, published in 1839. The eminent piety, profound research into prophecy, and unsurpassed soundness of judgment of Bickersteth, give great weight to his views. They both affirmed their belief that Christ would come to remove the Philadelphian saints, or Wise Virgins, before the last three and a half years; for they remarked upon Rev. 13 : 18 :

"Just before Daniel's time of blessedness, there is left a period of half a week, mentioned in Dan. 9 : 27, for the infidel persecution, from which the Philadelphian church is saved (Rev. 3 : 10, 18-21); but the Laodicean part is left in it to be purified, and to be the last gathering of the Church to the marriage supper."

Bickersteth, although a staunch year-day expositor, admitted that there would probably be an ultimate reduplicated literal fulfilment of many parts of Daniel and Revelation in connection with the last infidel Antichrist, who, as Birks maintained from Dan. 11, will be worshipped, as God, in the rebuilt temple at Jerusalem. The following extract is from Bickersteth's "Guide to the Prophecies" (7th edition), by which it will be seen that he distinctly held the important interpretation that, according to the Hebrew, the 70 weeks are cut off from the 2300 days, i.e. from their commencing part, and therefore begin at the same starting point as the 2300 days.

"One of the most important

CHRONOLOGICAL PROPHECIES

is that of the 70 weeks of Daniel. The period from which this era is to be reckoned is to be gathered from 'the vision' of the previous eighth chapter of Daniel, of which it is stated to be the explanation. (See Daniel 9 : 23.) In that vision Daniel asks the question: (8 13, 14). How long shall the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot; and he is answered, Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. The first renewing of the sacrifice, as we find (Ezra 7 : 12, 23), was under the decree of Artaxerxes, 457 years before Christ. That decree was directly connected with the building of the temple, and the restoration of worship and the sacrifices. Of the whole period of 2300 years, seventy weeks of years were determined, or cut off, from the restoration of the daily sacrifice to the completing of the perfect sacrifice of Christ, when the Most Holy was anointed; (Heb. 1 : 9, 9 : 24).

"The commencement of the sixty-nine weeks is stated to be from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. There are three periods, (1) seven weeks, (2) sixty-two weeks, (3) one week. From Artaxerxes' decree unto Messiah was 483 years. For seven weeks, or forty-nine of those years, constituting a jubilee (a sacred measure of time), there are predicted troubled times, as we may judge by the history of Nehemiah there really were, till the Jewish polity was settled. This seems to be one reason mentioned for the separation of the first seven weeks from the sixty-two.

"Then follow the sixty-two weeks, which will reach to the time when the Messiah was to be cut off, and (as it is in the margin) the Jews were to be no more His people. We have, then, in verse 26, an indefinite period, the events of which are the destruction of the city and temple by the Romans, and the Jewish desolation. This desolation was to last, as we learn by other prophecies, till the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. (Matt. 23 : 38; Luke 21 : 24.)

"In verse 27 we have the additional week of seven years at the close of the times of the Gentiles, when the people of Israel are again taken into covenant. This week is divided into two parts. The character of the first half-week seems to be set out (Isa. 66 : 1, 3), where the Jews are represented as, in a self-righteous spirit, rebuilding the temple and offering sacrifices; and the character of the second half, or dividing of the week, answers to Isaiah 66 : 4-6, where they are represented as under the terror of the infidel Antichrist, who causes the sacrifice to cease; and at the close is the consummation, in the destruction of that Antichrist, as set before us Isaiah 10 : 23, 25; 2 Thess. 2 : 8."

(To be continued.)

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Two Houses of the British Parliament are in opposition. In the Hereditary Chamber the Liberals have seldom been in a majority, and at the present time they constitute but a comparatively small minority. It was therefore easy for the Conservatives, aided as they were by lords who own estates in Ireland, to pass a motion which was equivalent to a vote of censure on the Irish policy of the government. It was moved by the Earl of Donoughmore and was for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the working of the recent legislation in reference to land in Ireland. The implied expression of opinion that the Land act was not working satisfactorily irritated the government, and on February 20th Mr. Gladstone gave notice in the House of Commons of his intention to move that an inquiry into the working of the Land act would be injurious to the interests of good government in Ireland. This was denounced as "an attempt to gag the House of Lords." But the Lords were not to be so intimidated, and on February 23d a committee was appointed composed of Liberals and Conservatives. There is much excitement on the subject in the Radical section of the Liberal party and an agitation has been commenced, not for the abolition of the upper chamber, but for making it a purely deliberative body and depriving it of the power of interfering with the legislation of the lower house. The Radicals are the more earnest in this effort because they are anxious to introduce an act dealing with land in England in the same way as in Ireland, and they cannot hope to pass such a law while the House of Lords retains the power to veto the decision of the Commons.

Mr. Bradlaugh made Another Attempt Last week to take his seat in the British House of Commons. On February 21st he entered the House, walked up to the table and taking a Testament from his own pocket took the oath prescribed by the forms of the House; he then signed the roll and took his seat. The Speaker immediately ordered him to withdraw. Mr. Bradlaugh obeyed, but in a short time returned and went to a seat. The Speaker then directed him again to retire, when he moved to another seat. The following day he again took a seat. This was regarded as an act of disobedience and a motion was made by Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Conservatives, that Mr. Bradlaugh should be expelled. The motion was carried by a vote of 291 to 83. Mr. Bradlaugh then withdrew and another election was ordered by the House.

The Election of Michael Davitt as Member of Parliament for Meath is an expression of the intense antipathy prevalent in Ireland to the English government. Mr. Davitt originated and organized the Land League, and he is therefore the chief of the agitators. His imprisonment, however, is considered by the constitutional lawyers as rendering him ineligible, and it is expected that when the papers of the election are presented, Mr. Gladstone will move that the election shall be declared void and a new writ be issued.

The Pope has Issued Instructions to the bishops of Italy which show that the policy of the Romish Church has not been altered by the events of modern times. In his circular letter the Pope commands the bishops, in view of the dangers surrounding the Church, to increase their activity, to encourage Catholic societies among the laity, to develop the Catholic press, and to advocate boldly the temporal independence of the Pope.

Some Uncharitable Criticisms on Lieut. Danenhower's conduct in staring homeward before his companions of the Jeannette expedition had been found, have elicited from him an explanation. He cables as follows: "Melville is in command with written orders which cover the case of separation. My eyes being disabled the captain ordered me on the sick list against my will and protest. I was retained in the boat to assist in navigation and seamanship. On reaching blue water my eyes became better. I took the boat safely through the gale to the Lena River without chart, compass, or instrument. I was the first man to start in search of my comrades and to spread the news among the natives before Noros or Neiderman was found. I accepted duty under Engineer Melville for the general welfare of the party and have done my utmost. I am here in obedience to positive orders. An oculist here says that my left eye is ruined, but the right one will be well in a few days. I have not backed out and would lose my right eye to find De Long." It is stated by other members of the party that Danenhower's mind suffered under the protracted strain, and that for a time he was delirious, but has now recovered the use of his faculties.

News of the Capture of a Fort by the Herzegovinians is published. The intelligence is given guardedly, as it was received from insurgent sources. The fort in question is Fort Ustikolina. It is not only a strong fortress but it has the additional advantage of commanding a defile of the Upper Drina. The interest excited by the struggle throughout Europe is noteworthy. The Sultan of Turkey, in order to prove his friendliness for Austria, has ordered the concentration of several battalions of troops at Mitrowitz to prevent the Albanians from aiding in the insurrection. While in Spain the sympathy of the government with Austria is also strongly manifested. A dispatch from Madrid says that Señor Emilio Castelar has published an article in which he expresses fears of a coming Slav invasion of Europe, and declares that it behooves the Latin races, in the interest of civilization, to enter into a close alliance with the German people. Thus the question of race has come prominently to the front and threatens to divide Europe in the way indicated in prophecy.

El Mehdi, the Mahommedan Leader who is at the head of the revolt against the Turkish Sultan, has achieved two important successes. A correspondent of the New York Herald telegraphs from Cairo under date of February 22d, the following details of the movement: "With the exception of a few fortified stations El Mehdi is master of the whole country of the Soudan, and is backed by all the Bagara tribes, numbering about ten thousand fighting men. They are armed with double-barrelled percussion guns, but their chief weapon is a remarkably long, heavy, and admirably made lance. They are excellent horsemen. Everything will remain at a standstill in the Soudan until the arrival of reinforcements from Cairo, which have been imperatively demanded." El Mehdi has, it appears, gained two important victories over the Egyptian troops sent against him. It is improbable that the main body of the Egyptian army will take the field, as the soldiers are too busy attending to the doings of their own Assembly of Notables and engaging in political agitation to undertake military duty. It is believed that should El Mehdi succeed in depriving the Sultan of his spiritual authority he would soon lose his imperial power also.

The Great Trial of Accused Nihilists commenced in St. Petersburg on February 22d. There are twenty-three prisoners, of whom ten are citizens and thirteen are "of gentle birth." Only twenty appeared at the tribunal, the other three having become demented under the ordeal of the Russian prisons. Several of the accused are under twenty years of age, and the oldest of them is only thirty-four. With two exceptions the prisoners all pleaded guilty. One of them, who had served in the navy and who is a man of education and refinement, gave his reasons for becoming a Nihilist. He said: "I met in Siberia numbers of innocent exiles whose undeserved sufferings had reduced them to second childhood. My sister," he added, "was transported to Siberia when enccinte, and was prematurely delivered of a still-born child. Then at last the stifling moral atmosphere I had to breathe became unbearable to me. Go where I would, both in the navy and in society, I found falsehood, wrong, and tyranny in their foulest and most odious forms. They drove me at length to turn terrorist. I was a terrorist in the extreme sense of the word, ready to serve any one, no matter whom, so long as he was a terrorist like myself." The public executioner, who is a prisoner in a jail at Moscow, has been sent for to St. Petersburg. The inference drawn from that step is that it is intended to pass sentence of death on at least some of the prisoners.

The Disaster at the Ring Theatre in Vienna is to be made the subject of a criminal trial. On February 25th copies of an indictment covering twenty-six folios were handed to eight persons charged with contributing, by their negligence, to the fire. Two hundred and twenty-six witnesses have been summoned. The trial will commence on the 2d of May. Among the accused are the ex-Burgomaster of Vienna, the manager of the Ring Theatre, and the Chief Commissary of the Police.

The Sale of the Mabilie Garden in Paris is announced. The place has long been notorious through Europe as the haunt of vice. Its habitues, its dances, and songs have been described as the most indecent in the world, and there is general gratification among the more reputable of Parisian citizens at the announcement of its sale. The purchasers intend using it for building purposes, and its demolition is to be commenced forthwith.

The Princess of Wales has Sent her Photograph to King Kalakaua, the king of the Sandwich Islands, together with those of her sons, to be sold at a bazaar which will be held in Honolulu, for the purpose of raising funds to build a cathedral in that city.

"Coming Wars," by the Rev. M. Baxter. Two Pamphlets; price five cents each by mail. First Pamphlet contains "Ten Signs of the End, and Description of Approaching Events;" with two maps of the territory to be under Antichrist's rule, and four large diagrams. Second Pamphlet contains valuable quotations from twenty-six Expositors on the same subject. Address, with price inclosed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

"The Treasury of David:" by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. A homiletical exposition of the Book of Psalms. Vol. II., comprising psalms 27 to 52; Vol. III., psalms 53 to 78; Vol. IV., psalms 79 to 103. We have not the other volumes. Price $3 a volume, postage free. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

BY THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, MARCH 9, 1882.

16th Year. No. 10.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

TRAITS OF BARON ROTHSCHILD AND SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE, and Pictures of Scenes in the Recent Jewish Persecution in Russia. "FORWARD!" Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday morning. PH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Cuffe" (Continued). THE PROPHETIC ASPECT OF THE JEWISH PERSECUTIONS. By Charles Reade.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Cont'd). CURRENT EVENTS: The Eulogy on the Late President—The Confirmation in the Senate—The Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill—More Star-Route Idiots—The Mississippi Floods—Anthony Comstock on Corrupt Literature—A Painful Suspicion Removed—An Exchange of Infants—Six Days at Sea on an Ice-box—Relief in Answer to Prayer, etc. PICTURE OF CONNAUGHT INSTITUTE, AND PORTRAIT OF ITS FOUNDER.

OUR LORD'S TRIAL BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. A MOTHER'S GRAVE (with Illustration). Power over Disease and Death. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter. COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued). FOREIGN TOPICS: Attempted Assassination of the Queen of England—Bradlaugh's Re-election—Trials of the Nihilists—A Living Life-Buoy, etc.

Baron LIONEL ROTHSCHILD and Sir MOSES MONTEFIORE—Scenes in Russia During the Recent Persecution of the Jews.

TWO EMINENT JEWISH FAMILIES.

THE extraordinary revival of antipathy to the Jews which has been witnessed recently in Russia and Germany, has directed public attention anew to this remarkable race. In bygone times the Jew was persecuted wherever he was found. Plundered of his property, driven from his home, he had to fly from his persecutors to escape imprisonment, torture, and death. There is no country in Europe whose history is not stained by records of Jewish persecution, and no statute book that does not bear on its pages enactments framed to prevent Jews obtaining and exercising rights and privileges accorded to other citizens.

But it has been the custom of those who vaunt the progress of the world and boast of the advanced civilization of the nineteenth century to speak of these persecutions as the characteristics of a barbarous age, characteristics which disappeared before the light of knowledge and culture. It is a vain boast. Within a few months there has appeared in Germany an agitation led by a court preacher who actually calls himself a Christian minister, having for its object the deprivation of Jewish citizens of their social and commercial rights. But still worse than that is the outbreak in Russia, in which incendiarism, outrage, and murder ran riot with the connivance of the government officials. We have in recent issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD given some account of these disgraceful scenes, and we now give on our first page a picture of some of the incidents that occurred. In connection with these we give portraits of two men very eminent and sincerely respected throughout the world. They are Baron Nathaniel de Rothschild, the head of the famous banking house which is believed to have no equal for wealth in any nation, and of Sir Moses Montefiore, the patriotic and devoted benefactor of his people.

As we think of the past history of this chosen race as revealed in the Old Testament, and in their future as revealed in prophecy, we are irresistibly interested in all that concerns them. While we deplore the darkness which still envelopes them, and "the veil that whenever Moses is read, is still over their hearts," we cannot forget that the time is near at hand when they will "look upon Him whom they pierced and mourn," when they will see in Jesus the Messiah, "Great David's greater Son," and will accept Him as their Saviour and King. Our dearest associations are linked with them by many chains. We read their literature in our churches; the poetry most familiar to our ears was penned by their inspired poets; in one of their families appeared Him whom we love and worship; it was for them our Lord prayed in His last agonized moments, and it was of them He thought when, in the hour of parting from His disciples and ascending into heaven, He gave special command that the glorious Gospel should be first preached in Jerusalem. It is with them too that the glories of the millennial reign of Christ are most closely associated. Thus the past and the future unite in rendering the Jew an object of serious and prayerful interest to every intelligent Christian.

THE ROTHSCHILDS.

BARON NATHANIEL DE ROTHSCHILD, whose portrait appears on our first page, is the present head of the great Rothschild family. He is a son of the late Baron Lionel de Rothschild, who for many years represented the City of London in the British Parliament. He is the head of the great banking firm of Rothschild & Sons, in succession to his uncle, the late Sir Anthony de Rothschild, whose title he also inherits, and is well known as a most generous supporter of all philanthropic enterprises, having for their object the alleviation of poverty and suffering. While the members of his own race and faith have the first claim upon his attention, they do not monopolize it, for he is always ready to aid those who are in trouble whatever their race or faith.

He is at present the President of the Jews' Free School in London, where about 3000 children are being educated. He is also the President of the United Synagogue (a confederation of the principal London synagogues), and occupies a similar honorable and influential position in connection with the Great Synagogue, one of the synagogues comprised in the above-named confederation. He is highly esteemed in Aylesbury, where he resides, and he has for several years been its chosen representative in the Imperial Parliament. He is a Liberal in politics. As may be expected, he takes a deep interest in the sufferings of his outraged compatriots in Russia, and, with two other members of his family, has given a sum of no less than $75,000 to the fund now being raised for the alleviation of their distress.

Sir Nathaniel de Rothschild is a great-grandson of THE FOUNDER OF THE HOUSE.

This was Meyer Anselm Rothschild, who was born in "The Jews' Alley," at Frankfort-on-the-Main, in 1743. Meyer was intended by his father for the ministry, and was sent when only thirteen years of age to Fürth, in Bavaria, to study the Talmud, preparatory to becoming a rabbi. But Meyer's genius was not suited to the study of Talmudical lore, and he soon abandoned the profession and devoted his attention to financial pursuits. Herr Oppenheim, a banker of Hanover, gave him a clerkship in his office, and thus, on the lowest round of the ladder, he commenced his career. He soon gave evidence of his abilities, and in a few years became associate manager of the bank. He afterward commenced business on his own account and laid the foundation of his enormous fortune. One of his most remarkable achievements was the skillful manner in which he took care of forty million dollars, the property of the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel. This sum he held when Napoleon confiscated the Landgrave's estates, and when, eight years afterward, the Landgrave applied for the money it was handed over to him with interest. Meyer Rothschild was dead by that time, but his eldest son, Anselm, faithfully accounted for every kreutzer of the amount.

Meyer Rothschild lived to be seventy years of age. He died in the old house in the Jews' Alley amid the lamentations of innumerable friends who owed to him more than was ever known. His long life had been one of unstinted kindness, and throughout the Jewish quarter especially, he had given money with a lavish hand to help whenever he was satisfied it would be wisely employed. He left ten children, five sons and five daughters. The five sons were Anselm, Solomon, Nathan, Charles, and James. Of these the most conspicuous was the third son, who was born in 1777. He was sent to England in the year 1800 to found an English branch of the house, as his brothers had respectively founded one in Vienna and another in Paris. An interesting story is related of Nathan having been at the battle of Waterloo and having hurried back to England to make investments; but it is not true. Carrier pigeons were used, there being no telegraphs to carry news of the battle, and Rothschild by that means learned how the English prospered. He bought government securities at low prices, from the terrified capitalists who believed that Napoleon would certainly conquer England, and when the news came of the victory and the funds rose, Rothschild was in possession of riches to a fabulous amount. A friend of the family who visited the house during some disturbances in London was admitted to Lady Rothschild's private sitting-room, and there saw temporarily placed for security under the carpet, on the floor of the room, solid bars of gold, so that she and her children literally trod on a golden pavement.

NATHAN MEYER,

The next generation of the English branch of the Rothschilds consisted of Lionel, Anthony, and Meyer, the three sons of Nathan Meyer Rothschild, who died in 1836.

LIONEL

was the head of the house, and was recognized indeed by the other branches as the head of the family. It was Lionel who fought the long battle for the admission of the Jews to the British Parliament. His fellow-citizens of London held him in so great respect that they elected him as their representative in 1847. He presented himself to be sworn, but as he could not, as a Jew, consistently take the oath as it was then worded, he was not allowed to take his seat. The question of altering the oath so as to admit him and any of his co-religionists who might be elected, was hotly debated both the Lords and Commons. It was not, however, until 1858 that the cause triumphed and Rothschild took his seat, and during the whole of those eleven years the citizens of London regularly re-elected him, although they knew that in doing so they would lose one of the votes to which the city was entitled.

Baron Lionel died in June, 1879, leaving three sons, Nathaniel, whose portrait we give, Alfred, who is now one of the Governors of the Bank of England, and Leopold, who is a well-known leader of the English society. Through all the generations this remarkable family, not only in the branch have traced, but the branches settled in other European cities, the same characteristics of liberality and generosity have been displayed, and what they have distributed freely, the growth of their wealth has been unchecked, until now through they exercise an important influence on every government in Europe.

SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE.

HIGH as the name of Rothschild stands in the esteem of the Jewish community it does not occupy the first place. That is reserved for Sir Moses Montefiore, who is loved and venerated by Jews of every clime. Nor is this feeling undeserved. His life has been one of self-sacrifice; his money, time, and his energies, have been unreservedly consecrated to the welfare of his people, and their debt of gratitude to him is beyond computation. The cry of suffering has never failed to awaken a response in his breast, and though that cry might be uttered by men thousands of miles away, the grand old man, regardless of personal ease or comfort, undeterred by considerations of danger, has repeatedly risked his life that he might personally aid in alleviating their affliction. Not without reason does the Jew, whether he live under African tropical sun, among the snow and ice of Russia, in the genial climate of Asia Minor pronounce benediction at the mention of the name of Montefiore.

The Montefiores are of Italian descent and possess considerable wealth. The subject of our sketch is nearly a centenarian, having been born October 24th, 1784. He was united in marriage in the year 1812 to the daughter of Mr. L. Cohen, and for more than half a century that lady was his constant companion, sharing his anxieties, his journeys, his fatigues, and his triumphs. He loved her with a devotion rare in these days, and she gave him not only the ardent affection of a true wife, but cordially sympathized with him in the dominating principle of his life. To her he confided his hopes and plans, and from her he received wise counsel and encouragement, and when he died in 1862 he grieved as only great minds can grieve. He erected over her remains a monument the fac-simile of that erected in memory of Rachel "in the way of Ephrath which is Bethlehem;" and endowed a scholarship in her name at the Jews' Free School, and gave other generous testimony of his regret in the way she would herself have chosen.

Christians as well as Jews have testified to the noble qualities of this eminent philanthropist. In the year 1837 he held the high and honorable position of High Sheriff of London. It was during the term of office that Queen Victoria paid a visit to the city and was entertained at the Guildhall, and on that occasion the honor of knighthood was conferred upon him. A few years later, royal letters were issued permitting him to add to his coat of arms a distinction reserved for peers, and short time afterward he was made a baronet.

THE JEWS OF PALESTINE

have been the especial objects of Sir Moses Montefiore's solicitude. He heard many accounts of their miserable condition and had given liberally for their relief. But in 1827 he resolved to visit them and see for himself if anything could be done to ameliorate their lot. With his wife he journeyed to the Holy Land and remained there for seven months. He found the Jewish colony little else than a collection of paupers spending their time in the study of the Talmud and subsisting on the bounty of their co-religionists in Europe. He exerted himself to arouse them from their apathy and induce them to enter upon some occupation that would render them independent. Six of the most intelligent boys he carried back with him to England, where he had them taught the art of cotton spinning, and then sent them back to Palestine with looms and machinery to introduce the manufacture. The effort failed, but Sir Moses though disappointed was not discouraged, and still continued in other channels his efforts on their behalf.

A MEMORABLE JOURNEY

was that Sir Moses undertook to Damascus in 1840. A Roman Catholic priest had suddenly disappeared from Damascus and the Jews were accused of having murdered him. Eight Jews were arrested and were subjected to torture of the most revolting character, to force a confession of guilt from them. One or two of them in their indescribable agony made a confession, but an investigation of their statements showed they were innocent, and had only accused themselves in the hope that they might be killed outright instead of enduring further suffering. Then sixty-four Jewish infants were seized, carried away from their mothers and kept on scanty fare, with the expectation that maternal love might wring from the distressed parents a confession. But it was useless, the Jews were innocent, and the authorities were devising other ingenious methods of torture when Sir Moses Montefiore arrived in company with the distinguished French Jew M. Crémieux, and by personal intercession induced the Pasha of Egypt to put an end to the horrible persecution. It was at the farewell meeting held in London before Sir Moses Montefiore's departure on this mission that the pious Baptist Noel delivered his famous speech on the Jewish question.

From Alexandria the philanthropist went to Constantinople, where he had an audience with the Sultan of Turkey, and secured for the Jews of that country many concessions previously denied them. Only two years afterward Montefiore was again in Palestine. A terrible epidemic had broken out and the death rate was appalling. Sir Moses Montefiore found his brethren in abject misery without hospital or medical attendance. He immediately established a dispensary in Jerusalem with a supply of medicines, employed a physician and nurses to attend to the sick, and defrayed the entire cost out of his own pocket for three years until the health of the community was restored.

The year 1846 found Sir Moses Montefiore and his wife enduring the rigor of a Russian winter in St. Petersburg. As usual, it was the sufferings of the people that caused the journey. The semi-barbarous Czar Nicholas was engaged in persecuting the Jews, and had issued an edict the effect of which would have been fatal to thousands of them, and would have consigned many thousands besides to abject poverty. Sir Moses interceded for them, and the charm of his manner, his disinterested sympathy, and his appeals to the Czar's leniency, procured a withdrawal of the edict. On his way back to England he visited the Jewish settlements in several countries, and cheered them by his sympathy and counsel.

In 1858 the Mortara case, which has become historic, agitated the Jewish community. The Mortaras were a Jewish family living at Bologna, then under the misgovernment of the Pope. They had a Roman Catholic nurse girl who, incited by the priests, surreptitiously baptized one of the children who was only one year old. When she gave the information to the priests they obtained a company of soldiers from the Pope and carried off the infant to a convent. The distress of the parents may be imagined, and Montefiore went to Rome to plead with the Pope for the restoration of the child. Pious men refused to see him, and his chief minister, Cardinal Antonelli, gave a curt refusal to his petition.

In October 1863, at the age of seventy-nine, Sir Moses Montefiore undertook a journey to Morocco. The Spanish collector of the Port of Saafi had died suddenly, and the authorities had made the fact of his servant being a Jew a pretext for persecuting the Jews on the charge of having murdered him. Four Jews were arrested, two of them were hanged up by the feet, head downward, and beaten almost to death, then they were placed naked in casks, through the staves of which sharp nails projected, and the casks were rolled along the roads. Then they were taken out and their sufferings ended with a thrust from a dagger. The other two Jews remained in prison and it was for their release that the venerable man undertook to plead. He was so far successful as to obtain an order liberating them, but was unable to have the inhuman monsters punished who had committed the outrage. Still later, in 1870 and again in 1875, Sir Moses Montefiore visited the East on missions of mercy, the former on behalf of the Roumelian Jews and the latter for the benefit of the Jews in Palestine. In both cases he was able to render them substantial benefits.

THE HOPE OF A JEWISH EMPIRE

in Palestine has all through his life been ardently cherished by Sir Moses Montefiore. He firmly believes in the ultimate return of the Jews to their own land, and only a short time ago he said, with much emphasis, "Jerusalem is destined to become the seat of a Jewish empire. It is the dream of my life, which will be fulfilled when I am no more." He has purchased extensive plots of ground in Jerusalem, and last year it was announced that he had given orders to prepare for cultivation the land in the front of what are known as the Judah Touro houses in Jerusalem. The rocks will be removed, terraces built all along, as it used to be in the time of King Solomon, and divided into twenty-two partitions, so that every inmate of the Touro houses will have an opportunity of cultivating the land, which will produce the necessary vegetables, etc., for the maintenance of himself and family. Sir Moses has also caused a very large cistern to be constructed in the centre of the field, which will secure a full supply of water for all of them. In his little book which records his seventh visit to Palestine, in 1875, he pleaded with his co-religionists to assist their brethren in Palestine, beginning, "in the first instance, with the building of houses in Jerusalem," and shows his impatient earnestness by adding, "Commence at once, begin the work this day if you can."

We trust, at a no very distant period, that the Jews will be restored to the land of their fathers; when "the Lord shall comfort Zion, when He will comfort all her waste places, and He will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord. Joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody." We believe, according to the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, that the "Times of the Gentiles," during which the "treading down of Jerusalem" is to continue, are nearing their completion. They were to last for 2520 years, which, if they commenced, as is generally believed, in Nebuchadnezzar's era, will end about 1893; and that the political restoration of many Jews to Jerusalem and the rebuilding of their temple will commence about seven years before the end of those 2520 years, that is to say, about 1886.

Sir Moses has already promoted the return of many Jews to Palestine, and he may live to witness their completed restoration, and the Second Advent of Christ, who is, though they knew Him not at His first coming, the true Messiah for whose coming the Jews look according to the Old Testament.

Second only in Sir Moses Montefiore's mind to the re-establishment of the Jews at Jerusalem, and, indeed, forming part of that scheme, is the Jewish College, close to the baronet's residence, and attached to the synagogue. It provides for ten aged Hebrews proved and learned in Jewish laws and Talmudic literature.

So vigorous is Sir Moses Montefiore that even now his powers of conversation show no signs of falling off, and his political opinions are as clearly defined as ever. He now spends most of his time at East Cliff Lodge, Ramsgate. Few men have borne the weight of years so well as Sir Moses Montefiore. Gifted by nature with a tall and massive frame, he has preserved health and vigor far beyond the allotted term of human life. His kindly outward aspect reveals the inner man. So large-hearted is his charity toward the suffering of all races and all creeds that, it is said, no man ever sought help at East Cliff and was denied. Albeit the charity of Sir Moses is dispensed without regard to age, sex, religion, or country, he remains a Hebrew of the Hebrews. So powerful even over generous souls and highly cultivated intellects are the influences of association and early education that even this noble old man, whose life has been spent in going about doing good, fails to see in Jesus of Nazareth Him of whom Moses and the prophets did write. It is also to be feared that the cruelty and injustice perpetrated by men calling themselves Christians may have had something to do with prejudicing him against the doctrines of Christianity, toward which, if he rightly understood them, his gentleness and charity would have been attracted.

THE RECENT RUSSIAN OUTRAGES ON THE JEWS.

IN connection with the portraits of Baron Nathaniel de Rothschild and Sir Moses Montefiore, which appear on our frontispiece, we give three pictures representing some of the attacks which have lately been made upon Jewish residents in towns and villages of the Russian Empire, the harrowing and repulsive details of which have been recorded by the daily press.

According to an official statement the number of Jewish families who suffered through the riots in Russia last year amounted to two thousand and eleven, and represented over ten thousand individuals; and the claims which have been made for losses and damage to property amount to 1,300,000 roubles, which is equivalent to nearly $750,000.

REVOLTING SCENES.

The scenes which were witnessed were truly terrible, and have excited a deep and genuine feeling of indignation throughout Christendom. The newspaper reports have narrated how helpless aged fathers tried vainly to defend their unhappy daughters from insult and violence, strong men murdered, houses burned with their occupants, infants dashed against the stones or thrown into the flames, while pillage and slaughter reigned on every side. From the Baltic to the Black Sea a suffering people physically and intellectually incomparably superior to the Russians, were thus the victims of murder, spoliation, and brutal lust.

Our picture between the two portraits represents a scene which was only too frequently witnessed in the towns and villages of Berislaw, Borispol, Chodom, Garadish, Jagary, and many other places. The panel in the left-hand corner of the lower portion of the frontispiece, depicts what was often seen last year at Berislaw, Borzny, Elizabetgrad, and elsewhere; while the illustration in the right-hand corner represents what actually took place at Berezowka on May 21st, and at Znamenska four days earlier. Besides these there are instances of some being stoned to death; of one, the wife of an innkeeper, being first outraged, and then roasted; and of others, both men, women, and children, being thrown out of high windows.

John Bunyan's readiness to give an Answer to those who questioned his right to use his great gifts, is seen in the following anecdote related in the words of his friend Charles Doe: As Mr. Bunyan was upon the road near Cambridge, there overtakes him a scholar that had observed him preaching, and said to him, "How dare you preach, seeing you have not the original and are no scholar?" Then said Mr. Bunyan: "Have you the original?" "Yes," said the scholar. "Nay, but," said Mr. Bunyan, "have you the very self-same original copies that were written by the penmen of the Scriptures, the prophets and apostles themselves?" "No," said the scholar, "but we have the true copies." "How do you know that?" said Mr. Bunyan. "How?" said the scholar, "how? Why we believe that what we have is a true copy of the original." "Exactly," said Mr. Bunyan, "and so I believe that our English Bible is a true copy of the original." Then away went the scholar.

FORWARD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Delivered Last Sunday Morning, March 5, 1882.

"There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."—JOSHUA 1:5.

A Magnificent Fighter—His Military Equipment—Five Great Victories—I. The Battle of the Freshet—No Provision made for Retreat—Victory at Long Odds—II. The Victory of Jericho—The Attack not Philosophic—Joshua's Stock Beared—The Falling Walls—One House Spared—III. The City of Ai—Self-Confidence Overthrown—The Stratagem—IV. Victory at Gibeon—The Miracle of the Sun and Moon—Its Counterpart in Life—John Summerfield's Day Prolonged—Robert McCheyne's Continued Usefulness—A Christian Woman's Influence—Five more Kings to be Slain—V. His Greatest Battle—Victory over Death—His Dying Testimony—Not a Word has Failed—His Granite Monument.

Moses was dead. A beautiful tradition says the Lord kissed him, and in that act drew forth the soul of the dying lawgiver. He had been buried, only one Person at the funeral, the same One who kissed him. But God never takes a man away from any place of usefulness but He has some one ready. The Lord does not go looking around amid a great variety of candidates to find some one especially fitted for the vacated position. He makes a man for that place.

Moses has passed off the stage, and Joshua, the hero of my text, puts his foot on the platform of history so solidly that all the ages echo with the tread. He was a magnificent fighter, but he always fought on the right side, and he never fought unless God told him to fight. In my text, he gets his military equipment and one would think it must have been plumed helmet for the brow, greaves of brass for the feet, habergeon for the breast. "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." "O!" you say, "anybody could have courage with such a backing up as that." Why, my friends, I have to tell you that the God of the universe and the Chieftain of eternity promises to do just as much for us as for him. All the resources of eternity are pledged in our behalf, if we go out in the service of God, and no more than that was offered to Joshua.

I mean, as God may help me this morning, to encourage the faith of all good people while I tell you that God fulfilled this promise of my text, although Joshua's first battle was with the spring freshet; and the next with a stone wall; and the next, leading on a regiment of whipped cowards; and the next battle, against darkness, wheeling the sun and the moon around, around into his battalion, and the last, against the King of Terrors, Death—

FIVE GREAT VICTORIES.

I. For the most part, when a general starts out in a conflict he would like to have a small battle in order that he may get his courage up and he may rally his troops and get them drilled for greater conflicts; but this first undertaking of Joshua was greater than the levelling of Fort Pulaski, or the thundering down of Gibraltar, or the overthrow of the Bastille. It was the crossing of the Jordan at the time of the spring freshet. The snows of Mount Lebanon had just been melting and they poured down into the valley, and the whole valley was a raging torrent.

So the Canaanites stand on one bank and they look across and see Joshua and the Israelites, and they laugh and say: "Aha! aha! they cannot disturb us in time—until the freshets fall; it is impossible for them to reach us." But after a while they look across the water and they see a movement in the army of Joshua. They say, "What's the matter now? why there must be a panic among these troops, and they are going to fly, or perhaps they are going to try to march across the river Jordan. Joshua is a lunatic." But Joshua, the chieftain of the text, looks at his army and cries: "Forward, march!" and they start for the bank of the Jordan.

One mile ahead go two priests carrying a glittering box four feet long and two feet wide. It is the ark of the covenant. And they come down, and no sooner do they just touch the rim of the water with their feet, than by an Almighty fiat Jordan parts. The army of Joshua marches right on without getting their feet wet, over the bottom of the river, a path of chalk and broken shells and pebbles, until they get to the other bank. Then they lay hold of the oleanders and tamarisks and willows and pull themselves up a bank thirty or forty feet high, and having gained the other bank, they clap their shields and their cymbals, and sing the praises of the God of Joshua. But no sooner have they reached the bank than the waters begin to dash and roar, and with a terrific rush they break loose from their strange anchorage. Out yonder they have stopped, thirty miles of distance they halted. On this side the waters roll off towards the salt sea.

But as the hand of the Lord God is taken away from the thus uplifted waters—waters perhaps uplifted half a mile—as the almighty hand is taken away, those waters rush down, and some of the unbelieving Israelites say: "Alas, alas, what a misfortune? Why could not those waters have stayed parted? because perhaps we may want to go back. O! Lord, we are engaged in a risky business. Those Canaanites may eat us up. How if we want to go back? Would it not have been a more complete miracle if the Lord had parted the waters to let us come through, and kept it parted to let us go back if we are defeated?" My friends, God makes no provision for a Christian's retreat. He clears the path all the way to Canaan. To go back is to die. The same gatekeepers that swing back the amethystine and crystalline gate of the Jordan to let Israel pass through, now swing shut the amethystine and crystalline gate of the Jordan to keep the Israelites from going back. I declare it in your hearing to-day, victory ahead, water forty feet deep in the rear. Triumph ahead, Canaan ahead; behind you death and darkness and woe and hell.

But you say: "Why didn't those Canaanites, when they had such a splendid chance—standing on the top of the bank thirty or forty feet high, completely demolish those poor Israelites down in the river?" I will tell you why. God had made a promise and He was going to keep it. "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

II. But this is no place for the host to stop. Joshua gives the command, "Forward, march!" In the distance there is a long grove of trees, and at the end of the grove is a city. It is a city of arbors, a city with walls seeming to reach to the Heavens, to buttress the very sky. It is that commands the mountain pass. It is Jericho. That city was afterward captured by Pompey, and it was afterward captured by Herod the Great, and it was afterward captured by the Mohammedans; but this campaign the Lord plans. There shall be no swords, no shields, no battering ram. There shall be only one weapon of war, and that a ram's horn. The horn of the slain ram was sometimes taken and holes were punctured in it, and then the musician would put the instrument to his lips, and he would run his fingers over this rude musical instrument, and make a great deal of sweet harmony for the people. That was the only kind of weapon.

THE GREAT METROPOLIS

Seven priests were to take these rude rustic musical instruments, and they were to go around the city every day for six days—once a day for six days, and then on the seventh day they were to go around blowing these rude musical instruments seven times, and then at the close of the seventh blowing of the rams' horns on the seventh day the peroration of the whole scene was to be a shout at which those great walls should tumble from capstone to base. The seven priests with the rude musical instruments pass all around the city walls on the first day, and a failure. Not so much as a piece of plaster broke loose from the wall—not so much as a loosened rock, not so much as a piece of mortar lost from its place.

"There!" say the unbelieving Israelites, "didn't I tell you so? Why, those ministers are fools. The idea of going around the city with those musical instruments and expecting in that way to destroy it! Joshua has been spoiled; He thinks because he has overthrown and destroyed the spring freshet, he can overthrow the stone wall. Why it is not philosophic. Don't you see there is no relation between the blowing of these musical instruments and the knocking down of the wall. It isn't philosophy." And I suppose there were many wiseacres who stood with their brow knitted, and with the forefinger of the right hand to the forefinger of the left hand, arguing it all out and showing it was not possible that such a cause produced such an effect. And I suppose that night in the encampment there was plenty of philosophy and caricature, and if Joshua had been nominated for any high military position he would not have got many votes.

JOSHUA'S STOCK WAS DOWN.

The second day, the priests blowing the musical instruments go around the city, and a failure. Third day, and a failure; fourth day and a failure. Fifth day, and a failure; sixth day, and a failure. The seventh day comes, the climacteric day. Joshua is up early in the morning and examines the troops, walks all around about, looks at the city wall. The priests start to make the circuit of the city. They go all around once, all around twice, three times, four times, five times, six times, seven times, and a failure. There is only one more thing to do, and that is to utter a great shout. I see the Israelitish army straightening themselves up, filling their lungs for a vociferation such as was never heard before and never heard after.

Joshua feels that the hour has come, and he cries out to his host: "Shout; for the Lord hath given you the city!" All the people begin to cry "Down Jericho, down Jericho!" and the long line of solid masonry begins to quiver and to move as if to rock. Stand from under. She falls. Crash go the walls, the temples, the towers, the palaces, the air blackened with the dust. The huzza of the victorious Israelites and the groan of the conquered Canaanites commingle, and Joshua stands there in the débris of the wall, hears a voice saying: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

Only one house spared. Who lives there? Son of a great king? No. Some woman distinguished for great kindly deeds? No. She had been conspicuous for her crimes. It is the house of Rahab. Why was her house spared? Because she had been a great sinner? No, but because she repented, demonstrating to all the ages that there is mercy for the chief of sinners. The red cord of divine injunction reaching from her window to the ground, so that when the people saw that red cord they knew it was the divine indication they should not disturb the premises; making us think of the divine cord of a Saviour's deliverance, the red cord of a Saviour's kindness, the red cord of a Saviour's mercy, the red cord of our rescue. Mercy for the chief of sinners. Put your trust in that God who no damage shall befall you. When our world shall be more terribly surrounded than was Jericho, even by the trumpets of the judgment day, and the hills and the mountains, the metal bones of the ribs of nature, shall break, they who have had Rahab's faith shall have Rahab's deliverance.

"When wrapt in fire the realms of ether glow,
And Heaven's last thunder shakes the earth below;

Thou undismayed shall o'er the ruins smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile."

III. But Joshua's troops may not halt here. The command is, "Forward, march!" There it must be taken. How shall it be taken? scouting party comes back and says: "Joshua, can do that without you; it is going to be a very easy job; you just stay here while we go and capture it." They march with a small regiment in front of that city. The men of Ai look at them and give one yell and the Israelites run like reeders. The northern troops at Bull Run did not make such rapid time as these Israelites with the Canaanites after them. They never cut such sorry figure as when they were on the retreat.

THE CITY OF AI;

Anybody that goes out in the battles of God with only half a force, instead of your taking the men of Ai, the men of Ai will take you. Look church of God on the retreat. The Bornesian cannibals ate up Munson the missionary. "Fall back!" said a great many Christian people—Fall back, O! Church of God. Borneo will never be taken. Don't you see the Bornesian cannibals have eaten up Munson, the missionary?" Randall delivers his lecture at the University of Glasgow, and a great many good people say, "Fall back, O! Church of God. Don't you see that Christian philosophy is going to be overcome by worldly philosophy? Fall back." Geology plunges a crowbar into the mountains, and there are a great many people who say, "Scientific investigation is going to overthrow the Mosaic account of creation. Fall back!" Friends of the church have never any right to fall back.

Joshua falls on his face in chagrin. It is the only time you ever see the back of his head. He falls on his face and begins to whine, and he says, "O! Lord God, wherefore hast Thou at all brought this people over Jordan to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? would to God we had been content and dwelt on the other side of Jordan! For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round and cut off our name from the earth."

I am very glad Joshua said that. Before, it seemed as if he were a supernatural being, and therefore could not be an example to us; but I find he is a man, he is only a man. Just as sometimes you find a man under severe opposition, or in a bad state of physical health, or worn out with overwork, lying down, and sighing about everything being defeated. I am encouraged when I hear his cry of Joshua as he lies in the dust.

God comes and rouses him. How does He rouse him? By complimentary apostrophe? No. He says, "Get thee up. Wherefore liest thou upon thy face?" Joshua rises, and I warrant you, with a mortified look. But his old courage comes back. The fact was, that was not his battle. If he had been in it he would have gone on to victory. He gathers his troops around him and says: "Now, let us go up and capture the city of Ai: let us go up right away."

They march on. He puts the majority of the troops behind a ledge of rocks in the night, and then he sends a comparatively small battalion up in front of the city. The men of Ai come out with a shout. This battalion in stratagem fall back and fall back, and when all the men of Ai have left the city and are in pursuit of this scattered, or seemingly scattered, battalion, Joshua stands on a rock—I see his locks flying in the wind as he points his spear toward the doomed city, and that is the signal. The men rush out from behind the rocks and take the city, and it is put to the torch, and then these Israelites in the city march down and the flying battalion of Israelites return, and between these two waves of Israelitish prowess the men of Ai are destroyed, and the Israelites gain the victory; and while I see the curling smoke of that destroyed city on the sky, and while I hear the huzza of the Israelites and the groan of the Canaanites, Joshua hears something louder than it all, ringing and echoing through his soul, "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

IV. But this is no place for the host of Joshua to stop. "Forward, march!" cries Joshua to the troops. There is the city of Gibeon. It has put itself under the protection of Joshua. They send word, "there are after us; they are going to destroy us; send troops quick; send us help right away." Joshua has a three days' march more than double quick. On the morning of the third day he is before the enemy. There are two long lines of battle. The battle opens with great slaughter, but the Canaanites soon discover something. They say, "That is Joshua; that is the man who conquered the spring freshet and knocked down the stone wall and destroyed the city of Ai. There is no use fighting." And they sound a retreat, and as they begin to retreat Joshua and his host spring upon them like a panther, pursuing them over the rocks, and as these Canaanites with sprained ankles and gashed foreheads retreat, the catapults of the sky pour a volley of hailstones into the valley, and all the artillery of the heavens with bullets of iron pounds the Canaanites against the ledges of Beth-horon.

FIVE KINGS

"O!" says Joshua, "this is surely a victory." "But do you not see the sun is going down? Those Amorites are going to get away after all, and then they will come up some other time and bother us, and perhaps destroy us." See the sun is going down. O! for a longer day than has ever been seen in this climate. What is the matter with Joshua? Has he fallen in an apoplectic fit? No. He is in prayer. Look out when a good man makes the Lord his ally. Joshua raises his face radiant with prayer and looks at the descending sun over Gibeon and at the faint crescent of the moon, for you know the queen of the night sometimes will linger around the palaces of the day.

Pointing one hand at the descending sun and the other hand at the faint crescent of the moon, in the name of that God who shaped the worlds and moves the worlds he cries: "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon." They halted. Whether it was by refraction of the sun's rays, or by the stopping of the whole planetary system, I do not know and do not care. I leave it to the Christian scientists and the infidel scientists to settle that question while I tell you I have seen the same thing. "What!" say you, "not the sun standing still?" Yes. The same miracle is performed nowadays. The wicked do not live out half their day, and the sun sets at noon. But let a man start out in battle for God and the truth and against sin, and the day of his usefulness is prolonged and prolonged and prolonged.

John Summerfield was a consumptive Methodist. He looked fearfully white, I am told, as he stood in old Sands Street church, in this city, preaching Christ, and when he stood on the anniversary platform in New York, pleading for the Bible until unusual and unknown glories rolled forth from that book. When he was dying his pillow was brushed with the wings of the angel from the skies, the messenger that God sent down. Did John Summerfield's sun set? Did John Summerfield's day end? O! no. He lives on in his burning utterances in behalf of the Christian church.

Robert McCheyne was a consumptive Presbyterian. It was said when he preached, he coughed so it seemed as if he would never preach again. His name fragrant in all Christendom, that name mightier to-day than was ever his living presence. He lived to preach the Gospel in Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Dundee, but he went away very early. He preached himself into the grave. Has Robert McCheyne's sun set? Is Robert McCheyne's day ended? O! no. His dying delirium was filled with prayer, and when he lifted his hand to pronounce the benediction upon his family, and the benediction upon his country, he seemed to say: "I cannot die now; I want to live on and on. I want to start an influence for the church that will never cease. I am only thirty years of age. Sun of my Christian ministry, stand still over Scotland." And it stood still.

A long time ago there was

A CHRISTIAN WOMAN

very consecrated, and she had a drunken husband, and so on came the night of domestic trouble. She lost her children, and there came the night of bereavement. She was very ill, and there came the night of sickness. Her soul departed, and there came the night of death. But all these nights of trouble, and darkness, and sorrow, and sickness, were illumined by the grace of the Gospel; and people came many miles to see how cheerfully a Christian could be sick and how cheerfully a Christian could die. The moon that illumined that night of trouble was a reflection from the Sun of righteousness. In the last hour of that night—that night of darkness and sickness and misfortune, as she lifted her hand toward heaven, those who stood nearest her pillow could hear the whisper—for she wanted to live on in the generations that were to follow consecrated to God, she wanted to have an influence long after she had entered upon her eternal reward, and while her hand was lifted and her lips were moving, those who stood nearest her pillow could hear her say, "Thou moon stand still in the valley of Ajalon."

But Joshua was not quite through. There was time for five funerals before the sun of that prolonged day set. Who will preach their funeral sermon? Massillon preached the funeral sermon over Louis XVI. Who will preach the funeral sermon of those five dead kings—King of Jerusalem, King of Hebron, King of Jarmuth, King of Lachish, King of Eglon? Let it be by Joshua. What is his text? what shall be the epitaph cut on the door of the tomb. "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

But before you fasten up the door, I want beheaded and thrust in; King Alcohol, King Fraud, King Lust, King Superstition, King Infidelity. Let them be beheaded and hurl them in. Then fasten up the door forever. What shall the inscription and what shall the epitaph be? For all Christian philanthropists of all ages are going to come and look at it. What shall the inscription be? Joshua 1:5: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life."

FIVE MORE KINGS

V. But it is time for Joshua to go home. He is a hundred and ten years old. Washington went down the Potomac and at Mount Vernon closed his days. Wellington died peacefully at Apsley House. Now, where shall Joshua rest? Why he is to have now. After a hundred and ten years he has to meet a king who has more subjects than all the present population of the earth, his throne a pyramid of skulls, his parterre the graveyards and the cemeteries of the world, his chariot the world's hearse—the King of Terrors.

HIS GREATEST BATTLE

But if this is Joshua's greatest battle, it is going to be Joshua's greatest victory. He gathers his friends around him and gives his valedictory, and it is full of reminiscence. Young men tell what they are going to do; old men tell what they have done. And as you have heard a grandfather, or great grandfather, seated by the evening fire, tell of Monmouth or Yorktown, and then lift the crutch or staff as though it were a musket, to fight, and show how the old battles were won—so Joshua gathers his friends around his dying couch, and he tells them the story of what he has been through, and as he lies there, his white locks snowing down on his wrinkled forehead, I wonder if God has kept His promise all the way through—the promise of the text. As he lies there he tells the story one, two, or three times—you have heard old people tell a story two or three times over—and he answers: "I go the way of all the earth, and not one word of the promise has failed, not one word thereof has failed; all has come to pass, not one word thereof has failed." And then he turns to his family, as a dying parent will, and says: "Choose now whom you will serve, the God of Israel, or the God of the Amorites. As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

A dying parent cannot be reckless or thoughtless in regard to his children. Consent to part with them at the door of the tomb we cannot. By the cradle in which their infancy was rocked, by the bosom on which they first lay, by the blood of the covenant, by the God of Joshua, it shall not be. We will not part, we cannot part. Jehovah Jireh, we take Thee at Thy promise: "I will be a God to Thee and Thy seed after thee."

DEAD,

the old chieftain must be laid out. Handle him very gently, that sacred body is over a hundred and ten years of age. Lay him out, stretch out those feet that walked dry shod the parted Jordan. Close those lips which helped blow the blast at which the wall of Jericho fell. Fold the arm that lifted the spear toward the doomed city of Ai. Fold it right over the heart that exulted when the five kings fell. But where shall we get the burnished granite for the headstone and the footstone? I bethink myself now. I imagine that for the head it shall be the sun that stood still upon Gibeon, and for the foot, the moon that stood still in the valley of Ajalon.

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 134.)

Sylph's Interposition—The Insurgents Awed—Before the Court-Martial—Capt. Vaughan Allowed to Address the Court—The Indignation of the Insurgents—Sentenced to Death—He Requests to Die like a Soldier—Preparations to Hang Him—A Rescue.

THE act of Sylph Somers, in throwing herself between her lover and the angry rebels, proved a better safeguard to Captain Vaughan than all the effort and remonstrance of the rebel chiefs. Fronting the levelled pikes, her bosom was between the gleaming steel and the heart of her lover. Those who held the strong wooden shafts of the half dozen deadly weapons could not bring themselves to strike their victim through the body of a woman, and that too a woman of great beauty. The pikes were lowered to the ground and the bosom of Sylph, better than a shield of adamant, had served to guard the life of the man so dear to her.

Thus rescued a second time from death Captain Vaughan, in company with Corny and Sylph, was conducted, not for temporary imprisonment, to the mill at the hill top, like other prisoners, but to the Court Martial in session near the mill for sentence of death at once or acquittal. Of this latter alternative, as we may suppose, there was, however, little hope. Even if disposed to acquit Captain Vaughan his judges durst not. Pronounced guilty beforehand, in the vulgar mind, they must follow suit with their clients and deliver him up to the popular fury.

Captain Vaughan, Corny, and Sylph, were all three placed before the insurrectionary tribunal. Sylph, however, was soon told to stand aside and informed that the New Irish Republic, inaugurated by Father John Murphy, did not make war upon women. And the judges, though wielding despotic power, with the native gallantry of Irishmen, stood by this rule, although a fanatic in the surging crowd cried out that she ought to die for her Methodism. "She's a Swaddler," he shouted out, employing the usual scornful epithet, "a wretched Swaddler who has tried her best to make us good Catholics mane turncoats; and more betoken, there's the proof besider her, Corny Fagan; she has led him astray from the thrue faith, and undher her false tayching, he has become a vile heretic."

"That's thrue," urged another, "she bewitched him a twelvemonth ago in Bury's barn—got him into a sack be enchantment, no less—and between half smothering and whole frightenin' him, got him to promise, in the devil's name"—and he crossed himself—"to turn Protestant. She has killed his precious sowl, and she ought to pay with her life the penalty for her sin."

"That's all a falsehood," bravely spoke out Corny, "not a word o' thruth in it. I, myself, of me own accord, got into the sack, and I myself it was that changed me religion. No wan forced me; and I don't mind tellin yees that I did it because I found out that me early religion was but little of a religion at all; and was for the most part a delusion. God, glory be to His name, taught me the truth Himself, be bringing me into His own blessed light, and I've only followed it. Instead o' trustin now to the masses of the prastes, I trust my sowl to Christ alone, for He died to save it, and only His blood can wash it. That's the thruth of it."

There were fierce words and fiercer looks directed upon Corny at this bold avowal, but it served Sylph as exonerating her from the crime of Corny's so-called perversion. The insurgent tribunal was thus enabled to carry out in her case their rule of exempting women from execution.

Impatient of the delay in Captain Vaughan's case, from this interruption in the proceedings of the court-martial, there were loud cries on every hand for the instant trial of the English officer. "He doesn't deserve to live wan minit," it was declared; "and here yer abeen keepin' us nigh hand an hour, and we haven't yet seen the end of 'im." There was the usual exaggeration in this count of time, but it indicated the rebel thirst at the moment for the blood of a Saxon.

The form of trial laid-down by the insurgent court-martial was brief and facile. When a captive was placed before it, the President of the Court cried out, "Is there any one here that can give a good character of this man, and show that he is not a traitor to Ireland?" If any person came forward to give a favorable testimony, he was asked to support his statement by proof; but if no one volunteered to clear the accused he was sentenced immediately.

Captain Vaughan, aware of this, stepped before his judges without the smallest expectation of acquittal, and fully assured that his moments were numbered. It is a solemn thing for a man to feel that nothing but a short formality stands between him and the eternal world; but, as a soldier accustomed to face death, and as one who lived under a sense of acceptance with his God through Jesus Christ, he did not quail at the dread crisis so instant before him.

And yet, however one may be ready to die, it is an unspeakable moment when this mortal coil must be put off, and the soul must enter upon an untried and mysterious state of being. Nothing but unwavering faith, and that perfect love of the unseen Redeemer which casteth out fear, can sustain the naturally "shrinking and trembling" spirit. Thus, while Captain Vaughan was free from cowardly dread, every fibre of his frame was wound up to the highest pitch of tension.

"Is there any one here to give a good character to this man?" said the president aloud, in the prescribed form. "Though, indeed, I hardly need put the question," he added, "for the uniform he wears sufficiently condemns him." "Aye, that it does!" shouted out five hundred voices. "Shure, he's wan o' thim villains that hates us—the Irish—and has sowld himself, body and sowl, to murder us wholesale. Away with him—kill him at wanst. Our pikes is thrimblin in our very han's with the longin' that they have to do fur him." And fury was in their every look.

"May I say a word?" said the doomed prisoner. "Certainly not," cried out the multitude, assuming, as is usual in such cases, the province of the judge, "Sintinced min, as you ought to know, have no right to spake. Spake to yer God, me man, if ye have a mind, for yer jest on the way to Him; but none of us here will listen to wan word ye have to say."

Captain Vaughan cast a remonstrant look from the crowd to his judges to see if they would indorse this utterance. The meaning of his searching glance was understood. These men in brief authority, though cruel in their religious frenzy, and reckless in their revolutionary zeal, had yet some sense of right; and the calm demeanor of the prisoner before them appealed to it.

"I do not think, friends, we can say that this man is actually sentenced," said the president, "however certain such a fate may be before him. It is my decision, therefore, wishing to prove our clemency, that he be allowed to say a few words before he dies—mind only a few words, however," and he looked straight at the prisoner, "for our time is short and our task is heavy. And I hope that, convinced of the wicked part he has played against this land, he will have the grace to say that he is heartily sorry for it."

"I thank you, president," said Captain Vaughan. "Although the privilege you grant me is upon every ground my right, no one but an untutored savage would deny it." Then observing a flash of anger on the faces of his judges at this strong phrase, he added, "which conduct, of course, ought to be impossible here, for I see you practice among you the sacred rites of the Christian religion."

"What I wish to say to my accusers is this: I am not a hater, but a lover of the Irish race; and I have not sold myself to murder. I desire for this country prosperity and peace; and it was to secure these that I came into it. I abhor murder; and it is to keep you from its dreadful stain that I ask you to pause before you imbrue your hands in my blood."

"Don't believe a word he says," said a huge rebel chief that now pressed in front of the onlooking crowd, "Abhor murder, indeed! Why I myself, with me own two eyes, seen him yesterday in Enniscorthy market-place doin' his very best to shoot us down without marcy—aye, and with too good success, too. Dermot Casy, and Jim Toole, and Mick O'Halaran, and a lot more min I cud name, undher me own command—shot through the head or through the heart—were laid low, welterin' in their blood, be the manes of him." And at the mention of these names a number of women present—the widows, or sisters, or sweethearts of these men—raised the Irish wail for the dead—that wail which tingles and quivers in the ears; and appals the hearts of those who hear it.

It sounded as the knell of doom in the ear of Captain Vaughan, yet he had self-mastery enough to urge "That to take life in the wage of battle was not murder. That no one the world over would so name it. I am a soldier," he added, "and am proud to say it; and the enemies of my sovereign it is my duty in fair fight to destroy. If the persons that have been named fell by my hand I deeply regret it, on account of those who have been thereby bereaved. Still, their sad fate is not due to me, but must be laid at their own door. They waged civil war, took up arms against their fellow-citizens, and they must take the consequences. Would to heaven, however, that this unholy strife had never been begun; and since it is unfortunately begun, my fervent prayer is, may it soon be ended."

"Aye, and we'll help soon to end it," cried out several, "by endin' you and the likes o' you; for it is the English soldiery that prolongs the contest. If it war only the polthroon militia and the yeomans we had to dale with, we'd soon finish thim off, but its yees that make long the battle. So prepare to die this minit, fur we can have no more arguin' over this business." The president, in due form, then passed the sentence of death, and called upon the executioners appointed for the day to do their duty.

Captain Vaughan, perceiving from those who stood forward for the grim task of death, that the instrument of execution was to be the pike, entreated to be shot, as a soldier.

It was a natural, but proved to be an unwise, request. It suggested to the minds of his enemies that there were degrees of disgrace and humiliation in the mode of a prisoner's execution, and excited to savage fury by the lamentations for their dead, still raised in piercing cries by the women mentioned, and caught up by other bereaved ones in the camp, they resolved to give this English officer—who confessed that he had slain their comrades, and who sought to justify his villainous act, as they deemed it—the most dishonorable death possible.

"Shoot you, indeed," they cried out. "Oh! not a bit of it. We're not such softs as ye take us fur, me man. We'll not even soil our dacent pikes with you; we'll just put a rope round yer neck 'as if ye war a dog. And, shure, hangin' itself is too good for ye!"

No sooner was this dreadful proposal made, than willing agents set about its accomplishment. A tent was struck, and its poles were taken down to be set up as a triangle.

Sylph having been removed some distance from where the rebel court sat, did not hear distinctly all that passed during Captain Vaughan's trial. She could see, indeed, the menacing looks of his accusers, and hear many of their impatient cries and threats; and yet that the proceedings were so much prolonged gave her, under the circumstances, considerable hope. She trusted that the delay in Captain Vaughan's sentence argued a disposition on the part of the rebel chiefs and judges to show him some clemency. Many had been her prayers to Him "who heareth the cry of the destitute."

The operation, however, now began, and soon the sight of the gallows and its dangling rope, and of two men holding her betrothed firmly by the arms, within half a dozen yards from where the noose hung, opened her eyes to the ghastly scene that was about to be enacted.

With a wild cry of despair and terror she sprang forward and sought to reach her lover, to share his fate or rescue him; but her attempt was abortive: her shriek drew the attention of the rebel crowd wards her. Three or four powerful men laid hold of her, arrested her course and then violently forced her back to her previous standing place; and from this position she was forced to witness the remaining preliminaries of the dreadful tragedy the insurgents were about to perpetrate. She saw, with eyes preternaturally keen from horror, Captain Vaughan's coat stripped off, and neck laid bare, his feet and hands securely lashed, his head covered; and then beheld him stretched beneath the fatal cord, ready for strangling. The final act of the catastrophe had all but come, and the last ray of hope had vanished, when a young man, evidently a rebel officer, from his handsome suit of green edged with silver, and who was accompanied by a band of men, clad in dress showy uniform of the same color, dashed forward sword in hand, and peremptorily called for a pause in the proceedings.

(To be continued.)

POWER OVER DISEASE AND DEATH.

S. Lesson for March 19, Mark 5 : 21-23. Golden Text, verse 36 and Matt. 8 : 17.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE golden text chosen for the English Sunday-schools to-day contains the foundation ground on which all our blessed Lord's constant work of healing stands. There is no assumption here of merit on the part of those who were healed, healing is not spoken of as a reward nor yet as a right. "He healed all that were sick, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." His healing is part of His redemption; not of works, but of grace, and therefore to be obtained not by effort but by faith. And here comes the golden text chosen by the American Committee, "Fear not, believe only." Why then do all sick people believe and be healed? We may ask a question which is still more sad to answer: Why do not all sinners believe and be saved; and why do not all God's children believe and be made pure and holy? "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life" (John 5 : 40), said our blessed Lord, and O how awfully, terribly true it is. Men will not come to because they know it involves the giving up of sin, the bringing to light that which they have carefully hidden from the eyes of others, the making restitution for wrong done, and the appearing as they are in their own eyes in the eyes of others. It is an awful, a terrible fact that most men are content to seem good without being so, and if they only get credit for being religious they are content with the sham and they do not care to settle their accounts with God at all. To come to close quarters with God is what such would dread above all else, for His searching eye would burn up their disguise, and they must stand revealed in all their sin and their hypocrisy.

CLOSE QUARTERS WITH GOD

God has a right to our souls, for He has created and redeemed them, and those who hold themselves aloof from Him are sinning against Him as much as against their own souls. He has a right to our bodies too, for He bare not only our sins but our sicknesses; yet many have an absolute dread of letting their bodies come into close contact with God. Why? If it is God's voice which speaks in sickness, and if sickness is not a mere chance over which God has no control, then the one who is sick ought to listen to the voice of God, whatever He may have to say. But many a dyspeptic patient who has been told the truth by the doctor that he must not indulge in over-eating, would not on any account like to hear the same truth from God; the doctor will rack his brains to think of some pleasant food to take the place of that which is forbidden; God would say perhaps, "Leave off that debasing habit of studying your appetite, eat what comes with my blessing, and give more to the poor." And the sick man would have to see himself in all the disagreeable light in which Paul saw some "whose god is their belly," would have to humble himself under the mighty hand of God, and then the sickness would be removed.

Here we read of an almost despairing father, a ruler of the synagogue, who pressing through the crowd found his way to Jesus, and then, regarding none other, he urged his plea, falling down at His feet and beseeching greatly, "My little daughter lieth at the point of death, I pray Thee come and lay Thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live." It never seemed to strike Jairus that perhaps it might not be Jesus' will, for every day and hour He was healing the sick, and He never in any case sent one away unhealed. It did not strike him that perhaps she had not yet learned the lesson of her sickness; why should he? Jesus would be better able to know that than he, and the Healer was the Teacher too. "Jesus went with him; and much people followed Him, and thronged Him;" one of them caused an interruption. It was not a petition, for no voice was heard, there was no cry to attract His attention, but it was a touch which Jesus recognized, for He had often felt it before. A poor sick woman had heard the news of His marvellous power and willingness to heal. Like many others she had tried every other way, "had suffered many things of many physicians;" all, all in vain, her money was spent, her last hopes of restoration had faded away, and after all her efforts to obtain health that she might again resume her earthly calling, she saw nothing before her but a lingering death from exhaustion and hunger. But now she would make one more desperate effort, so she came in the crowd behind Jesus; in her state of health she must have had marvellous courage to make her way through the throng. But she was not making an experiment, she knew this was worth while; "For she said, If I may touch but His clothes, I shall be whole," no hesitation, no perhaps "I shall be whole."

IT WAS BUT A TOUCH,

And she touched, and the Lord did not keep her waiting, it was instantaneous healing; "she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague." Jesus was conscious, and so was the woman, of what had transpired, but no one else; and He "turned Him about in the press and said, Who touched my clothes?" The disciples thought it an unreasonable question; six or seven of those around must necessarily touch Him; "Thou seest the multitude thronging Thee, and sayest Thou, Who touched me?" The search of His eye among the throng was the only answer. The woman, who with all a woman's natural desire to be unobserved, had come in the press behind, now tremblingly stepped forward, "came and fell down before Him, and told Him all the truth." It was due to Jesus, it was wholesome for her, it was needful for those around, that she should bear testimony. Why should we not tell of what the Lord has done for us, body and soul? Surely He deserves it. If we had had anything to do with it it would become us to be silent, but when His grace has done it all, we may well sing with Isaiah "I will mention the lovingkindnesses of the Lord, and the praises of the Lord, according to all that the Lord hath bestowed on us" (Isaiah 64). "And He said unto her, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague."

Some are afraid of coming to close quarters with God in body or soul or both, because they

FEAR THEY WILL HAVE TO CONFESS HIM, and they don't know how they could do that. O poor doubter, do you think God is like man, do you think He would bring you into a position in which to obey Him is an impossibility? Would He exact from you what He would not give you grace to do? Let Him put His hand really upon you, give yourself up to be healed or cleansed of whatever soul or body is burdened with, and in the experience of His great salvation, praise will well up in your heart and it will be as natural surely to recount the cure which the Almighty God has effected upon you, as it would be if it had come about through some new method of doctoring. "But," you say, "they won't believe me." That would not disconcert you, and you would not be ashamed if your friends doubted the efficacy of a new remedy; you would say, "Well, I have experienced it, that's all I've got to say." Only don't refuse the healing of the great Healer, don't hug your evils, don't remain a slave to sin or to disease while the Redeemer is waiting to be gracious. If He has any special lesson to teach you as He taught Job, He will tell you so if you listen; only don't keep away from Him.

The delay which the cure of this poor woman had caused seemed to bring with it a serious complication; "there came from the ruler of the synagogue's house certain which said, Thy daughter is dead; why troublest thou the Master any further?" "He that believeth shall not make haste" (Isaiah 28 : 16), and Jesus believed in His Father's right ordering of times and circumstances, and therefore He did not push aside the poor woman and say, "You must wait, I am on My way to a dying girl, I have no time to lose." He created all time, and He is time's Master, and we, if we abide in Him, shall learn not to be in a hurry, but to trust our Father for the time to do all to which He calls us. One there was who might be tried at this juncture beyond human endurance, and to him the Master said, "Be not afraid, only believe." Here are the two essentials after we have put anything really into the hands of God: Is He able? Is He willing? Has He taken the matter in hand? If so, fear is heart blasphemy, for it says, "He is not to be depended upon," and we cannot believe—i.e. count upon God—while we continue fearing.

On this, the first occasion on which Jesus raised from the dead, few were permitted to be witnesses. Peter, James, John, and the child's parents, these were all. On arriving at the house there was every sign of manifest grief. What an incongruity. He whom they had sent for, "the Resurrection and the Life," stood there beside the dead; sense recognized the presence of death, and faith did not recognize the presence of Him who is the Life. "Why make ye this ado and weep?" He said, "the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth." Yes, truly, but only the voice of the Son of Man can rouse from such a sleep; and O how glorious will it be when they "that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth" (John 5 : 28, 29). The people who saw not with the eye of faith laughed Him to scorn. But He put them all out, and then in the presence of her parents and the chosen three, He took the dead child by the hand and said, "Damsel, I say unto thee, arise." "I say unto thee;" it needed no other authority, "straightway the damsel arose, and walked, for she was of the age of twelve years." Life had conquered death. By and by, when Jesus comes, physical death, "the last enemy," shall be overcome too, but while "it is appointed unto men once to die" (Heb. 9 : 27) let us see that the death of sin around us is brought in contact with the mighty life-giving power of our crucified and risen Lord. O Lord Jesus, save us from ourselves, from indifference, from all which is not Thee; save by Thy death, and by Thy life those around us who are perishing!

A Pedestrian's Manly Chivalry.—At the meeting held on August 27th, to welcome Mr. Francis Murphy to England, one of the speakers was Edward Payson Weston, the famous pedestrian, who is a teetotaler and a most earnest worker in the cause. He related the following incident: "The other day I saw a man striking a woman outside a public house. I went up to him and said, 'Don't be such a coward as to strike a woman—strike me.' 'I will if you don't mind your own business.' 'Well, do it; but don't strike that woman. It's a manly thing to strike me, but it's cowardly to strike her.' He struck me, and was amazed that I didn't return it. 'What!' he said, 'you won't strike me back.' 'No; but if you and your wife will come and take a cup of tea with me, I shall be glad of your company.' We went into a coffee palace hard by, and we had some tea. He said, 'I don't know your name, but you've made me ashamed of myself; will you shake hands?' I said, 'You need not be ashamed of anything you've done except striking that woman. Ask her to forgive you, and go home quietly with her, sign the pledge, and you'll be twice the man you were before.' That man has taken my advice, and his wife told me that although he was out of a situation then, he has got one to-day, and all is going on well with him and his home."

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS
SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Foreign Policy of the United States formed the subject of discussion in the House on March 2d. Some regret was expressed by Mr. Blaine's friends that the energetic policy of the ex-secretary toward the South American Republics had been reversed by his successor. Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, however, made a significant speech in reply, in which he said that when Mr. Frelinghuysen came into the cabinet he found a policy in force which he feared if pressed might be the precursor of war between the United States and a sister American Republic. He was not familiar with the question in all its bearings, and desired time to study and weigh the subject and carefully to read the secret correspondence bearing upon it. A halt had, therefore, been called, but this did not necessarily imply that the policy initiated while Mr. Blaine was Secretary of State was to be reversed or that President Arthur had changed his mind. It had been deemed wise to stop and consider, and that was all there was of it. Opinion is divided on the important question as to whether this speech was inspired by Mr. Blaine or Mr. Frelinghuysen.

The Nomination of Ex-Senator Conkling to be Associate-Justice of the Supreme Court was confirmed on Thursday, March 2d, by the Senate. Thirty-nine senators voted for confirmation and twelve against. At least four Republicans are known to have voted in the negative, and it is supposed that the other eight votes were cast by Democrats. Several speeches were made with the object of explaining the reasons which induced senators to vote against confirmation. These were that Mr. Conkling lacked legal experience and did not possess the judicial temperament. Mr. Conkling's friends, on the other hand, reply that even if he should prove deficient in these respects, his honesty and incorruptibility may be relied on, and that no stain has ever been cast on his integrity, which is more than can be said of some men whose nomination to the Supreme Bench these same senators voted to confirm. It is matter for regret that on the question of the appointment of judges such charges and recriminations should be made.

Mr. Blaine Performed his Difficult and Delicate duty of pronouncing a eulogy on the late President with remarkable tact and skill. It is due to Mr. Blaine to appreciate the difficulties by which he was surrounded when on Monday, February 27th, he stood before the two houses of Congress with President Arthur on his right, to eulogize his late chief. Before him and around him were the men who had opposed the administration, and who charged the orator himself with having been the principal cause of the troubles which disturbed its short existence. To many men the temptation would have been irresistible to denounce the Stalwarts, and in making a speech that would certainly, on account of the occasion, become historical, to place on record a condemnation of his opponents and their policy. But Mr. Blaine abstained from any such course, and in his allusion to the disputes which agitated the party and the nation last year, displayed good taste and discretion worthy of all praise. While he defended President Garfield and claimed for him freedom from selfish and vindictive motives, he made no assault on his opponents, nor discussed the merits of the struggle. It was no time for angry controversy or a resurrection of painful questions, and Mr. Blaine very wisely contented himself with indicating the excellences of President Garfield's character, and describing the services he had rendered to his country. In doing so Mr. Blaine set an example to his friends on the press who have lately seemed anxious to widen the breach by the violence and recklessness with which they have assailed the men who were once their allies, and whose services they were glad to secure.

The Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill Reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations was last week discussed in the Senate. It provides that for twenty years after its passage no Chinese laborers shall be allowed to enter the United States, and makes the bringing of Chinese laborers during that period by shipmasters a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment. Chinese laborers who are already in this country or who may reach here before the act takes effect are permitted to remain, or, if they have departed, to return. Books of registration are to be opened at the Custom Houses in the several ports of entry where Chinamen, who are entitled either by the terms of the treaty or by reason of present residence within the United States, may be registered and receive certificates describing their persons. Severe penalties are provided for the procurement by one person of more than one certificate, or for forgery or alteration of certificates. Opponents of the bill allege that it is a violation of the spirit of the treaty recently negotiated with China.

Another Set of Star Route Indictments has been found by the Washington Grand Jury. On February 28th Samuel G. Cobell, John N. Miner, and Charles H. Dickson, were indicted for conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States by means of fraudulent bids for 3109 post routes located in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Florida, Alabama and Mississippi, and corruptly combining to obtain contracts for the same by means of bogus sureties, Cobell being the principal and Miner and Dickson the bondsmen. They further indict Miner and Dickson for perjury in falsely swearing that each owned 275 acres of unimproved coal land in Morgan County, Ky., valued at $100,000. On the following day seven other persons were indicted, among whom was John W. Dorsey. In these, as in the other cases, the charges relate to the straw-bond swindle and include the allegation of perjury. On March 4th another list of indictments was presented. The names of Thomas J. Brady and Stephen W. Dorsey were among those of accused persons.

A Few of the Results of Reading Corrupt literature were described by Anthony Comstock in a lecture delivered on February 28th, before the Young Men's Christian Association, New York. Among the facts detailed were the following: On January 12th two girls, one aged ten and the other eleven, ran away from home to become gipsies, the result of reading this pernicious literature. A few days ago Inspector Byrnes arrested a young man, aged nineteen, for murder, whose imagination had been fired by reading of his disreputable heroes. On February 7th a young girl crazed by this kind of reading committed suicide. In November last four boys, not over sixteen, were arrested in Wilkesbarre, Penn., who had formally organized themselves into a band of robbers, and prided themselves on being bandits. A young man arrested in South Framingham, Mass., for sending out the vilest kind of literature, said, pointing to a pile of periodical papers in his closet, "That's what brought me to this;" and from a similar cause a young man in Buffalo set about robbing his employer's safe, meaning to seek adventures in the West. In Brooklyn I found that a boy, crazed by such reading, had led his younger brothers or till they had robbed their mother of over twenty-five articles. A few weeks ago a young man read the details of a railroad catastrophe. He thought he would like to see one, and tied a log on the track while he lay in wait; but he was arrested. In a Western State two boys, one aged thirteen and one fifteen, wrecked a train, killing the engineer. This literature transfers the knife and bludgeon from our hardened criminals to our boys and girls.

A Six Days Walking Match Caused Considerable excitement in New York last week. Thousands of spectators assembled daily in Madison Square Garden to witness the struggle, and around the bulletin boards in the city crowds of people might always be seen eagerly watching the figures as they were recorded. It is impossible to refrain from pitying the men who took part in the contest. Their backers and the men who had staked money on their success were remorseless in their clamor for more work to be done and urging them to greater efforts. The reporters describe the haggard faces of the walkers, their weary, painful steps, and the spasmodic contraction of their muscles as they dragged themselves around the track. One man, the winner of previous races, withdrew after making a score of 411 miles, utterly broken down with the exertions he had made. The exhibition was altogether painful and reprehensible in its character, and the opportunity it afforded to the betting fraternity for gambling was so eagerly seized as to render it a thoroughly scandalous affair, which should never be repeated.

The Floods Resulting from the Break of the Mississippi levees have caused an appalling loss of life, and the destruction of much valuable property. The break in the Bolivar County levee which occurred on March 1st will cost the district over $150,000. Several persons were drowned there and at Riverton, and the accounts of the suffering and loss of life already reported exceed anything that has ever attended inundations of the Mississippi before. A despatch from New Orleans dated March 2d says: "News reaches here of terrible destruction of property, caused by the breaking of the levee at Carson's Landing. A gap of seventy-five feet was first made by the rushing water, and one hundred yards of the levee was soon swept away. The noise of the roaring flood awoke the sleeping citizens, and the utmost consternation ensued. On looking out of their homes they saw the river rapidly spreading over the surrounding country, and, without taking time to clothe themselves, fled for their lives. The keeper of the landing, and two negro children, on seeing the danger to which they were exposed, began their flight for safety, but the waters had rushed in so furiously that they were unable to escape and all three were drowned. A number of others had narrow escapes from watery graves." Congress by joint resolution has appropriated $100,000 for the relief of urgent cases of destitution.

The Bill of Expenses Incurred for Medical attendance during President Garfield's illness has been under the consideration of the committee appointed by Congress. The following are the payments recommended by the committee: To Dr. Bliss, $25,000; to Drs. Agnew and Hamilton, $15,000 each; to Drs. Reyburn and Boynton, $10,000 each; to Mrs. Dr. Edson, $5000. Mr. Crumps, the steward, is allowed $3000, and the other helpers of the Executive Mansion two months' extra pay. The committee recommends the appointment of Surgeon-General Barnes to the rank of Major-General, and his retirement at that grade, and the promotion of Dr. Woodward to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. The committee also recommends the grant to Mrs. Garfield of the remainder of her husband's salary for the current year.

The Use of Non-Intoxicating Wines at the communion service is being energetically advocated by a branch of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of the State of New York. Mrs. R. A. Esmond, of Syracuse, the Superintendent of the Department, has issued an address in which she specifies the reasons for using the unfermented wine, and furnishes directions for its manufacture.

A Daily Noon Prayer Meeting at Jacksonville, Fla., has been commenced. It is held in the rooms formerly occupied by the Young Men's Christian Association, No. 40 Bay Street, every day except Sunday. The inaugural meeting, held on February 23d, was well attended, and the hope is expressed that it will be a permanent means of usefulness. Mr. M. D. Hiscox, who has been instrumental in organizing the meetings, is well known at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting in New York. This meeting has been commenced on the same undenominational lines, and Mr. Hiscox, in issuing an invitation to his fellow-citizens of Jacksonville, describes the happy results that have attended the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, and hopes for a similar blessing there. The effort Mr. Hiscox is making deserves our hearty sympathy and earnest prayers that God may bless it and make it a blessing to the city.

A Fire Broke out in an Insane Asylum at Flatbush, L. I., on February 22d, which occasioned serious alarm. One thousand patients were in the building, but owing to the coolness and presence of mind of the attendants only one patient lost his life by burning. Heavy iron doors placed in the building as a protection in case of fire were closed as soon as the fire was discovered, and thus one wing of the building was saved. It was noticed that three lunatics observing that a fourth who was crippled could not save himself, picked him up and among them carried him down stairs to a place of safety.

An Account of an Invalid Cured through faith and prayer was telegraphed to the New York Herald on Friday from Steubenville, Ohio. It states that Mrs. W. E. Owens, of the Sixth ward of that city, who has been for several months a confirmed invalid, having heard of the recent remarkable cases of healing resulting from the exercise of faith, resolved to appeal to God in her own case. The telegram says: Yesterday afternoon, (March 2d), she read the Bible and then prayed that her health might be restored. Her prayer was answered, and she arose and dressed herself, and seemed to have entirely recovered from her sickness. She has been helpless for months.

Tired of Living, was the Explanation Given of his motive for committing suicide by a young man who shot himself last week in New York. He was the son of respectable parents who supplied him with plenty of money for his support. But he became melancholy and depressed in spirits and it was feared that his mind was affected. At last he wrote on a slip of paper, "I am going to die—I am tired of living," and forthwith committed the fatal act. There are many men weary with the fierce struggle for bread who can understand the young man's weariness of life, but the Christian who sees in his life the preparation for eternity and recognizes in all that befalls him his Father's hand never loses his cheerful acquiescence in the divine will. He is assured that all things work together for good to them that love God, and is content to await God's time for relief (Rom. 8 : 28).

Six Days Floating on an Ice box at Sea is the account a sailor brought to New York on Thursday last gives of his experience. He was one of the crew of the Bahama, which foundered off Cape Hatteras, on February 10th. A boat belonging to the ship, in which were thirteen sailors in great distress, had previously been picked up and brought into port on February 15th. They said that a man named Mathurin with two others had refused to quit the ship when they left, and must have been on her when she foundered. Mathurin was seen by the Pearl floating on an ice-box in mid ocean without food or water. When questioned, he said he refused to go in the boat with the others because it was already dangerously full and he thought his weight might imperil the lives of all. When the Bahama went down, Mathurin saw the large ice-box float, and swam to it, and climbed upon it. He found two ship biscuits, which he ate. His account of his life during the following six days is a thrilling narrative. Hungry, weak, drenched by the waves which every minute threatened to wash him off his precarious support, he was unable to sleep day or night, for he could see following him sharks six to ten feet long which rubbed themselves against the box on which he lay. He says he sang to keep himself company. But for a shower of rain, of which he caught as much as he could in his tarpaulin coat and assuaged his thirst, he must have lost his reason.

A Painful Suspicion which has Attached to an Ohio express messenger for nearly four years has been completely dispelled by a remarkable discovery. In 1878 a messenger at Painesville was entrusted with a parcel containing $21,000, but when he arrived at his destination the parcel was not found among the other packages in his wagon, and he was suspected of having stolen it, though the detectives were never able to trace it satisfactorily. Recently a tradesman in Chardon, O., had occasion to borrow some money, and it was lent to him by a teamster. He noticed that the bills stuck together, and had a musty smell as if they had been hidden away in the earth for some time. He showed them to the police, who at once identified them as part of the money the expressman was suspected of stealing. A search of the teamster's premises was made, and resulted in the discovery of $6500 more of the bills which were also known to have been in the packet. It is supposed that the package must have dropped from the wagon to the road, where it was found by the teamster and appropriated by him. The discovery must be very gratifying to the expressman who has been so long wrongly suspected. Such a case should make us careful of judging each other. When that day comes in which every secret thing will be brought to light, we shall find we have made many mistakes (Eccles. 12 : 14).

A Ludicrous Mistake which might have Affected two lives occurred at Toronto recently. The Toronto Globe of February 28th says: "A Mrs. Wilson came into the city by a late train one night last week from Belleville. She had several children with her, one of them a baby in arms, which was snugly wrapped up in a huge shawl. Another lady arrived from some point West, and was also the owner of a baby similarly protected from cold. The ladies placed their babies in the waiting-room while they went to look up their baggage. When they returned, each took the other's baby, and the lady from Belleville drove to Parkdale, and the lady from the West to the north end of Yonge Street. The babies were promptly put to bed and it was not until morning that the mistake was discovered. Both mothers were then in deep distress, but as both were eager to recover their own children it was not long before a proper exchange was made." It is easy to imagine circumstances in which it would have been impossible to have rectified the mistake so readily. Many Christians of weak faith or under the influence of severe suffering have feared lest they would lose their place in the family of God, but we are assured that even though the vigilance of maternal love may fail, God's love for His children never can (Isa. 49 : 15).

Relief Granted in Answer to Prayer Formed the subject of a communication to the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting a few days ago. Poverty and sickness had fallen on a Christian home, and a number of believing men met there to pray for help. God heard their prayers, and the distressed man was offered a situation where he could earn a maintenance for himself and his family. But money to pay rent and other expenses was urgently needed, and none would be due him for the new work for some time. Again he and his friends appealed to God, and again an answer was received. A gentleman came to the house, wanting some French and Latin documents translated and made an arrangement for it, paying ten dollars in advance.

The New Five-Cent Postage Stamp, which bears a vignette of President Garfield, is soon to be issued to the public. The first proof of it will be presented to Queen Victoria by the American Bank Note Company. The stamp is set in a frame of ebony, containing a mat of sterling silver, upon which is engraved an exquisite border of fine geometric lathe work. This is surrounded by a rod of solid gold nearly a quarter of an inch in diameter. A French plate glass, with bevelled edges, covers the picture and matting, and the whole is enclosed in a fine cedar box lined with royal purple velvet.

OUR LORD'S TRIAL BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And they all condemned Him to be guilty of death."—Mark 14 : 64.

The Balm from the Wounds of Jesus—The Facts of the Passion—I. The Preliminary Examination—Concerning His Disciples—His Doctrine—Triumphant Reply—A Brutal Answer—The Lesson of It—II. The Search for Witnesses—Difficulties of the Prosecution—The Worst Kind of Lie—Consolation in the Charge—It Contained a Reminder—Silence Difficult to Practice—III. The Personal Interrogation—Christ's Answer the Hinge of Salvation—Condemned for His Avowal—Blasphemy if not True—IV. The Condemnation—Unanimous—No Sects in the Anti-Christian Camp—V. The Abuse—What our Sin Deserved—Slander to be Borne Readily—Earnestly Honor Him—Safely Trust in Him.

THIS one sentence is selected because custom demands a text; but in reality we shall follow the entire narrative of our Lord's trial before the high priests. We shall see how the Sanhedrim arrived at their unrighteous sentence, and what they did afterwards, and so, in a sense, we shall be keeping to our text. We have just been reading three passages—John 23 : 12-24; Mark 14 : 53-65; and Luke 22 : 66-71. Please to carry these in your minds while I rehearse the mournful story.

The narrative of our Lord's grief, if it be carefully studied, is harrowing in the extreme. One cannot long think of it without tears; in fact, I have personally known what it is to be compelled to leave my meditations upon it from excess of emotion. It is enough to make one's heart break fully to realize the sufferings of such an One, so lovely in Himself and so loving toward us. Yet this harrowing of the feelings is exceedingly useful. After mourning for Jesus we are raised above our own mourning. There is no consolation under heaven at all like it; for the sorrows of Christ seem to take the sting out of our own sorrows, till they become harmless and endurable. The wounds of Jesus distil a balm which heals all mortal ills.

Nor is this all, though that were much in a world of woe like this; but there is a matchless stimulus about the passion of the Lord. Though you have been almost crushed by the sight of your Lord's agonies, you have risen therefrom strong, resolute, fervent, consecrated. Nothing stirs our hearts' depths like His heart's anguish. Nothing is too hard for us to attempt or to endure for One who sacrificed Himself for us. To be reviled for His dear sake who suffered such shame for us becomes no great affliction; even reproach itself when borne for Him becomes greater riches than all the treasures of Egypt. To suffer in body and in mind, even unto death for Him, were rather a privilege than an exaction; such love so swells our hearts that we vehemently pant for some way of expressing our indebtedness. We are grieved to think that our best will be so little; but we are solemnly resolved to give nothing less than our best to Him who loved us and gave Himself for us.

1. We will begin our narrative this morning by first asking you to think of

THE PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION of our blessed Lord and Master by the high priest. They brought in our Lord from the garden bound; but they also kept fast hold upon Him, for we read of "the men that held Him." They were evidently afraid of their prisoner, even when they had Him entirely in their power. He was all gentleness and submission; but conscience made cowards of them all, and they therefore took all a coward's care to hold Him in their grasp. As the court had not yet gathered in sufficient numbers for a general examination, the high priest resolved that he would fill up the time by personally interrogating his prisoner.

He commenced his malicious exercise. The high priest asked Jesus concerning His disciples. We cannot tell what were the questions, but I suppose they were something like these: "How is it that Thou hast gathered about Thee a band of men? What did they with Thee? What was Thine ultimate intention to do by their means? Who were they? Were they not a set of fanatics, or men discontented and ready for sedition?" I do not know how the crafty Caiaphas put his questions; but the Saviour gave no reply to this particular inquiry. What could He have said if He had attempted to answer? Ah, brothers, what good could He have said of His disciples? We may be sure He would say no ill.

He might have said, "Concerning my disciples, one of them has betrayed me; he has still the blood-money in his hand which you gave him as my price. Another of them, down in the hall there, before the cock crows will deny that he ever knew me, and add oaths and cursing to his denial; and as for the rest, they have all forsaken me and fled." Therefore our Lord said nothing concerning His disciples, for He will not turn the accuser of His own, whom He came, not to condemn, but to justify.

The high priest also asked him concerning His doctrine. I suppose he said to Him, "What new teaching is this of Thine? Are we not sufficient to teach the people—the Scribes so learned in the law, the Pharisees so attentive to ritual, the Sadducees so philosophical and speculative? Why needest Thou intrude into this domain? I suppose Thee to be little more than a peasant's son; what is this strange teaching of Thine?"

A BLAMELESS LIFE.

To this inquiry our Lord did answer, and what a triumphant reply it was! Oh that we could always speak, when it is right to speak, as meekly and as wisely as He! He said, "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort, and in secret I have said nothing. Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me what I have said unto them; behold, they know what I have said." Oh, brethren, no reply to slander can be compared with a blameless life. Jesus had lived in the full blaze of day where all could see, and yet He was able to challenge accusation and say, "Ask them which heard me." Happy is the man who has no need to defend himself because his works and words are solid testimonials to his uprightness and goodness.

This overwhelming answer, however, brought the Saviour a blow from one of the officers of the court who stood by. Was not this a most shocking deed? Here was the first of a new order of assaults. Hitherto we have not heard of strokes and blows; but now it is fulfilled: "They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon His cheek." This was the first of a long series of assaults. I wonder who the man was that struck the Master so. I could wish that the Master's reply to him may have influenced his heart to repentance; but if not, it is certain that he led the van in personal assaults upon our Lord's person; his impious hand first struck Him. Surely if he died in impenitence the memory of that blow must remain as a never-dying worm within him.

Yet while He felt that blow, and was perhaps half staggered by it, the Master did not lose His composure, or exhibit the least resentment. His reply was everything it ought to be. There is not a word too much. He meekly said, "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?" Enough, surely, if there remained any tenderness in the heart of the aggressor, to have made him turn his hand upon his own breast in penitential grief. One would not have wondered had he cried out, "Forgive me, O Thou divinely meek and gentle One, and let me henceforth be Thy disciple."

Thus have we seen the first part of our Lord's sufferings in the house of the high priest, and the lesson from it is just this: Let us be meek and lowly in heart as the Saviour was, for herein lay His strength and dignity. You tell me I have said that before. Yes, brethren, and I shall have to say it several more times before you and I have learned the lesson well. It is hard to be meek when falsely accused, meek when roughly interrogated, meek when a cunning adversary is on the catch, meek when smarting under a cruel blow which was a disgrace to a court of justice. You have heard of the patience of Job, but it pales before the patience of Jesus. Admire His forbearance, but do not stop at admiration; copy His example, write under this head-line and follow every stroke.

The preliminary examination is therefore over, and it has ended in no success whatever for the high priest. He has questioned Jesus and he has smitten Him, but the ordeal brings nothing to content the adversary. The prisoner is supremely victorious, the assailant is baffled.

II. Now comes a second scene,

THE SEARCH FOR WITNESSES

against Him. "The chief priests and all the council sought for witness against Jesus to put Him to death; and found none." A strange court that meets with the design to find the prisoner guilty, resolved in some way or other to compass his death. They must proceed according to the forms of justice, and so they summon witnesses, though all the while they violate the spirit of justice, for they ransack Jerusalem to find witnesses who will perjure themselves to accuse the Lord.

They scour Jerusalem to bring forth witnesses against Jesus; but they had great difficulty in accomplishing their design, because they were bound to examine the witnesses apart, and they could not make them agree. Lies cannot be easily made to pair with each other, whereas truths are cut to the same pattern. Moreover, many sorts of witnesses that they could readily find they did not dare to bring forward. Witnesses were forthcoming who could testify that Jesus had spoken against the tradition of the elders; but in that some who were in the council, namely, the Sadducees, were agreed with him to a large extent. It would never do to bring forward a charge about which they would not be unanimous.

His denunciations of the Pharisees could not be the charge, for these pleased the Sadducees; neither could they allege his outcry against the Sadducees, for in this the Pharisees were agreed with Him. You recollect how Paul, when brought before this Sanhedrim, took advantage of their division of opinion and cried, "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question;" and in this manner created a dissension among the conclave, which for a time wrought in his favor. Our Lord took higher and nobler ground, and did not stoop to turn their folly to His own benefit; yet they, being conscious of their internal feuds, avoided those points upon which they were not in harmony.

But might they not have found some witnesses to swear that He had talked about a kingdom that He was setting up? Might not this readily have been made to mean sedition and rebellion? Yes, but then that was rather a charge to allege against Him before Pilate's civil court, whereas theirs was an ecclesiastical tribunal. Moreover, there were Herodians in the council who were very restive under the Roman yoke, and could not have had the face to condemn any one for being a patriot; and beside, the people outside would have sympathized with Jesus all the more if they had supposed that He would lead them on rebelling against Cæsar. Therefore they could not urge that point. They must have been greatly puzzled to know what to do; especially when even on those points which they decided to bring forward the witnesses no sooner opened their mouths than they contradicted each other.

At last they had it. There came two whose evidence was somewhat agreed; and they asserted that on a certain occasion Jesus Christ had said, "I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands." Here was blasphemy against the holy and beautiful house of the Lord, and this would serve their turn. Now, the Saviour had said something which was a little like the testimony of these false witnesses, and a misunderstanding had made it more like it; but still their statement was a lie, and none the less a lie because a shadow of truth had fallen upon it, for is that which is manufactured out of a truth; it does more mischief a great deal than if it were a falsehood from stem to stern.

THE WORST KIND OF LIE

The Saviour had not said, "I will destroy this temple;" He said, "Destroy this temple," that is to say, "Ye will destroy it, and ye may destroy it." He had not referred to the Jerusalem temple at all; this spake He concerning the temple of His body which would be destroyed. Christ has never said, "Destroy this temple which is made with hands, and I will build another without hands;" in His language there is no allusion to hands at all. Yet even on that charge they did not agree. One said one thing upon it, and another said another, so that even this paltry accusation could not be brought against the Saviour. Their patched-up falsehood was made of such rotten stuff that the pieces would not hold together. They were ready to swear to anything that came into their perjured imaginations, but they could not be got to swear any two of them to the selfsame thing. Meanwhile as the sheep before her shearers, He is dumb, and openeth not His mouth; and I suppose the reason was partly that He might fulfil the prophecy, partly because the grandeur of His soul could not stoop to contend with liars, and most of all because His innocence needed no defence. He that is in some measure guilty is eager to apologize and to extenuate; His excuses usually suggest to men of experience the belief that there may be some ground for the accusation. He that is perfectly innocent is in no haste to answer his slanderers, for they soon answer one another.

THE LORD STANDS SILENT;

We must not refrain from noticing the comfort which in some degree had been ministered to our Lord by the accusation which came most to the front. He stands there, and He knows they are about to put Him to death, but they themselves remind Him that their power over Him has no longer lease than three days, and at the end of that short time He will be raised up again, no more to be at their disposal. His enemies witnessed the resurrection to Him. I say not that His memory was weak, or that He would possibly have forgotten it amid His sorrows, but yet our Lord was human, and modes of comfort which are valuable to us were also useful to Him. When the mind is tortured with malicious falsehood, and the whole man is tossed about by pains and griefs, it is good for us to be reminded of the consolations of God.

Now, brethren, here again we learn the same lesson as before, namely, let us gain meekness, and prove it by our power to hold our tongues. Eloquence is difficult to acquire, but silence is far more hard to practise. A man may much sooner learn to speak well than learn not to speak at all. We are in such a hurry to vindicate our own cause that we damage it by rash speech; if we were calm, gentle, quiet, forbearing as the Saviour was, our pathway to victory would be much more easy.

Learn also this other lesson, that we must expect to be misrepresented; we may reckon that our words will have other meanings to ungracious ears than those which we intended; we may expect that when we teach one thing which is true they will make us out to have stated another which is false; but let us not be overwhelmed by this fiery trial as though it were some strange thing. Our Lord and Master has endured it, and the servants must not escape.

Amid the din of these lies and perjuries, I hear the still small voice of a truth most precious, for like as Jesus stood for us at the bar, and they could not cause an accusation to abide upon Him, so when we shall stand in Him at the last great day, washed in His blood and covered with His righteousness, we too shall be clear. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" If Satan should appear as the accuser of the brethren, He will be met by the voice, "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan, even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuke thee: is not this a brand plucked out of the burning?" Yes, beloved, we too shall be cleared of slander. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. The glorious righteousness of Him who was falsely accused shall deliver the saints and all iniquity shall stop her mouth.

III. But I must not dwell too long even on such themes as these, and therefore I pass on to which followed upon the failure to bring forward

THE PERSONAL INTERROGATION

witnesses. The high priest, too indignant to sit still, rises and stands over the prisoner like a lion roaring over his prey, and begins to question Him again. The trial had been a dead failure up to that point, and he knew it, and was red with rage. Now he attempts to bully the prisoner, that he may extract some declaration from Him which may save all further trouble of witnesses, and end the matter. The question was forced home by a solemn adjuration, and it effected its purpose, for the Lord Jesus did speak, though He knew that He was thereby furnishing a weapon against Himself. He felt under bond to answer the high priest of His people when he used such adjuration, bad man as that high priest was; and He could not draw back from a charge so solemn lest He should seem by His silence to deny the truth upon which the salvation of the world is made to hinge.

So when the high priest said to Him, "Art Thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" how distinctly and outspoken was the Master's reply. "Though He knew that His death would thus be compassed, He witnessed a good confession. He plainly said, 'I am,' and then He added to that declaration, 'Ye shall see the Son of man,'—so He brings out His humanity as well as His deity, 'sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.' What a majestic faith! It is wonderful to think that He should be so calm as to confront His mockers, and assert His glory while He was in the depths of shame.

I admire the meekness that could be silent, I admire the meekness that could speak gently, but I still more wonder at the meekness that could speak courageously, and still be meek. Somehow or other, when we rouse ourselves to courage, we let in harshness at the same door, or if we shut out our anger, we are very apt to forget our firmness. Jesus never slays one virtue to make room for another. His character is complete, full-orbed, perfect, whichever way we look at it.

Notice, ere we pass away from this point, that, practically, the trial and the interrogation ended in our Lord's being condemned because of

HIS AVOWAL

of His deity. They said, "Ye have heard the blasphemy; what think ye? And they all condemned Him to be guilty of death." I cannot make out at all those people who call themselves Unitarians, and deny our Lord's deity. Unitarians we also are, for we believe in one God, and one God only; but they tell us that this blessed Christ our Master is not God, and yet they own that He was the most excellent of men, the most perfect of human beings. I cannot see it myself. He seems to me to be a blasphemer, and nothing else, if He be not God; and the Jews evidently held that opinion, and treated Him accordingly. If He had not said that God was His Father, they would not have been so enraged against Him. They put Him to death because of the assertion of His deity, and the declaration that He would sit at the right hand of power and judge the world.

To-day multitudes are willing to take Christ as a teacher, but they will not have Him as the Son of God. I do not doubt that the Christian religion might be received in many places if it were shorn of its strength; if, in fact, its very soul and bowels were torn out of it, by setting forth Jesus as one of the prophets and nothing more. Hear how our wise men talk of Him as one of a line of great reformers, such as Moses, Samuel, Elijah, and they often add Confucius and Mahomet. Do we give place to this? No, not for an instant. He is verily the Son of the Blessed. He is divine, or false. The accusation of blasphemy must lie against Him if He be not the Son of the Highest.

IV. We must now pass on and linger for a second or two over

THE CONDEMNATION.

They condemned Him out of His own mouth; but this, while it wore the semblance of justice, was really unjust. The prisoner at the bar has affirmed that He is the Son of God. What next? May He not speak the truth? If it be the truth He must not be condemned, but adored. Justice requires that an inquiry be made as to whether He be the Christ, the Son of the Blessed, or not. He has claimed to be the Messiah. Very well, all those in the court are expecting the Messiah; some of them expect Him to appear very speedily. May not this be the sent one of the Lord? Let an inquiry be made into His claims. What is His lineage? Where was He born? Have any prophets attested Him? Has He wrought miracles? Some such inquiries are due to any man whose life is at stake. You cannot justly condemn a man to die without examining into the truth of his defence, for it may turn out that his statements are correct. But, no, they will not hear the man they hate, the mere claim condemns Him; it is blasphemy, and He must die.

Alas, how many there are who condemn Christ's doctrine without making due inquiries into it—condemn it on the most trivial grounds. They come to hear a sermon, and perhaps find fault with the mannerism of the preacher, as if that were sufficient reason for denying the truth which He preaches; or else they say, "This is so strange—we cannot believe it." Why not? Are not strange things sometimes true, and is not many a truth wondrously strange until you get familiar with it? These men will not condescend to hear Christ's proof of claim; they will make no inquiry. In this, like the Jewish priests, they practically cry, "Away with Him! Away with Him!"

A UNANIMOUS VERDICT.

Observe that they were all agreed; there were no dissentients; they had taken care, I have no doubt, not to let Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea know anything about this meeting of theirs. They held it in the night, and they only rehearsed it in the early morning, for the sake of keeping their old Rabbinical law that they must try prisoners by daylight. They hurried up the trial, and any that might have spoken against their bloodthirsty sentence were kept out of the way. The assembly was unanimous. Alas for the unanimity of ungodly hearts against Christ! It is wonderful that there should be such quarrels among Christ's friends, and such unity among His foes, when the point is to put Him to death. But here are we split up into sections and parties, and often at war with one another. O Lord of love, forgive us; King of concord, come and reign over us, and bring us into a perfect unity around Thyself!

The sentence was "death." I say nothing of it but this. Death was the sentence due to me, the sentence due to you, and they laid it upon our Substitute. "Worthy of death,"—they said—all of them. All hands were held up; all voices said "Yea, yea" to the verdict. Yet there was no fault in Him. Say rather, there was every excellence in Him. As I hear Jesus condemned to die my soul falls at His feet and cries, "Blessed Lord, now hast Thou taken my condemnation; there is, therefore, none for me. Now hast Thou taken my cup of death to drink, and henceforth it is dry to me. Glory be to Thy blessed name, henceforth and for ever."

V. I am almost glad that my time is so far advanced, for I must needs set before you the fifth and most painful scene. No sooner have these evil men of the Sanhedrim pronounced Him guilty of death, than the servants, the guards, and those that kept the high-priest's hall, eager to please their masters, and all touched with the same brute-like spirit which was in them, straightway began to abuse the infinite majesty of our Lord. Consider

THE ABUSE.

Let me read the words: "Some began to spit on Him." "Began to spit on Him!" Thus was contempt expressed more effectively than by words. Be astonished, O heavens, and be horribly afraid. His face is the light of the universe, His person is the glory of heaven, and they "began to spit on Him!" Alas, my God, that man should be so base!

Some went further, and they "covered His face." It is an Eastern custom to cover the face of the condemned, as if they were not fit to see the light, nor fit to behold their fellow-men. I know not whether for this reason, or in pure mockery, they covered His face, so that they could not see it, and He could not see them. How could they thus put out the sun and shut up bliss. Then when all was dark to Him we read that they began to say, "Prophecy, Who is he that smote Thee?" Then another did the like, and many were the cruel cuffs they laid about His blessed face. The mediæval writers delighted to talk about the teeth that were broken, the bruises on the cheeks, the blood which flowed, the flesh that was bruised and blackened; but we dare not thus imagine. Scripture has cast a veil, and there let it abide. Yet it must have been an awful sight. Nothing was thought bad enough. They invented all they could of shame and scorn, and He stood patient there though a single flash of His eye would have consumed them in a moment.

Brothers, sisters, this is what our sin deserved. A shameful thing art thou, O sin! Thou dost deserve to be spit upon! This is what sin is constantly doing to Christ. Whenever you and I sin we do, as it were, spit in His face; we also hide His eyes by trying to forget that He sees us; and we also smite Him whenever we transgress and grieve His Spirit. Talk not of cruel Jews; let us think of ourselves, and let us be humbled by the thought. This is what the ungodly world is ever doing to our blessed Master. They also would hide His eyes which are the light of the world; they also despise His Gospel, and spit upon it as an utterly worn out and worthless thing; they also do despite to the members of His body through His poor afflicted saints who have to bear slander and abuse for His dear sake.

I leave this subject, hoping that you will pursue it in your meditations. Here are

THREE OBSERVATIONS.

First, how ready should we be to bear slander and ridicule for Jesus' sake. Do not get into a huff, and think it a hard thing that people should mock at you. Who are you, dear sir? Who are you? What can you be if compared with Christ? If they spat upon Him, why should they not spit upon you? If they buffeted Him, why should they not buffet you? Shall your Master have all the rough of it? Shall He have all the bitter, and you all the sweet? A pretty soldier you, to demand better fare than your Captain!

How earnestly, next, ought we to honor our dear Lord. If men were so eager to put Him to shame, let us be ten times more earnest to bring Him glory. Is there anything we can do to-day by which He may be honored? Let us set about it. Can we make any sacrifice? can we perform any difficult task which would glorify Him? Let us not deliberate, but at once do it with our might. Let us be inventive in modes of glorifying Him, even as His adversaries were ingenious in the methods of His shame.

Lastly, how surely and how sweetly may all who believe in Him come and rest their souls in His hands. Surely I know that He who suffered this, since He was verily the Son of the Blessed, must have ability to save us. Such griefs must be a full atonement for our transgressions. Glory be to God, that spittle on His countenance means a clear, bright face for me. Those false accusations on His character mean no condemnation for me. That putting Him to death proves the certainty of our text last Sabbath morning, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me hath everlasting life." Let us sweetly rest in Jesus, and if ever our faith is agitated, let us get away to the hall of Caiaphas, and see the Just standing for the unjust, the Faultless One bearing condemnation for sinners. Let us in the high-priest's hall judge and condemn every sin and every doubt, and come forth glorying that the Christ has conquered for us, and that we now wait for His appearing with delight. God bless you, brothers, for Christ's sake. Amen.

[PORTIONS OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—John 23 : 12-24; Mark 14 : 53-65; Luke 22 : 66-71.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

Captain Frank Graves.

The Connaught Institute for Soldiers.

Interior of Connaught Institute.

CAPTAIN GRAVES AND THE CON-NAUGHT INSTITUTE FOR SOLDIERS.

IF an illustration were needed of the reproductive and far-reaching influence of a good work it might be found in the above portrait and sketch of buildings. On July 14th, 1881, we published a portrait of Mrs. Daniell and a picture of the Soldiers' Mission Hall she has founded near the great camp of Aldershot, England. We also published an account of the branch mission established and managed by her daughter for the benefit of the soldiers. The illustration now given is of an officer converted at that mission, and of the institution he has been instrumental in organizing in another part of England.

In the year 1869 a young man, named Frank Graves, was appointed an officer in the British army. High hopes were entertained respecting him, for he came of a distinguished family, his father having held a responsible office in the law courts and his uncle being Bishop of Limerick, Ireland. These hopes were encouraged by the result of his military studies. He entered the Wellington College at Kingstown in 1867, and from there he proceeded to the chief military training establishment in Great Britain, Sandhurst. At his examination at the close of his curriculum he passed with honors so high that he was presented with a free commission, although at that time large sums of money were paid for the privilege of commanding in the army. He joined the regiment called the Twentieth Hussars, and not long afterward accompanied that regiment to India.

Not much has been related of the details of his life in that eastern dependency of the British Empire, but enough is known to prove that if not absolutely vicious and immoral it was a Godless life. When the regiment was recalled to England Captain Graves looked forward to a life of pleasure.

Young officers are popular in society, and invitations to balls and parties were plentiful, and were eagerly accepted. Beside these, when opportunity offered, he would attend the theatre, being an enthusiastic and ardent lover of the drama. Besides these amusements, in which many precious hours were frittered away, he gave close attention to racing matters. The chief racing events of the year formed the staple subject of conversation in the officers' mess-room, and none were more familiar with the state of the odds and betting quotations and the prospects of the favorites than Captain Frank Graves.

A blessed change, however, was at hand. His regiment was sent to Aldershot, and there he was invited to the Soldiers' Mission Hall. He went and was cordially received by Miss Daniell. One visit led to others and Captain Graves was impressed with the importance of attending to the concerns of his soul. One service, especially, awoke within him intense anxiety. At that service one of speakers delivered an earnest address on "The Cities of Refuge," in which he dwelt on the imminence of the peril of the guilty man with the implacable avenger at his heels who delayed his flight to a place of safety. God blessed the warning to the young captain, and he was soon able to see in Jesus the Refuge of his soul.

The Mission Hall became very dear to him after this, for it had been his spiritual birthplace. He conceived the idea of multiplying and extending an agency which had been the means of so much good to himself. He, accordingly, both privately and publicly, advocated the building of other halls, and explained as he had opportunity the good they were capable of effecting. More than one person who heard him responded to the earnest young officer's appeals, and ultimately he received sufficient money to justify him in establishing one hall. With such money as he could give from his own pocket, and with the gifts confided to him, he went to work, and now the institute of which the above is a picture has been built at Brighton and fitted up. Its benefits are not confined exclusively to the soldier, but civilians, and especially mechanics, are encouraged to avail themselves of its privileges. It contains a reading-room, and class-rooms where instruction is given gratuitously and where Bible classes are held. There is besides, a large hall, in which religious services have been held and where some highly successful evangelistic meetings have lately closed.

THE PROPHETIC ASPECT OF THE JEWISH PERSECUTION.

By Mr. Charles Reade.

THE well-known novelist, whose remarkable conversion last year was described in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has written to an English daily paper a letter on the subject of the Jewish persecutions from which we extract the following remarks:

"The Jewish nation, though under a cloud, will eventually resume their ancient territory, which is so evidently kept waiting for them. The prophecies are clear as day on two points: That the Jews are to repossess Palestine, and, indeed, to rule from Lebanon to Euphrates; and that this event is to be the first of a great series of changes, leading to a vast improvement in the condition of poor suffering mankind and of creation in general. Now we have here in prospect a glorious event as sure as the sun will rise to-morrow. The only difference is that the sun will rise at a certain hour, and the Jews will occupy Syria and resume their national glory at an uncertain day. No doubt it is the foible of mankind to assume that an uncertain date must be a distant one. But that is unreasonable. Surely it is the duty of wise and sober men to watch precursory signs and lend our humble co-operation, should so great a privilege be accorded to us.

"This sudden persecution of the Jews in the very nation where they are most numerous—may it not be a precursory sign and a reminder from Providence that their abiding city is not in European Tartary? I almost think some such reminder was needed; for when I was a boy the pious Jews still longed for the Holy Land. They prayed, like Daniel, with their windows open toward Jerusalem.

"Yet, now that the broken and impoverished Saracen would cede them territory at one-tenth of its agricultural and commercial value, a cold indifference seems to have come over them. I often wonder at this change of sentiment about so great a matter, and in so short a period, comparatively speaking, and puzzle myself as to the reason.

"Two solutions occur to me: 1. Dispersed in various nations, whose average inhabitants are inferior in intelligence and forethought to themselves, they thrive as individual aliens more than they may think so great a multitude of Jews could thrive in a land of their own, where blockheads would be scarce. 2. They have for centuries contracted their abilities to a limited number of peaceful arts and trades; they may distrust their power to diversify their abilities, and be suddenly a complete nation, with soldiers, sailors, merchants, husbandmen, as well as financiers and artists.

"But it is now proved that sojourning among inferior nations has more drawbacks than living at home. True, the Russian yoke has for years been selling to the Jews his summer labor in winter, and at a heavy discount. But the improvident Russians have turned like wild beasts upon them, and outwitted, lawfully, have massacred them contrary to law. Palestine can be colonized effectually from Russia alone, where there are 3,000,000 Jews trembling for life and property; and the rest would follow. As to the second objection, History is a looking-glass at our backs. Whatever Jews have done Jews may do. They are a people of genius, and genius is not confined by nature, but by will, by habit, or by accident. What have these people tried and failed in? Warriors, writers, builders, merchants, lawgivers, husbands, and supreme in all! In this history repeats itself.

"They shall be great in the arts of peace and war, and their enemies melt away before them like snow off a dyke. Should they seem to require help at starting from any other nation, blessed will be the nation that proffers it; and the nation that persecutes them will be made an example of in some way or other. Therefore, if by any chance this recent outrage should decide the Jewish leaders to colonize Palestine from Russia, let us freely offer ships, seamen, money—whatever we are asked for. It will be a better national investment than Egyptian, Brazilian, or Peruvian bonds."

MOTHER'S GRAVE.

A WEALTHY merchant was passing out of the gate of a village cemetery when he met a group of children. Their intelligent countenances and subdued manner, evidently the result of grief, impressed him deeply. He followed them at a distance, observing them without letting them perceive that he was doing so. He saw the children go to a particular grave, which, from the direct path they took, he inferred must have often been visited before by the same little feet. They stood by it for a few minutes looking down at it, while tears trickled down their childish faces. Then the eldest girl knelt down and lovingly deposited a wreath on the grave, her sister and little brother meanwhile thoughtfully looking on. The children remained nearly an hour and then left it with reluctance.

The merchant was a childless man, but he loved children, and he was drawn toward the little group by sympathy with their evident grief. Only two years before in that same cemetery he had buried, within a few weeks of each other, his only son and daughter, and his house had for him still a forlorn and bereaved association. Its silence seemed to him like the silence of the tomb, and the pattering of tiny feet with which its rooms had once been familiar he missed sorely. He followed the children as they left the cemetery, drawn toward them by a fellowship of suffering. They had not far to go. A boarding-school stood a short distance away and they entered its gates and were lost to his sight. He walked sadly to the depot, whence he was swiftly carried to the city. On arriving at home he told his wife of the interest evoked by the children, and a project was discussed and decided on.

The next day the merchant was in the village again and called at the boarding-school to learn the story of the children. He was told that they were orphans. Their mother was Catherine Howard, a lady of education and refinement, but with little pecuniary resources. She had been left a widow when still young. Her husband had been carried off in all the strength of a healthy and robust manhood, and in his last moments had committed the children to her care. His temperate and thrifty habits enabled him to leave a small property, barely sufficient for their maintenance and education while they were little ones, and as to the future, he always said he could confidently commit them to God if he and their mother did but rightly train them while they were young.

A Mother's Grave.

On the death of their father, this was the daily endeavor and constant aim of Catherine Howard. But after two years had passed, she was herself laid upon the bed of sickness, and unable to do anything but pray for her children and speak a few loving words to them as they returned from school. When, at length, the doctor announced that there was no hope whatever of her recovery, though greatly distressed at first on account of the children, her firm trust in God soon enabled her to say "Thy will be done," and calmly commit their temporal and spiritual interests to Him. Even before the time anticipated by the doctor, her feeble frame gave way to the rapid consumption which had seized it, and her remains were carried by sympathizing neighbors to the quiet little cemetery where the merchant had met the children.

The merchant inquired as to the disposition of the children, and learned that it was worthy of all praise. He made their acquaintance, and after a year's interval, during which they often visited at his house, he and his wife adopted them as their own, and so the confidence their father and mother had placed in God's protecting care was fulfilled.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 142.)

Felix Sefton's Proposal.

CANON PASCAL clasped Felix's hand with a hearty pressure, such as few hands know how to give; though it is one of the most tender and most refined expressions of friendship. Felix grasped his with an unconscious grip which made Canon Pascal wince, though he said nothing. For a few minutes the two men stood gazing upward in reverent silence, each brain busy with its own thoughts. "You were coming to see me!" said Canon Pascal at last.

"Yes," answered Felix, in a voice faltering with eager emotion.

"On some special errand?" pursued Canon Pascal. "Don't let us lose time in beating about the bush, then. You cannot say anything that will not be interesting to me, Felix; for I always find a lad like you, and at your age, has something in his mind worth listening to. What is it, my son?"

"I don't want to beat about the bush," stammered Felix, "but oh! if you only knew how I love Alice! More than words can tell. You've known me all my life, and Alice has known me. Will you let her be my wife?"

The smile was gone from Canon Pascal's face. A moment ago, and he, gazing up at the moon, had been recalling, with a boyish freshness of heart, the days of his own happy though protracted courtship of the dear wife, who might be gazing at the same scene from her window in his country rectory. His face grew almost harsh with its grave thoughtfulness as his eyes fastened upon the agitated features of the young man beside him. A fine-looking young fellow, he said to himself; with a frank, open nature, and a constitution and disposition unspoiled by the world. He needed nobody to tell him what his old pupil was, for he knew him as well as he knew his own boys, but he had never thought of him as any other than a boy. Alice too was a child still. This sudden demand struck him into a mood of silent and serious thought; he paced to and fro for a while along the corridor, with Felix equally silent and serious at his side.

"You've no idea how much I love her!" Felix at last ventured to say.

"Hush my boy!" he answered, with a sharp, imperative tone in his voice. "I loved Alice's mother before you were born; and I love her more every day of my life. You children don't know what love means."

Felix answered by a gesture of denial. Not know what love meant, when neither day nor night was the thought of Alice absent from his inmost heart! He had been almost afraid of the vehemence of his own passion, lest it should prove a hindrance to him in God's service. Canon Pascal drew his arm affectionately through his, and turned back to pace the cloister once more.

"I'm trying to think," he said, in a gentler voice, "that Alice is out of the nursery, and you out of the schoolroom. It is difficult to realize that Felix."

"You were present at my ordination last week," exclaimed Felix, in an aggrieved tone; "the Church, and the bishop, and you did not think me too young to take charge of souls. Surely you cannot urge that I am not old enough to take care of one whom I love better than my own life!"

Canon Pascal pressed Felix's arm closer to his side.

"Oh, my boy!" he said, "you will discover that it is easier to commit unknown souls to anybody's charge than to give away one's child, body, soul, and spirit. It is a solemn thing we are talking of; more solemn, in some respects, than my girl's death. I would rather follow Alice to the grave than see her enter into a marriage not made for her in heaven."

"So would I," answered Felix tremulously.

"And to make sure that any marriage is made in heaven!" mused the Canon, speaking as if to himself, with his head sunk in thought. "There's the grand difficulty! For oh! Felix, my son, it is not love only that is needed, but wisdom; yes! the highest wisdom, that which cometh down from above, and is first pure, and then peaceable. For how could Christ Himself be the Husband of the Church, if He was not both the wisdom of God and the love of God? How could God be the heavenly Father of us all, if He was not infinite in wisdom? Know you not what Bacon saith: 'To love and to be wise is not granted unto man?'"

"I dare not say I am wise," answered Felix; "but surely such love as I bear to Alice will bring wisdom."

"And does Alice love you?" asked Canon Pascal.

"I did not think it right to ask her," he replied.

"There there's some hope still," said the Canon, more joyously; "the child is scarcely twenty yet. Do not you be in a hurry, my boy. You do not know what woman is yet; how delicately and tenderly organized; how full of seeming contradictions and uncertainties, often with a blessed meaning in them, ah, a heavenly meaning, but hard to be understood and apprehended by the rougher portion of humanity. Study them a little longer, Felix, take another year or two before you fix on your life-mistress."

"You forget how many years I have lived under the same roof as Alice," replied Felix eagerly, "and how many women I have lived with; my mother, my grandmother, Phebe, and Hilda. Surely I know more about them than most men."

"All good women," he answered; "happy lad! blessed lad, I should rather say. They have been better to thee than angels. Phebe has been more than a guardian angel to thee, though thou knowest not all thou owest to her yet. But a wife, Felix, is different, God knows, from mother, or sister, or friend. God chooses our kinsfolk for us; but man chooses his own wife; having free will in that choice on which hangs his own life, and the lives of others. Yet the wisest of men said, 'Whoso findeth a wife findeth a good thing, and obtaineth favor of the Lord.' Ay, a good wife is the token of such loving favor as we know not yet in this world."

The Canon's voice had fallen into a low and gentle tone, little louder than a whisper. The dim, obscure light in the cloisters scarcely gave Felix a chance of seeing the expression of his face; but the young man's heart beat high with hope.

"You don't say No to me?" he faltered.

"How can I say No or Yes?" asked Canon Pascal, almost with an accent of surprise. "I will talk it over with your mother and Alice's mother; but the Yes or No must come from Alice herself. What am I that I should stand between you two and God, if it is His will to bestow His sweetest boon upon you? Only do not disturb the child, Felix. Leave her fancy-free a little longer."

"And you are willing to take me as your son? You do not count me unworthy?" he exclaimed.

"I've boys of my own," he answered, "whose up-growing I've watched from the day of their birth, and who are precious to me as my own soul; and you, Felix, come next to them. You've been like another son to me. But I must see your mother. Who knows what thoughts she may not have for her only son?"

"None, none that can come between Alice and me," cried Felix rapturously. "Father! yes, I know what it is to have a father again."

A sob rose to his throat as he uttered the word father. He seemed to see his own father again, as he remembered him in his childhood, and as Phebe's portrait had recalled him vividly to his mind. If he had only lived till now to witness, and to share in this new happiness! It seemed as if his early death gathered an additional sadness about it, since he had left the world while so much joy and gladness had been enfolded in the future. Even in the first moment of ineffable happiness he promised himself that he would go and visit his father's foreign grave.

Now there was no longer a doubt weighing upon his spirit, Felix longed to tell his mother all. The slight cloud that had arisen of late years between them was so gossamer-like yet that the faintest breath could drive it away. Though her boy was not the brilliant genius she had secretly and fondly hoped he would prove, he was still dearer to Felicity than aught else on earth or, indeed, in heaven; and her love for him was deeper than she supposed. On his part he had never lost that chivalrous tenderness, blended with deferential awe, with which he had regarded her from his early boyhood. His love for Alice was so utterly different from his love for her, that he had never compared them, and they had not come into any kind of collision yet.

Felix sought his mother in her library. Felicity was alone, reading in the light of a lamp which shed a strong illumination over her. In his eyes she was incomparably the loveliest woman he had ever seen, not even excepting Alice; and the stately magnificence of her velvet dress, and rich lace, and costly jewels, was utterly different from that of any other woman he knew. For Mrs. Pascal dressed simply, as became the wife of a country rector; and Phebe, in her studio, always wore a blouse or apron of brown holland, which suited her well, making her homely and domestic in appearance as she was in nature. Felicity looked like a queen in his eyes. When she heard his voice speaking to her, having not heard his step on the soft carpet, Felicity looked up with a smile in her dark eyes. To-morrow her son was about to leave her roof, and her heart felt very soft towards him. She had scarcely realized that he was a man, until she knew that he had decided to have a place and a dwelling of his own.

She stretched out both hands to him, with a gesture of tenderness peculiar to herself, and shown only to him. It was as if one hand could not link them closely enough; could not bring them so nearly heart to heart. Felix took them both into his own, and knelt down before her; his young face flushed with eagerness, and his eyes, so like her own, fastened upon hers.

"Your face speaks for you," she said, pressing one of her rare kisses upon it. "What is it my boy has to tell me?"

"Oh, mother," he cried, "you will never think I love you less than I have always done? See, I kiss your feet still as I used to do when I was a boy."

He bent his head to caress the little feet, and then laid it on his mother's lap, while she let her white fingers play with his hair.

"Why should you love me less than you have always done?" she asked, in a sweet, languid voice. "Have I ever changed towards you, Felix?"

"No, mother, no," he answered, "but to-night I feel how different I am from what I was but a year or two ago. I am a man now; I was a boy then."

"You will always be a boy to me," she said, with a tender smile.

"Yet I am as old as my father was when you were married," he replied.

Felicity's face grew white, and she leaned back in her chair with a sudden feeling of faintness. It was years since the boy had spoken of his father; why should he utter his name now? He had raised his head when he felt her move, and her dim and failing eyes saw his face in a mist, looking so like his father when she had known him first, that she shrank from him, with a terror and aversion too deep to be concealed.

"Roland!" she cried.

He did not speak or move, being too bewildered and wonderstruck at his mother's agitation. Felicity hid her face in her white hands, and sat still recovering herself. The pang had been sudden and poignant; it had smitten her so unawares that she had betrayed its anguish. But, she felt it in an instant, her boy had no thought of wounding her; and for her own sake, as well as his, she must conquer this painful excitement. There must be no scene to awaken observation or suspicion.

"Mother, forgive me," he exclaimed; "I did not mean to distress you."

"No," she breathed with difficulty; "I am sure of it. Go on, Felix."

"I came to tell you," he said gravely, "that as long as I can remember—at least as long as we have been in London and known the Pascals—I have loved Alice. Oh, mother, I've thought sometimes you seemed as fond of her as you are of Hilda. You will be glad to have her as your daughter?"

Felicity closed her eyes with a feeling of helpless misery. She could hardly give a thought to Felix and the words he uttered; yet it was those words which brought a flood of hidden memories and fears sweeping over her shrinking soul. It was so long since she had thought much of Roland! She had persuaded herself that as so many years had passed by bringing to her no hint or token of his existence, he must be dead; and as one dead passes presently out of the active thoughts, busy only with the present, so had her husband passed away from her mind into some dim, hidden cell of memory, with which she had long ceased to trouble herself.

Suddenly he seemed to stand before her as she had seen him last, a haggard, wayworn, ruined man, beggared and stripped of all that makes life desirable. And this was only six months after he had lost all. What would he be after thirteen years, if he was living still?

But if it had appeared to her out of the question to face and bear the ignominy and disgrace he had brought upon her thirteen years ago, how utterly impossible it was now. She could never retrace her steps. To confess the deception she had herself consented to, and taken part in, would be to pull down with her own hands the fair edifice of her life. The very name she had made for herself and the broader light in which her fame had placed her, made any repentance impossible. "A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid." Her hill was not as lofty as she had once fancied it would be; but still she was not on the low and safer level of the plain. She was honorably famous. She could not stain her honor by the acknowledgment of dishonor. The chief question, after all, was whether Roland was alive or dead.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 143.)

The Exposition of Dr. Purdon—His Description of Antichrist—His Napoleonic Origin—B. W. Newton on the Seventy Hebdomads—The Period of the Vials, Seals, and Trumpets—Dr. Tregelles on the Division of the Seventy Weeks—Andrew Bonar on the Development of Antichrist.

The Rev. R. A. Purdon, who published several volumes of prophetic expositions under the title of the "Last Vials," and who constantly maintained that the last great Antichrist would be a Napoleon, wrote as follows in 1852:

"When the Last Antichrist has attained to a certain degree of power we shall then—or perhaps before that—hear of a grand movement of the Jewish people towards the land of Israel. The Jews, wishing to strengthen their position in their own land, will look abroad for some powerful alliance, and finding will enter into a league with the Antichristian king for a period of seven years. (See Dan. 9: 27.) Encouraged by his patronage and alliance, they will next proceed to rebuild or complete the temple of Jerusalem. In the meantime the Jews will continue day by day to flock to Palestine, still under the auspices of the Antichristian king, and still confident as to the continuation of his friendship. But after the first three years and a half, a change will occur in the relations of the two parties toward each other. Antichrist having by this time arrived at the highest pitch of blasphemy and extravagance, will begin to claim divine honors for himself; and finding that 'all the world wonders after him,' he will demand of the Jews to permit the erection of his image or statue in the holiest place of their temple, and also the recognition of his divinity.

"But the Jews, or at least many of them, will resist this claim to the utmost. However willing they may be to adopt him as their Messiah, they will not be prepared to accept him as their god, or to admit his image to their temple. From that moment hostilities will break out between Antichrist and the Jews. The Infidel King will succeed in setting up his image, by main force, in the newly-finished temple. And this will be the exact fulfilment of our Lord's prophecy (Matt. 24), 'When ye shall see the abomination of desolation standing where it ought not, then let those that are in Judea flee to the mountains.' From the time in which the rupture takes place between Antichrist and the Jews, the 1260 (literal) days of Rev. 13 will probably be reckoned. Beginning in the second half of the seven years' league, and continuing to the end of the seven years, and to the fall of the apostate king.

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders." By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, 5s.

"There can no longer be a doubt but that some terrible lesson is preparing for the nations of Europe, and that the Empire of Napoleon is to be revived—the actual Empire of Napoleon, in its full territorial extent. In 1815 Napoleon I. fell, and not only was his empire broken up, but his name and family were annihilated in France. Napoleon seemed extinguished for ever! But, nevertheless, Napoleon is to be again as if he had never ceased to be. His name, his empire, his ideas, his principles, his very eagles, are all to be revived. It will regain all the provinces of the fallen empire from north to south; and will add to them (what Napoleon I. never could do) the Turkish provinces in the East.

"The eighth head is 'of the seven,' and as we believe that Napoleon I. was the seventh head, it appears that from his family the eighth head will take its rise. The 'deadly wound' (Rev. 13) of the seventh head was received when Napoleon I. was defeated in battle and sent to die at St. Helena; the healing of the deadly wound will be fully accomplished when his representative has assumed the dominion of the Empire of Napoleon. And then, indeed, 'all the world shall wonder' (Rev. 17)."

B. W. Newton, whose "Prospects of the Ten Kingdoms," published in 1849, contains far the ablest exposition extant upon the future division of Cæsar's original Roman Empire into exactly ten kingdoms gives a full explanation of the seventy weeks. The following are a few of his remarks:

"The seventy hebdomads of years mentioned in Daniel 9 : 24-27, are distributed into three divisions:

"The first consists of seven hebdomads, i.e. 49 years.

"The second of sixty-two hebdomads, i.e. 434 years.

"The third of one hebdomad, i.e. 7 years.

"The first of these divisions, viz. of 49 years, commenced when the commandment went forth to restore, and to build Jerusalem, and ends by the street being built again, and the wall even in troublous times.

"The second division, viz., of 434 years, commenced from this completion of the wall, and extends to the 'cutting off' of the Messiah. After threescore and two hebdomads, i.e. 434 years, shall Messiah be cut off.

"The third division, i.e. seven years, will commence when 'the Prince that shall come,' i.e. Antichrist, 'shall make a covenant for seven years with the multitude,' and ends by wrath being sent upon the Desolator, and blessing upon Jerusalem. All the visions of the Revelation from the sixth to the nineteenth chapter inclusive, belong to this period of seven years, especially to the latter half. The latter half of this last hebdomad is the '1260 days,' or '42 months' or, 'time, times, and half a time,' so often spoken of in Daniel and Revelation (Dan. 7 : 25 ; 12 : 7 ; Rev. 11 : 2, 3 ; 12 : 6, 14 ; 13 : 5). The Jews will think to escape desolation by making a covenant with the coming Desolator, but it shall not stand. At the half of the hebdomad he causes the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and the pinnacle of Israel's temple becomes the pinnacle of his own idol during his persecuting reign for three and a half years.

"The hebdomads, therefore, do not commence as soon as the prophecy was given to Daniel. It was given in the first year after the conquest of Babylon by Cyprus, i.e. B.C. 537 ; but it did not commence to be fulfilled, until B.C. 454 or 455."

Dr. S. P. Tregelles, an eminent Greek scholar, in a work published in 1846 shows in a chapter on the Roman Empire and its divisions, that its entire territory, Eastern as well as Western, including England, will be formed into ten kingdoms, and become subject to the future Antichrist. He also gives an excellent exposition of the future actings of Antichrist as described in Daniel 11 : 21-45. With respect to the seventy weeks, he considers the first sixty-nine of them to commence with the decree of Artaxerxes about B.C. 454 or 455, and consequently to end in A.D. 28 or 29, which he believes to be the year of our Lord's crucifixion, as he takes the date of the Nativity to be about four years before the common era. The last of the seventy weeks * he of course regards as yet to come at the end of this dispensation. The following is the chronological outline of his arrangement of the seventy weeks, as expounded by him at some length on pages 106 to 113 of his book :

"The seventy weeks when distributed into portions will stand thus :

"I. From the edict to the building of the wall, etc. 49 years.

"II. From the building unto Messiah the Prince, and his cutting off, 434 years.

"(Then an interval of unmarked length.)

"III. The period of the covenant of 'the prince that shall come' with the Jews for seven years, 7 years.

"The prince who shall come' is the last head of the Roman power, the person concerning whom Daniel had received so much previous instruction (in chapters 7 and 8). 'And he (the prince who shall come) shall confirm a covenant with the many for one week.' In 'Remarks on Daniel 7 and 8,' I sought to show that the horn spoken of in the two chapters is identical, and here he again appears to come before us ; in fact, the allusion seems to be made to known circumstances about him. He makes a covenant with the multitude ; that of course means the multitude of Daniel's people ;—they are leagued with him, and he with them. This takes place three years and a half before he causes sacrifice and oblation to cease ;—hence it is clear that they go on as under his patronage for some time. . . . And then follow three years and a half of distinct persecuting and blasphemous power. See Dan. 7 : 25 ; 12 : 7 ; Rev. 11 : 2, 3 ; 12 : 6, 14 ; 13 : 5."

The Rev. C. Maitland, in his "Apostolic School of Prophetic Interpretation" (1849), gives many valuable extracts from the Fathers of the primitive Church, and subsequent writers, showing that Antichrist was generally held to be an individual man, who would gain a universal empire, and be received by many Jews as their Messiah, and for three and a half years have himself and his image worshipped in the Jewish temple and throughout the earth, meanwhile being master of Rome and Jerusalem, and persecuting Christians to the death, but at last would be destroyed by Christ's personal descent at the battle of Armageddon. He also believes, in common with some of the Fathers,† that 69 of the 70 weeks were fulfilled before our Saviour's crucifixion, but that the 70th week is future, its latter half coinciding with Antichrist's three and a half years, at about the close of which Christ will descend on this earth. He gives a graphic description of Antichrist's future three and a half years persecution, and summarizes the exposition of the 70 weeks as follows :

"The majority of the primitive writers make the latter half of the seventieth week identical with the three years and a half of Antichrist. In their favor may be urged :

"First, the precise agreement of the time ; the weeks being land weeks, or weeks of years.

"Secondly, The identity of the events assigned to each : for everything said of the half week is repeated in the prophecies relating to Antichrist. These things are the cessation of the daily sacrifice, the setting up of the abomination, the desolation thereby occasioned, the consummation of God's mystery, and the pouring out of the vials upon the Desolator.

"Thirdly, The events of the half-week are continued till the consummation : apparently the sounding of the seventh trumpet, when the mystery of God shall be finished."

* Dr. Tregelles justly rejects the idea that the translation of the Gentile Church from the earth will precede the 70th week as being Jewish time. He says, "Some have thought from the Church having become a constituted body upon the earth just at the end of the 69th week, that it was no longer found on earth when the interval is past, and the 70th begins. Nothing about the matter can be found from the vision, the Church not being mentioned in it."—P. 116.

† Some of these writers have been incorrectly stated to have taught that God would confirm the seven years' Covenant with the Jews. But this cannot be the case, because they admit that Antichrist will cause the sacrifice to cease in the midst of the week, and therefore that Antichrist will previously have confirmed the covenant, for these two acts are performed by one and the same person.

ANDREW BONAR

in his book, "Development of Antichrist," published in 1853, expounds the seventy weeks at some length, and maintains the accepted view that sixty-nine of the seventy weeks of years were fulfilled as 483 years just before the First Advent of Christ when he was cut off at His crucifixion, and then after a long break or interval the seventieth week will be fulfilled as the final seven years of this dispensation. The following are a few of his remarks :

"Daniel, giving as he did, the future history of his people to the end and the promises which are yet to be made good to them, spoke of them as he was moved by the Holy Ghost only as a nation, which they ceased to be when their Messiah was 'cut off' at the end of the 69th week, and when they themselves were scattered and the Gospel sent to the Gentiles. As the 'Times of the Gentiles' draw to a close, Scripture indicates the return of the Jews again as a nation, although in unbelief, (Ezek. 22 : 19-23), when the last week, the seventieth week, shown to be a week of years from the former portion of the prophecy, the sixty-nine weeks already fulfilled, will remain naturally still to be accomplished before the happy days of universal righteousness and the anointing of the Most Holy are seen, which, as we are told, 'seal up the vision and prophecy.' And here it may just be noticed, that the word 'week' is in the original simply a hebdomad or seven, and would have been better so rendered in our translation, for a week with us implies a week of days only. In this instance, by the measure observed in the other parts of the prophecy already fulfilled (Messiah having been cut off at the end of the sixty-ninth hebdomad of years), it must mean a seven of years also, or seven years. Jacob served Laban for Rachel seven years, and was said to have 'fulfilled her week' or hebdomad. (Gen. 29 : 28.)

"It is of this week accordingly that express mention is made immediately after (verse 27), the 'he' there spoken of being manifestly the destroying Prince that shall come, and with whom Daniel's people will enter into a covenant, choosing, in the strong delusion sent them, the False Prince for the True. What strange and deep meaning is there in that declaration of our Lord when so viewed, 'I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not : if (or when) another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive !' (John 5 : 43). . . . Although it is only with the Jews that this Antichrist will 'confirm the covenant for one week,' yet ultimately the whole ten kings of the Roman earth will join together in giving their kingdom to him until the words of God shall be fulfilled' (Rev. 17 : 12, 13, 17). Finally Antichrist will plant the tabernacle of his palaces between the seas (the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean) in the glorious holy mountain (a name given alone to Mount Zion at Jerusalem), and there shall come to his end and none shall help him' (see Dan. 11 : 44, 45).

"His coming is declared to be with all 'deceivableness of unrighteousness.' He adapts himself, just as the first Napoleon did, to the prevailing system of the godless times he appears in, and especially to the prejudices of the Jewish people, who replaced by his help in their own land once more as a nation with their great wealth, will rise into importance there. In this 'deceivableness' also it is, that the covenant is made with them for the whole remaining week. All the world will (Rev. 13 : 3 to 8) wonder after him, and not only wonder after, but worship him, and the Dragon too, 'who gives him his power and great authority.' How fearful to think even of such an apostasy as this :—well may it be called 'The apostacy,' connected as it is with this prince that shall then have come and shown himself to be that 'Man of sin,' for in the midst of the week (although his covenant, such as it was, had been made for the whole), he throws off the mask and shows himself 'that he is God,' with a false prophet, working miracles before him in the power of Satan himself—the mock Trinity of Hell, the Dragon, Beast, and False Prophet, then shown in opposition to the Trinity of heaven. (2 Thessalonians 2 ; Rev. 16 : 13.)"

(To be continued.)

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Attempt to Assassinate the Queen of England was made on Thursday, March 2d. A man named Roderick MacLean fired a revolver at her as she was riding in her carriage from the railroad depot at Windsor to Windsor Castle. The bullet struck the flagstones and glanced on to a luggage wagon. The Queen did not notice the report of the pistol, and was not aware of the attempt on her life until she was informed of it by the ladies in attendance upon her. It appears that the Queen had been paying one of her rare visits to London to hold a drawing-room, in honor of the German princess who is to marry Prince Leopold. She returned to Windsor on Thursday and a large crowd assembled to see her pass from the railroad cars to her carriage. In the front of the crowd were some of the boys from Eton College, but just as the train arrived, a shabby, ill-looking man elbowed his way through the press and soon after the Queen had entered her carriage the man was seen to raise a pistol and fire at her. The pressure of the crowd and the prompt action of one of the Eton boys, who struck at the man, caused him to aim wide, but he quickly brought the next chamber to the hammer and would probably have fired again had he not been seized by the crowd and disarmed. An attempt was made to lynch him, but he was rescued by the police. Mr. Lowell, our Minister at the English Court, went personally to Windsor to tender his congratulations to her Majesty on her providential escape, and Secretary Frelinghuysen on the part of the government also cabled a message of sympathy. The Sultan of Turkey, the King of Italy, the President of the French Republic, and other European governments sent similar messages.

The Assassin MacLean, Appears to be a criminal of the Guiteau type, except that he makes no pretence of having any political motive. When arrested he had fourteen ball cartridges on his person, and four still remained in his six-chambered revolver. He said at his examination before the magistrates his object was only to cause public alarm, with the object of having his grievances redressed. The prison doctors pronounce him sane, but it is stated that he was released from a lunatic asylum in September last, and that he had previously been an occupant of another asylum. The memoranda found in his pocket after his arrest indicate that he was not of sound mind. The general opinion in Great Britain is that he is a lunatic. This opinion is confirmed by the fact that no man of ordinary intelligence would entertain the idea that any good to the country, political party, or himself could accrue from removing Queen Victoria, who has in reality far less power than our President. It is supposed that being of unsound mind he was moved in the direction of regicide by what he had read of Guiteau's crime. The Irish journals repudiate and deplore the crime.

A Monument in Memory of the Late Lord Beaconsfield has been erected at Hughenden Church. The cost has been defrayed by Queen Victoria, who entertained for the deceased statesman feelings of unbounded confidence and respect. It bears the following epitaph inscribed by command of the Queen: "This memorial is placed here by a grateful and affectionate Sovereign and friend, VICTORIA, R. I. 'Kings love him that speaketh right.'" The quotation is from Proverbs 16:13 and evinces her Majesty's esteem for her trusted adviser.

The Officers Sent from America to take Part in the search for the survivors of the Jeannette have arrived at St. Petersburg, and on February 24th set out for Siberia to join the exploring parties at the mouth of the Lena River. General Ignatieff offered them every assistance. The Governor of Siberia telegraphed their approach to the different points along their route. Lieutenant Danenhower cables to his father the following serious account of his condition: "Left eye ruined; must come out. Oculists say right eye affected by sympathy. Health splendid. On my feet. Forbidden to read or write. Can travel when snow disappears. Don't worry. Right eye will be saved."

Sentence of Death has been Pronounced on ten of the Nihilists on trial in Russia. The trials ended at midnight of February 28th. The condemned prisoners are Mikhailoff, Soukmanoff, Frolenko, Emilianoff, and Barannikoff, the three women, Lebedeff, Terentiew, and Jakimoff, and also Teterka and Issaieff. The rest of the prisoners were sentenced to hard labor in the mines of Siberia for terms varying from fifteen years to life. The counsel of one of the prisoners fiercely attacked the conduct of the authorities who were trusted with the preliminary inquiry. "It was not straightforward," said he, "or merciful. Three of the prisoners have been driven to madness, and my client, Emilianoff, has been cajoled into pleading guilty by a promise that his life would be spared if he confessed complicity in offences of which he knew absolutely nothing."

The Cession of Thessaly to Greece was Celebrated in London on Saturday by a banquet at which a distinguished company of the Liberal Party assembled. It marked the termination of the labors of the organization known as the Greek Committee which was formed to further the claims of Greece for the possession of the territory which, under the Treaty of Berlin, Turkey was directed to cede to her. Mr. Lowell was invited to attend the banquet, but very properly declined, on the ground that it would be unbecoming on the part of the minister of a Power on friendly terms with Turkey to take part in a demonstration against her.

The Conquests of Russia in Central Asia form the subject of a government report just issued by the British Foreign Office. Even the journals which support Mr. Gladstone in all he does, whether it be wise or foolish, are constrained to admit that the report is not pleasant reading. Russia appears to have trifled with the Gladstone Cabinet as she never dared do with that of Lord Beaconsfield. Four years ago Mr. Gladstone in his eagerness to obtain office did not scruple to embarrass the British Government by espousing the cause of Russia, and protesting against the opposition Lord Beaconsfield made to her knavish schemes. When Mr. Gladstone became Premier Russia expressed her satisfaction and immediately proceeded to push her conquests still nearer to the British boundaries in India. She was so successful that the Gladstone government thought it prudent to inquire what would be the borders of the territory annexed on the side nearest India. The Daily News, the most abject of Mr. Gladstone's supporters in the press, characterizes the answers returned by the Russian Government as "meagre and misleading, when not evasive," and advised the British Government "to examine for themselves instead of trusting to plausible assurances from St. Petersburg." This is a mild reproof which must be a surprise to Mr. Gladstone when he considers its source.

The Conflict between the two Houses of the British Parliament has terminated in the virtual surrender of the Lords. It was rumored in the early part of last week that Mr. Gladstone contemplated resigning if his party in the Commons failed to support him, but he was saved from that position by the decision arrived at by his friends who were summoned to a meeting on Monday, February 27th, held at his official residence. Two hundred members of Parliament responded and passed a vote of confidence in him. In the House on Monday night a test vote was taken on a preliminary question, in which 300 members supported the government against an opposition vote of 167. Mr. Gladstone subsequently spoke on the subject of the inquiry proposed to be made in the House of Lords into the working of the Land act. He said that if the Lords did not intend to discuss the judicial acts of the Commissioners the inquiry would be virtually harmless. The Lords have informally notified the government that the judicial proceedings would be excluded from the investigation.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the English Atheist, was again elected Member of Parliament at Northampton on March 2d. This is the third time Mr. Bradlaugh has been elected by that borough within a few months. When he was unseated by a vote of the House two weeks ago, he went to Northampton as a candidate for re-election. His opponent was a Mr. Corbett. When the votes were counted it was found that Mr. Bradlaugh had received 3798 votes and Mr. Corbett 3687. At a meeting of the Conservative members of the House of Commons it was decided to resist any attempt on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat. Sir Stafford Northcote will move the same resolution previously offered by him in regard to Mr. Bradlaugh.

The Resentment produced in Germany and Austria by the speech of General Skobelev in favor of the Slavs has alarmed Russia, and it has been found necessary to repudiate it. A despatch from St. Petersburg to the London Times says: "An emissary started for Berlin on Tuesday with an important letter from the Czar to the Emperor William. It is believed that the Czar wrote the letter immediately after his reception of General Skobelev."

A Living Life-buoy Recently Saved a Sailor from drowning. A seaman on board a British vessel sailing to Australia, fell overboard when the vessel was crossing the Southern Ocean, and although a boat was lowered immediately, a long pull was necessary before reaching the sailor. When the boat got near the man, he was seen to be supporting himself in the water by clinging to a large albatross which he had seized on coming to the surface after his plunge. Albatrosses in the Southern Seas are, as a rule, most fierce, and have in several cases killed men by blows from their terrible beaks. But in this case the sailor had evidently obtained a good grip of the bird's neck with both hands, preventing it from using its beak, while the bird's struggles to get free kept the sailor afloat and converted a would-be foe into an unwilling friend. Such a means of rescue is rare in the records of maritime life, but it has often happened that the designs of wicked men have been similarly overruled by God to the promotion of His purposes (Acts 11:19).

Vol. IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1881, with complete index. Price, $3 including postage: ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

By the REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the late Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, Dr. DEEMS, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1882.

16th Year. No. 11.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF VICTORIA, Queen of England, and Her Youngest Daughter the Princess BEATRICE.

THE CROSS! THE CROSS! Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Ouffe" (Continued).

A Stricken Father's Struggle (with illustration).

PICTURE OF AN ELEPHANT PLOUGHING IN INDIA.

PICTURE OF ESQUIMAUX SPEARING WILD DUOKS.

CURRENT EVENTS: The Senate Commission on the Liquor Traffic—Sergeant Mason Sentenced—Death of Dr. Garnet—The Floods of the Mississippi—Three Million Dollars to be Distributed among Charitable Institutions—An Extensive Defalcation—The Glossograph—A Fight in a Lighthouse—A Remarkable Cure—A Curious Incident in a Law Court—A Bad Scare for a Boaster, etc.

A COMING WONDER. By Rev. M. Baxter (Cont'd).

OUR LORD'S FIRST APPEARANCE BEFORE PILATE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Review of the Quarter's Lessons. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (continued).

FOREIGN TOPICS: Mr. Forster in Ireland—The Attempted Assassination of Queen Victoria—The Russian General's Speech—Making a New King—A Sensational Murder Trial—A Letter from a Jeanette Survivor, etc.

H. R. H. PRINCESS BEATRICE.

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

Born in 1819—Her Early Training—Accession to the Throne in 1837—Her Reception of the State Messengers—Opens Her First Parliament—Her Coronation in 1838—Marriage to Prince Albert in 1840—First Visit to Scotland in 1842—Opening of the Hyde Park Exhibition in 1851—Her Majesty's Humanity During the Crimean War—Death of the Prince Consort in 1861—The Queen's Attachment to Religious Truth.

THE intelligence cabled across the Atlantic on March 2d that an attempt had been made to assassinate the Queen of England sent a thrill of horror through the community. The recent mournful experience through which we have passed, fitted us to join very heartily in the sentiment Mr. Frelinghuysen intended to express in his cable message of congratulation. Indignation at the attempt and deep thankfulness for the Queen's escape were universal. We have in this country but small respect for royalty, and no sympathy with the principle of government which gives to the head of one family the hereditary right to administer public affairs. But the English nation is under monarchical government; the great majority of the people are content with it and are enthusiastically loyal; it is therefore no concern of ours that the chief executive of the English Government occupies that position by right of birth and not by the suffrages of the people. We are bound by many ties of race, language, and community of interest to the English people, and we give respect and cordial recognition to the head of the nation as they give to our Presidents.

Queen Victoria has, however, other claims on our regard, and these are of a personal character. Her prompt and womanly sympathy with us in our recent bereavement only confirmed the good opinions we previously held respecting her. We remembered that twenty years ago her kindness, magnanimity, and suavity contributed in no slight degree to the maintenance of peace between the two countries, and that in all matters in which she has been brought into personal prominence with this country her expressions have been of the friendliest kind. It was therefore with detestation that we heard of the outrage upon her, and the expressions of sympathy which appeared in the press throughout the land were no mere formal words.

The interest excited by the cowardly attempt at murder in the intended victim will render welcome to our readers the following sketch of the Queen's life, and the portraits on our first page of her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice, the youngest daughter of the Queen, who was with her mother at the time the attempt was made on her life.

Her Majesty Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and Empress of India, is the daughter of Edward, Duke of Kent, the fourth son of George III. She is nearly sixty-three years of age, having been born at Kensington Palace, on the 24th May, 1819. Her mother, Victoria Mary Louisa, was the fourth daughter of Francis, reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld. The Duke of Kent died on January 23d, 1820, and the Duchess was thus left in charge of the princess when the latter was only eight months old. The training of the future Queen was, however, superintended with admirable wisdom and care. Her mother has often been blamed for the seclusion in which she kept her young charge. It was so close that even the King, her uncle, and her nearest relatives seldom saw her. But those who knew most of court life approved the course taken by the Duchess of Kent. No one could have seen without apprehension and regret the young princess a frequent visitor at the court over which her Uncle George IV., and subsequently his brother William IV. presided. Both men were vile, sensual, wicked men, without principle or sense, debased, depraved, and brutish. Their example was closely followed by those about the court, and it is stated by a contemporary historian that the ordinary manners of society about the royal palace were "worse than those of a decent tap-room of the present day." It was then with good reason that, remembering her responsibility, the Duchess of Kent kept her daughter, the future Queen, away from such a cesspool of vice.

The Duchess of Kent had a valuable coadjutor in the lady appointed governess to the future Queen, the Duchess of Northumberland, who selected the teachers under whom she studied and from whom she acquired many accomplishments, including drawing, music, and a knowledge of the continental languages. She also made proficiency in science, being distinguished in botany, for which she showed a marked taste.

The year 1837 was

A MOMENTOUS YEAR

in the life of Victoria. Her uncle William IV. expired on June 19th. He was the third son of King George III. The eldest son was George IV. who died in 1830; the second was Prince Frederick, who died in 1827. As not one of the three left any legitimate children the crown passed by law of succession to Victoria as heiress of the fourth son, Edward, Duke of Kent, who died in 1820.

Victoria was residing at Kensington Palace with her mother, when early in the morning of the 20th the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Chamberlain arrived from Windsor Castle. The circumstances under which the Princess Victoria was made aware of her accession to the throne may be recalled with interest. The Archbishop and the Lord Chamberlain reached the palace at about five o'clock in the morning. They knocked and rang for some time before they could arouse the porter at the gate. Finally they were admitted into one of the lower rooms, but seemed forgotten by everybody.

They then rang the bell, and desired that the attendant of the princess might be sent to inform her royal highness that they requested an audience on business of importance. The answer came that she was in such a sweet sleep that the attendant could not disturb her. The messengers then proclaimed that they were come on State business of so great importance that it was necessary to arouse her.

Shortly after she came into the room, dressed in a loose white dressing gown and shawl, her hair falling upon her shoulders, and her feet in slippers. She had guessed the significance of the message. Tears rose in her eyes, but she was perfectly collected and dignified. The princess was now Queen of England, and the news was received nobly. Though young in years, she showed that she felt the solemn responsibility, and was resolved to do her duty to the best of her ability.

On the 21st of June, her accession to the throne was proclaimed under circumstances of great interest. At St. James's Palace a brilliant reception awaited her. She was received most enthusiastically, and subsequently, in response to the cheers of the crowd, she appeared at a window to acknowledge the welcome of her subjects. Her unaffected manner and her charming simplicity won the hearts of all.

In virtue of the law excluding females from the throne of Hanover, the Duke of Cumberland became king, so that the connection between the crowns of England and Hanover was severed, after after having existed 123 years. This was not regarded as a misfortune by the English people, who were glad to be thus relieved of a connection with German politics, and also to be relieved of the presence of the Duke of Cumberland, who, like his elder brothers, was a most abandoned profligate who did fearful harm in English society. We may here notice parenthetically that this was a fulfilment of prophecy, which shows that Britain must be separated from its territory which, like Hanover, lies outside the Roman Empire.

On the 20th November, the Queen for the first time opened Parliament, declaring her confidence in the loyalty and wisdom of her people; and asking that, under divine Providence, she might, at so early an age, with such responsibilities, have their cordial co-operation in discharging her duties.

The next great event of the Queen's life was which took place at Westminster, on the 28th June, 1838. On the route from Buckingham Palace to the Abbey, her Majesty was received with the greatest enthusiasm. The streets through which the procession passed were lined with crowds of spectators, all eager to gain even a passing glimpse of the youthful sovereign. The scene at the ceremony was a most imposing one.

HER CORONATION,

Her Majesty, profiting by the careful education she had received, took deep interest in all national events, and watched with a lively intelligence every phase of passing history. Her popularity grew day after day; and it was clear that, under her rule, loyalty in the national heart would grow deeper and interest in the Queen's future life increase.

The most prominent topic of national curiosity was as to the man who would be the husband of the Queen. It was to Francis Albert Augustus Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Saxony, Prince of Coburg and Gotha, that the Queen gave her affections, and the result abundantly proved the wisdom of her choice. The of the Queen and Prince Albert was celebrated with great splendor on the 10th of February, 1840. As on the occasion of the coronation, the people of London testified how much they revered their sovereign. The streets and thoroughfares were again lined with eager crowds, and before the sun had broken long over the metropolis large numbers were seen making their way to Buckingham Palace and the Chapel Royal, St. James's, where the service was performed.

MARRIAGE

There can be no doubt that the Queen's subjects evinced the highest interest in this union. Rejoicings throughout the country were universal. From the largest cities and towns down to the smallest hamlet the event was celebrated with enthusiasm. The marriage was a singularly happy one. Prince Albert won completely the Queen's affections, and she sought his advice with confidence on all occasions. This advice was, in the main, wise and prudent.

The issue of this union has been nine children. On November 21st, 1840, was born the Princess Royal, who was married in 1858 to the Prince Imperial of Germany. On November 9th, 1841, was born the heir apparent to the throne, Albert Edward, Prince of Wales. The dates of birth of the other children are as follows: Princess Alice, April 25th, 1843 who died December 14th, 1878, and whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 16th, 1879; Prince Alfred, now called the Duke of Edinburgh, August 6th, 1844; Princess Helena, May 25th, 1846; Princess Louise, March 18th, 1848; Prince Arthur, May 1st, 1850; Prince Leopold, April 7th, 1853; and Princess Beatrice, April 14th, 1857.

Some idea of the happiness existing in the royal family may be gleaned from a book written by the Queen entitled, "Our Life in the Highlands," which describes a series of visits she and her husband paid to Scotland, the first of which was taken in 1842.

But these years were not unfruitful in graver pursuits, and a striking evidence was given of Prince Albert's intellectual character in the proposal to hold a Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, London. He carried out this idea with great energy, and on the 1st of May, 1851, the successful enterprise was completed. After the report of the undertaking was presented to her Majesty at its opening, she read a reply stating that she hoped by God's blessing that the exhibition would conduce to the welfare of the people, and to the common interests of the human race, by encouraging the arts of peace and industry, strengthening the bonds of union among the nations of the earth, and promoting a friendly and honorable rivalry in the useful exercise of those faculties which have been conferred by a beneficent Providence for the good and the happiness of mankind.

This was only the beginning of a series of similar public acts. But meanwhile the Queen continued to take the deepest interest in all that related to the national welfare. In numerous ways she manifested her desire for the good of the people, and in cases of national loss, by reason of death, she was ever ready with words of consolation and sympathy.

The rupture between England and Russia, which resulted in the Crimean War, took place in 1855. With her humane instincts the Queen issued a commission for the purpose of raising a "Patriotic Fund" for relief of the orphans and widows of soldiers that might fall in the war.

at service was thus done to the armies suffering in Crimea from the inclemency of the season. It is a feature in her Majesty's character which has been displayed on all occasions of national string.

In the midst of all her splendor and prosperity Queen has not been without heavy bereavement. On the 14th of December, 1861, to the inexpressible grief of her Majesty, occurred the DEATH OF THE PRINCE CONSORT.

News of his decease produced a national shock. As on a Saturday evening, shortly before eleven o'clock, that his royal highness expired. The Queen, the Prince of Wales, Princess Alice, and Princess Helena were present at the last moment. The people of London the event was made known at midnight by the tolling of the heavy bell of St. James's. On Sunday morning the news had reached every corner of the land, and there was a silent and spontaneous expression of sorrow. It felt that a busy life had been cut off prematurely, and in the midst of solemn responsibilities great usefulness. The Queen's grief was intense. She shut herself up in seclusion for several days, and though now twenty years have passed, she has never laid aside her mourning dress. Summed the prominent part she used to take in public and court festivities.

During the years immediately following the death of the Prince Consort the ceremonies and festivities of the court were suspended. The regular levees and receptions, which in court phrase are called drawing-rooms, were not held, and the Queen herself up to grief. But by degrees as the Prince of Wales grew to years of maturity, and especially after his marriage, he and the Princess took the Queen's wish took her Majesty's place as pillars of society. Latterly at long intervals she appeared in public, but it has always been content that her duties were distasteful to her, and has never seemed content except when staying at Balmoral, her favorite seat in Scotland, or in the Isle of Wight.

THE MARRIAGES OF HER CHILDREN

These have been the only occasions on which the Queen has come prominently before the people of late years, and reminded them of the existence of royalty. The most important of these was the marriage of the Prince of Wales to the Princess Alexandra, daughter of the King of Denmark. The Princess arrived in England on March 7th, 1863, her singular beauty, sweetness of manner, dignified graceful bearing, won the hearts of the people. They gave her their sincere affection, since her marriage, which took place on the 10th, 1863, have never wavered in their regard for her. It would not be too much to say her conduct as wife and mother has raised her to the public esteem so highly that she is now the popular lady in the three kingdoms.

The marriages of the other sons and daughters have also been celebrated with the utmost effluence. The one that caused the greatest attention was that of the Princess Louise. Her sisters and sisters had married foreigners, but Princess Louise was united to a British subject, the Marquis of Lorne, now Governor-General of Canada. It was hailed with pleasure by the people, but it has been productive of some little unpopularity to the parties concerned. The absurd and ridiculous prejudices of royalty have inflicted a wound on the husband of the Princess which must be hard to bear. He has been excluded from the privileges reserved for royalty, to which his wife was welcomed, and he has had the mortification of seeing petty German princelets, the bulk of whose income is extracted from the pockets of English taxpayers, greeted and entertained in a palace where his presence would have been resented as an intrusion.

That the Queen is not indifferent to the claims of the people may be inferred from several passages ly referred to. The "Leaves from our Journal: Highlands," is principally composed of what she kept during the earlier years of her marriage. The observations she makes, trite and commonplace as they are, indicate that she appreciated the solemn truths presented to her by the ministers to whom she listened. In one passage, dated October 29th, 1854, she says, "Mr. Macleod's (late Dr. Norman Macleod) sermon was quite admirable. He showed how we all tried to please self, and live for that, and in so doing found no rest. The second prayer was very touching; his allusions to us were so simple, saying, after his mention of us, 'Bless their children.' It gave me a lump in my throat, as also when he prayed for the dying, the wounded, the widows, and the orphans. Every one came back delighted; and how satisfactory it is to come back with such feelings from church. The servants and the Highlanders all were equally delighted."

HER PUBLISHED WORK

She showed, too, her capacity to understand a more profound preacher in the following year—Dr. John Caird, the most eloquent of all the Scotch divines. In reference to the celebrated sermon "Religion in Common Life," the Queen writes on the day on which it was delivered: "All present at the kirk were electrified by a most admirable and beautiful sermon, which lasted nearly an hour, but which kept our attention riveted. He explained how religion ought to pervade every action of our lives, not a thing only for Sundays or for our closet, not a thing to drive us from the world, not a perpetual moping over good books, but being and doing good, letting everything be done in a Christian spirit. He sent us home much edified."

It pleases the Queen also to make little charitable gifts of an inexpensive character to certain poor people who live in the neighborhood of her castle at Balmoral, and to listen to the expressions of gratitude and delight they give utterance to at receiving a gift from the Queen. In another part of her book she says: "I walked out with the two girls, stopped at a shop and made some purchases for poor people. After that Mrs. Farquharson walked round with us to some of the cottages to show me where the poor people lived, and to tell them who I was. We met an old woman who was very poor, and eighty-eight years of age. I gave her a warm petticoat, and the tears rolled down her old cheeks, and she shook my hands and prayed God to bless me. It was very touching."

"I then went into a small cabin of old Kitty Kear's, who is eighty-six years old, quite erect, and who welcomed us with a great air of dignity. She sat down and spun. I gave her also a warm petticoat. She said, 'May the Lord ever attend ye and yours here and hereafter, and may the Lord be a guide to ye and keep ye from all harm.' We went into three other cottages, then across a burn to another old woman's and afterwards peeped into Blair's the fiddler. We drove back and got out to visit old Mrs. Grant, who is so tidy and clean, and to whom I gave a dress and handkerchief, and she said, 'You're too kind to me; ye give me more every year.' She had tears in her eyes. Really the affection of these good people, who are so hearty and so happy to see you taking interest in everything, is very touching and gratifying."

HER REGAL POLICY

has been beneficial to the English people chiefly in its negative aspect. She has not attempted to encroach on the rights of Parliament. In the reigns of her uncles and of her grandfather, George III., there were many conflicts between the crown and the people. The King sometimes objected to the ministers in whom the people had confidence and in others he appointed and maintained in office unpopular ministers. But Queen Victoria has uniformly obeyed the wishes of her Parliament, and whenever the Cabinet has lost the confidence of the House of Commons and has resigned she has appointed in its place the men designated by the House as the most proper persons to conduct the business of the country. In following this course the Queen has strengthened the Constitution and has rendered herself popular in the country. The people have never seen her in antagonism to them, and when by their votes they have given expression to their wishes for a new and different policy they have seen in the Queen a prompt and ready acquiescence even when, as they were well aware, her own inclinations were opposed to the change. Thus during her reign England has made rapid advance in self-government and in the direction of free republican principles.

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS BEATRICE.

Birth in 1857—Princess Beatrice's love of Painting and Music—Companionship to the Queen—Her Sympathy with the Sorrowing.

THE PRINCESS BEATRICE MARY VICTORIA FEODORE was born April 14th, 1857, and is the youngest child of Her Majesty the Queen. The Princess Beatrice was scarcely four years of age when, on December 14th, 1861, the Prince Consort died at Windsor of typhoid fever.

In the glimpses which the Queen in her writing and letters to relatives has given of the home life of herself and children, no one can fail to see how thoroughly healthy has been their mental and moral training. It was only natural that in the earlier years of the Princess Beatrice the world at large would have heard more of the elder members of the royal family than of herself. She was but a baby when her eldest sister became the wife of Prince Frederick William, and but a child six years of age when her brother the Prince of Wales was married to the Princess Alexandra of Denmark.

As the youngest, it is only natural to suppose the princess has received that special love which a mother is believed to cherish for her latest-born, without in the least robbing her other children of that affection to which they may fairly lay claim. Report describes her as being highly gifted intellectually, and her mind as more than ordinarily well cultivated. The Princess is said to excel not only in the usual feminine accomplishments, but in some of them to have marked out a path for herself, of which, perhaps, the world would have heard more had she filled a less exalted position.

This is believed to apply especially to music and painting, the Princess not only being an accomplished musician, but a good composer. Her late father's gift in this direction will not be forgotten by any who have heard some of the tunes composed by him, two or three of them being special favorites in many places of worship. It has been stated that the Princess herself is a composer of more than ordinary merit, and that the word "thoroughness" may fairly be applied not only to this branch of her education and accomplishments, but more or less to all the studies to which she has applied herself.

It has been noticed, especially of late years, that the place of the Princess Beatrice has seemed to be by her royal mother's side. Her Majesty's name is seldom mentioned as taking part in any ceremonial, or in quitting London for Windsor, or Osborne for Balmoral, without the words "The Queen was accompanied by the Princess Beatrice." She has long passed the age at which her brothers and sisters were married, but though gossip has often coupled her name with some one or other of the group of men considered suitable for a matrimonial union, she has not married, apparently preferring to be a companion to her mother and cheer her in her widowhood.

It should not be forgotten that the Princess is the only child of the sovereign who receives no income from the national purse. Her brothers and sisters are handsomely provided for by the State, but the Princess has no annual grant made in her favor; she thus occupies a position of independence contrasting very favorably with the other members of the royal family.

In the heavy sorrow which fell upon the Queen, in the year 1878, by the death of her beloved daughter, Princess Alice, while comforted and sustained by the love of all her children, it was the Princess Beatrice who was constantly with the Queen, doing her utmost to sustain her under the severe trial. When, during the same year, it was deemed advisable for Her Majesty to seek a temporary change of scene, and to travel abroad, the Queen was accompanied by the Princess Beatrice.

A spirit of tender compassion for the sufferings and sorrows of others is known to characterize the Princess Beatrice, and we may pray that she may ever be found helping onward works of benevolence and philanthropy, and may at last receive the crown of life and eternal glory.

THE CROSS! THE CROSS!

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
March 12, 1882.

"Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple."—LUKE 14: 27.

The Shape of the Cross—A Forest of Crosses—One more Conspicuous than the Rest—Why Jesus Died so Quickly—Rubens' Picture of the Scourging—The Journey to the Cross—Not Five Wounds Only—The Bramble for the Crown of Thorns—The Aggravation of Absences—The Absence of Water—Of Light—Darkness on a Steamer in Mid-Atlantic—Absence of Nurses—The Last Sigh—What Substitution Means—How to Carry the Cross for Jesus—Three Crosses Offered—How Relatively Light they Are—Fall into Line—The Roman Emperor and the Greek Architect—Who has Scars to Show?—The Burning Cross of Scotland.

THE cross was a gibbet on which criminals were put to death. It was sometimes made in the shape of the letter T, sometimes in the shape of the letter X, sometimes in the shape of the letter I—a simple upright; sometimes two cross pieces against the perpendicular bar, so that upon the lower cross piece the criminal partially sat. But whatever the style of cross, it was always disgraceful and always agonizing.

When Darius conquered Babylon, he put two hundred captives to death on the cross. When Alexander conquered Tyre, he put two thousand captives to death on the cross. So it was just an ordinary mode of punishment. But in all the forest of crosses on the hills and in the valleys of the earth, there is one cross that attracts more attention than any other. It is not higher than the others, it is not made out of different wood, there is nothing peculiar in the notch at which the two pieces are joined, and as to the scene, they witnessed crucifixions every few weeks, so that I see a reckless man walking about the hill and kicking carelessly aside a skull, and wondering who the villain was that had so flat and mishapen a head; and here is another skull, and there on the hillside is another skull. Indeed, the Bible says it was "a place of skulls." But about the victim on one of these crosses all ages are crying, "Who is He? was He a man? was He a God? was He man and God?"

Through the darkness of that gloomy day, I come close up enough to the cross to see who it is. It is Jesus. How did He come there? Had He come up on the top of the hill to look off upon the beautiful landscape, or upon a brilliant sunset? No. He came there ill and exhausted. People sometimes wonder why Christ expired so quickly on the cross, in six or seven hours, while other victims have been on the cross for forty-eight hours before life was extinct. I will tell you the reason. He was exhausted when He came there. He had been scourged. We are horrified at the cruelties of the whipping post, but those cruelties were mercy as compared with the scourging of Jesus Christ.

Two or three Sundays ago, I incidentally mentioned a picture which I saw at Antwerp, a picture made by Rubens—

RUBENS' PICTURE OF THE SCOURGING of Jesus Christ. I had only time to just mention the picture. I had not time to say much about it. It was the most overmastering picture I ever looked at, or ever expect to see. As the long-frocked official opened the door that hid the picture, there He was—Christ with back bent and bared. The flagellator stood with the upper teeth clenched over the lower lip, as though to give violence to the blows. There were the swollen shoulders of Christ. There were the black and blue ridges, denied even the relief of bleeding. There was the flesh adhering to the whips as they were lifted. There were the marks where the knots in the whips gouged out the flesh. There stood the persecutor, with his foot on the calf of the leg of the Saviour, balancing himself. O! the furious and hellish look on those faces, grinning vengeance against the Son of God. The picture seized me, it overwhelmed me; it seemed as if it would kill me. I do not think I could have looked at it five minutes and have lived.

But that my friends, was before Christ had started for Calvary. That was only the whipping. Are you ready for

YOUR JOURNEY TO THE CROSS?

The carpenters have split the timber into two pieces. They are heavy and they are long pieces, for one of them must be fastened deep down in the earth lest the struggling of the victim upset the structure. They put this timber upon the shoulder of Christ very gradually, first, to see whether He can stand it, and after they find He can stand it, they put the whole weight upon Him. Forward now, to Calvary. The hooting and the yelling mob follow on. Under the weight of the cross, Christ being weary and sick, He stumbles and falls, and they jerk at His robe indignant that He should have stumbled and fallen, and they cry: "Get up, get up!" Christ, putting one hand on the ground and the other hand on the cross, rises, looking into the face of Mary, His mother, for sympathy; but they tell her to stand back, it is no place for a woman—"Stand back and stop this crying."

Christ moves on with His burden upon His shoulders, and there is a boy that passes along with Him, a boy holding a mallet and a few nails. I wonder what they are for. Christ moves on until the burden is so great He staggers and falls flat into the dust and faints dead away, and a ruffian put his foot on Him and shakes Him as he would a dead dog, while another ruffian looks down at Him wondering whether He has fainted away, or whether He is only pretending to faint away, and with jeer and contempt indescribable says: "Fainted, have you? fainted! get up, get on!"

Now, they have arrived at the foot of the hill. Off with His clothes. Shall that loathsome mob look upon the unrobed body of Christ? Yes. The commanding officers say: "Unfasten the girdle, take off the coat, strip Him." The work is done. But bring back the coat, for here are the gamblers tossing up coin on the ground, saying: "Who shall have the coat?" One ruffian says: "I have it, I have it—it is mine!" He rolls it up and puts it under his arm, or he examines it to see what fabric it is made of. Then they put the cross upon the ground, and they stretch Christ upon it, and four or five men hold Him down while they drive the spikes home, at every thump a groan, a groan! Alas! Alas! the hour passes on and the time comes when they must crucify Him.

Christ has only one garment left now, a cap, a cap of thorns. No danger that it will fall off, for the sharp edges have punctured the temples and it is sure and fast. One ruffian takes hold of one end of the short beam of the cross, and another ruffian takes hold of the other end of the short beam of the cross, and another ruffian puts his arms around the waist of Christ, and another ruffian takes hold of the end of the long beam of the cross, and altogether they move on until they came to the hole dug in the earth, and with awful plunge it jars down with its burden of woe. It is not the picture of a Christ, it is not the statue of Christ, as you sometimes see in a Roman Catholic cathedral; but it is the body of a bleeding, living, dying Christ.

They sometimes say He had five wounds, but they have counted wrong. Two wounds for the hands, two wounds for the feet, one wound for the side, they say—five wounds. No, they have missed the worst and they have missed the most. Did you ever see the bramble out of which that crown of thorns was made? I saw one on a Brooklyn ferryboat, in the hands of a gentleman who had just returned from Palestine, a bramble just like that out of which the crown of thorns was made. O! how cruel and how stubborn were the thorns. And when that cap of thorns was put upon Christ, and it was pressed down upon Him, not five wounds, but ten, twenty, thirty—I cannot count them.

There were

THREE OR FOUR ABSENCES

that made that scene worse. First, there was the absence of water. The climate was hot, the fever, the inflammation, the nervous prostration, the gangrene had seized upon Him, and He terribly wanted water. His wounds were worse than gunshot fractures, and yet no water. A Turk, in the thirteenth century, was crucified on the banks of a river so that the sight of the water might tantalize him. And O! how the thirst of Christ must have tantalized as He thought of the Euphrates and the Jordan and the Amazon and all the fountains of earth and Heaven poured out of His own hand. They offered Him an intoxicating draught made out of wine and myrrh, but He declined it. He wanted to die sober. No water.

Then, my friends, there was the absence of light. Darkness always exasperates trouble. I never shall forget the night in the summer of 1873, in the Steamer Greece, mid-Atlantic, every moment expecting the steamer to go down. All the lights in the cabin were blown out. The captain came crawling in on his hands and knees, for he could not stand upright, so violently was the vessel pitching, and he cried out: "Light up, light up!" The steward said: "We can't light up; the candles are gone and the holders are gone." The captain said: "I can't help that; light up!" The storm was awful when the lights were burning, worse when the lights went out.

Then there was the absence of faithful nurses. When you are ill, it is pleasant to have the head bathed and the hands and feet rubbed. Look at the hands and feet of Christ, look at the face of Christ. There were women there who had cared for the sick, but none of them might come up near enough to help. There was Christ's mother, but she might not come up near enough to help. They said: "Stand back, stand back; this is no place for you." The high priests and the soldiers wanted it their own way; they had it their own way.

The hours pass on and it is twelve o'clock of the Saviour's suffering, and it is one o'clock, and it is two o'clock, and it is almost three o'clock. Take the last look at that suffering face; wan and pinched, the purple lips drawn back against the teeth, the eyes red with weeping and sunken as though grief had pushed them back, blackness under the lower lid, the whole body adroop and shivering with the last chill, the breath growing feebler and feebler and feebler until He gives one long, deep, last sigh.

HE IS DEAD!

O! my soul, He is dead. Can you tell why? Was He a fanatic dying for a principle that did not amount to anything? Was He a man infatuated? No; to save your soul from sin, and mine, and make eternal life possible He died. There had to be a substitute for sin. Who shall it be? "Let it be me," said Christ, "let it be me." You understand the meaning of

THAT WORD SUBSTITUTION.

You were drafted for the last war; some one took your place, marched your march, suffered your wounds and died at Gettysburgh. Christ comes to us while we are fighting our battle with sin and death and hell and He is our Substitute. He marches our march, fights our battle, suffers our wounds, and dies our death. Substitution! Substitution!

How do you feel in regard to that scene described in the text, and in the region around about the text? Are your sympathies aroused? or are you so dead in sin, and so abandoned by reason of your transgressions that you can look upon all that tearful and unmoved. No, no; there are a thousand people here this morning who can say in the depths of their soul, "No, no, no; if Jesus endured that, and all that for me, I ought to love Him! I must love Him, I will love Him, I do love Him! Here, Lord, I give myself to Thee; 'tis all that can do."

But how are you going to test your love, and test your earnestness? My text gives a test. It says that while Christ carried a cross for you, you must be willing to carry a cross for Christ. "Well," you say, "I never could understand that. There are no crosses to be carried in this land; those persecutions have passed, and in this land there is no one to be crucified, and yet the pulpit and in the prayer meetings you all keep talking about carrying a cross. What do you mean, sir?" I mean this: that is a cross which Christ calls you to do, which is unpleasant and hard. "O!" you say, "after hearing the story of this Christ and all that He has endured for me I am ready to do anything for Him. Just tell me what I have to do, and I'll do it. I am READY TO CARRY ANY CROSS."

Suppose I should ask you at the close of a religious service to rise up announcing yourself on the Lord's side—could you do it? "O! no," you say, "I have a shrinking and a sensitive nature, and it would be impossible for me to rise before a large assemblage, announcing myself on the Lord's side." Just as I feared. You cannot stand that cross. The first one that is offered you, you reject. Christ carried a mountain, Christ carried a Himalaya, Christ carried a world for you, and you cannot lift an ounce for Him.

But here is a man whose cross will be to announce among his business associates to-morrow morning on Exchange, that he has begun a new life, that while he wants to be faithful in his worldly duties, he is living for another world, and he ought to advise all those who are his associates, so far as he can influence them, to begin with him the Christian life. Could you do that, my brother! "O! no," you say, "not just that. I think religion is religion, and business is business, and it would be impossible for me to recommend the Christian religion in places of worldly business." Just as I feared. There is a second cross offered you, and you cannot carry it. Christ lifted a mountain for you; you cannot lift an ounce for Him.

There is some one whose cross will be to present religion in the home circle. Would you dare to kneel down and pray, if your brother and sister were looking at you? Could you ask a blessing at the tea-table? Could you take the Bible and gather your family around you, and read of Christ and heaven and your immortal soul? Could you then kneel and pray for a blessing on your household? "O!" you say, "not exactly that. I couldn't quite do that, because I have a very quick temper, and if I professed religion and tried to talk religion in my household, and then after that I should lose my temper they would scoff at me and say: 'You are a pretty Christian!' So you are cowed down and their sarcasm keeps you out of heaven and away from Christ, when under God you ought to take your whole family into the kingdom. Christ lifted a mountain, lifted a world for you; you cannot lift an ounce for Him. I see how it is; you want to be favorable to religion, you want to support Christian institutions, you like to be associated with those who love Jesus Christ; but as to taking a positive step on this subject, you cannot—you cannot, and my text, like a gate of a hundred bolts, bars you away from peace on earth and glory in heaven.

There are hundreds of men and women here brave enough in other things in life who simply for the lack of manliness and womanliness stay away from God. They dare not say: "Forever and forever Lord Jesus, I take Thee. Thou hast redeemed me by Thy blood, here is my immortal spirit. Listen, all my friends. Listen, all the world." They are lurking around about the kingdom of God—they are lurking around about it, expecting to crawl in some time when nobody is looking, forgetful of the tremendous words of my text: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple."

An officer of a neighboring church told me that he was in a store in New York—just happened in—where there were many clerks, and a gentleman came in and said to a young man standing behind the counter: "Are you the young man that arose the other night in the Brooklyn Tabernacle and asked for prayers?" Without any flush of cheek, he replied: "I am. I haven't always done right, and I have been quite bad; but since I arose for prayers, I think I am better than I was." It was only his way of announcing that he had started for the higher life. God will not cast out a man who is brave enough to take a step ahead like that.

I tell you these things this morning because, my dear friends, I want to show you that we have to carry compared with that which Christ carried for us. You have not had the flesh torn off for Christ's sake in carrying your cross. He fainted dead away under His cross. You have not carried the cross until it fetched the blood. Under His there was a pool of carnage that plashed the horses' fetlocks. You have friends to sympathize with you in carrying the cross. Christ trod the winepress of Almighty God's wrath alone, alone! The cross that you and I ought to carry represents only a few days or a few years of trial. The cross that Christ carried for us had compressed into it the agonies of eternity.

HOW LIGHT THE CROSS IS

There has some one come here to-day whom you have not observed. He did not come through the front door; He did not come down any of these aisles; yet I know He is here. He is from the East, the far East. He comes with blistered foot, and with broken heart, and cheeks red not with health, but with blood from the temples. I take hold of His coat and I say: "It does not seem to fit Thee." "No," He says, "it is not mine; it is borrowed; it does not belong to me now. For my vesture did they cast lots." And I say to Him, "Thine eyes are red as though from loss of sleep." He says: "Yes, the Son of man had not where to lay His head." And I touch the log on His back and I say: "Why carriest Thou this?" "Ah!" He says, "that is a cross I carry for thee and for the sins of the whole world. That is a cross. Fall into line, march on with me in this procession, take your smaller crosses and your lighter burdens, and join me in this march to Heaven." And we join that procession with our smaller crosses and our lighter burdens, and Christ looks back and He sees some are halting because they cannot endure the shame, or bear the burden, and with a voice which has in it majesty and omnipotence, He cries until all the earth trembles: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple."

O! my brethren, my sisters—for I do not speak professionally, I speak as a brother would speak to a brother or sister—my brother, can you not bear a cross if at last you can wear a crown? Come now, let us divide off. Who is on the Lord's side? Who is ready to turn his back upon the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world?

A Roman Emperor said to

A GREEK ARCHITECT:

"You build me a coliseum, a grand coliseum, and if it suits me I will crown you in the presence of all the people, and I will make a great day of festival on your account." The Greek architect did his work, did it magnificently, planned the building, looked after its construction. The building was done. The day for opening arrived. In the coliseum were the emperor and the Greek architect.

The emperor rose amid the plaudits of a vast assembly and said: "We have gathered here to-day, to open this coliseum, and to honor the Greek architect. It is a great day for the Roman Empire. Let this building be prosperous, and let honor be put upon the Greek architect. O! we must have a festival to-day. Bring out those Christians and let us have them put to death at the mouth of the lions." The Christians were put into the centre of the amphitheatre. It was to be a great celebration in their destruction. Then the lions, hungry and three fourths starved, were let out from their dens in the side of the amphitheatre, and they came forth with mighty spring to destroy and rend the Christians, and all the galleries shouted, "Huzza, huzza! Long live the emperor!" Then the Greek architect arose in one of the galleries and shouted until in the vast assemblage all heard him: "I too am a Christian!" and they seized him in their fury and flung him to the wild beasts, until his body, bleeding and dead, was tumbled over and over again in the dust of the amphitheatre.

Could you have done that for Christ? Could you, in a vast assemblage, all of whom hated Christ, have said: "I am a Christian," or, "I want to be a Christian?" Would you have had the ten thousandth part of the enthusiasm and the courage of the Greek architect? Nay, I ask you another question: would you in an assemblage where they are nearly all Christians—in an assemblage a vast multitude of whom love Christ and are willing to live, and if need be, to die for Him—would you dare to say, "I am a Christian," or, "I want to be a Christian?" Would you say in the presence of the friends of Christ to-day, as much as the Greek architect said in the presence of the enemies of Christ? O! are there not multitudes here this morning who are ready to say: "Let the world look on, let all the galleries of earth and heaven and hell look on, I take Christ this day. Come applause or abuse, come sickness or health, come life or death, Christ now, Christ forever."

I wonder if at the close of the sermon I asked all those who wanted to be for Christ, to rise up—I wonder if there would be a great multitude to rise up, and yet I shall not put the test. Let each one in his own soul answer the test. Are you for Christ, or are you against Him? The destinies of eternity tremble in the balance. It seems as if the last day had come and we were gathered for the reckoning. "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him." What I say to the impenitent I say this morning to all Christians. What are you doing for Christ? What are you bearing for Christ?

O! Christian man, O! Christian woman?

HAVE YOU ANY SCARS

to show in this conflict? When a war is over the heroes have scars to show. One hero rolls back his sleeve and shows a gunshot fracture, or he pulls down the collar and shows where he was wounded in the neck. Another man says: "I have never had the use of my limb since I was wounded at that great battle." When the last day comes, when all our battles are over, will we have any wounds for Christ? Some have wounds for sin, wounds for the devil, wounds gotten in fighting on the wrong side. Have we wounds that we can show—wounds gotten in the battle for Christ and for the truth? On that resurrection day Christ will have plenty of scars to show. Christ will stand there and show the scars on His brow, the scars on His hands, and the scars on His feet, and He will pull aside the robe of His royalty and show the scar on His side, and all heaven will break down with emotion and gratitude in one great sob, and then in one great hosanna. Will you and I have any scars to show?

There will be Ignatius, on that day showing the mark of the paw and teeth of the lion that struck him down in the Coliseum. There will be glorious John Huss showing just where on his foot the flames began on that day when his soul took wing of flame and soared up from Constance. There will be Hugh McNeil ready to point to the mark on his neck where the axe struck him. There will be McMillan and Campbell and Freeman, the American missionaries who with their wives and children were put to death in the awful massacre at Cawnpore, showing the place where the daggers of the Sepoys struck them. There will be the Waldenses showing where their limbs were broken on the day when the Piedmontese soldiery pitched them over the rocks. Will you and I have any wounds to show? Have we fought any battles for Christ?

When I ask for teachers will there not out of this Bible class come this afternoon, a hundred men and women who will say: "I can no longer be merely a recipient of truth; I must proclaim it. Woe is unto me if I preach not this Gospel somewhere to somebody. I can no longer stand here or sit here receiving from other teachers the truth of this Gospel when I must be a flaming evangel." O! that we might all be enlisted for Christ, that we might all be willing to suffer for Christ, that we might all bear a cross for Christ.

When

THE SCOTTISH CHIEFTAINS

wanted to raise an army, they would make a wooden cross, and then set it on fire and carry it with other crosses they had, through the mountains, through the highlands, and among the people, and as they waved the cross the people would gather to the standard and fight for Scotland. So to-day, I come out with the cross of the Son of God. It is a flaming cross—flaming with suffering, flaming with triumph, flaming with glory. I carry it out among all the people. Who will be on the Lord's side. Who will gather to the standard of Emmanuel? A cross, a cross, a cross! "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot, cannot be my disciple."

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 151.)

Corny's Appeal on Behalf of Capt. Vaughan—The Insurgent Officer's Order—A Soldier's Death Granted—Sylph's Petition—Miles Rossiter Revealed—Sylph Reminds him of a Promise—His Appeal to the Judges.

CORNY watched, as well as Sylph, and with intense interest, the proceedings in connection with Captain Vaughan's trial. He, too, for a while, was under the impression, from the delay of sentence, that "the Captain," had "a good chance for his life," as he worded it. Hence the erected triangle and the dangling noose became objects of dread omen to him as well as to his mistress.

He well knew, however, that his own direct personal protest would avail nothing. When, therefore, his mistress rushed to the rescue, he slipped away in the midst of the resulting confusion, with the design of looking out for some of his old connections and friends, peradventure in the camp, whom although he had fallen from out their good graces, he might, for his mistress's sake, persuade to put in a prevailing word for the Captain. He felt that his mission was pretty much a forlorn hope; but as it was the only thing possible to be done—looking to heaven for success—he would try it.

Providentially he fell in with the very man that would best serve his purpose, an old neighbor and once a boon companion of his, who, notwithstanding Corny's Methodism, still liked him; and who, less ignorant and fanatical than the great majority of the rebels, looked with disapproval upon the court-martial and its hasty and cold-blooded massacres. To him Corny hurriedly communicated his sad tale, and entreated his interference.

Owen Mullens, for this was his name, sorrowfully declared that he himself could do nothing. "My word, Corny," he said, "would not have the weight of a feather with the coves up near the ould mill, and, in fact, would, I know, only add to their murderin' determination. But, I tell you, me old friend, what I'll do. I'll take ye to our Captain at the foot o' the hill, who, I know, hates the goin's on at the mill as much and more nor I do. Tell him your story, Corny, and ask his aid. If anything can be done, he's the very man for you, fur he's as fine a fellow as breathes; and may heaven grant its aid."

The Captain listened to Corny's representation with sympathizing interest. "I am glad you have told me, my man, of those outrageous proceedings," he said. "They are opposed to all the principles of honorable warfare, and I will do my best to stop them. Follow me, my men," he said to his armed band around him. "I know we incur great risk, but we must put an end to those deeds which disgrace the national cause, and are fitted to bring upon us the execrations of the civilized world."

He and his followers promptly hastened up the hill, led by Corny; and, all but too late, reached, as has been stated, the place of intended execution.

"I forbid that man to be hung," he said, in a ringing voice to the presiding judges, whose extemporized court was quite near the triangle. "He is a soldier, and I am a soldier; and if he is to die, I claim a soldier's death for him."

The words were a sweet relief to Captain Vaughan, but a sore defeat of hope to Corny; who had fully assured himself that the mediator whom he had so happily enlisted had in his intention a full reprieve for Captain Vaughan; and not a mere difference in the mode of his execution.

Many of the bystanders were disposed to resent the interference of the rebel officer; who was depriving them, as some of them thought, of an entertaining sight; and, as others felt, of a reprisal of vengeance. Some, indeed, shouted out their disapproval, and made a show of resorting to violence. The presence of the officer's men, however, who were well armed, acted as a wholesome deterrent; but, more than anything else, the answer of the presiding judge to the demand made of him served to propitiate and allay the general anger and excitement.

"Had any one but yourself, Captain, dared to arrest the sentence of death passed upon this man by this Court, he would have paid the penalty for his rashness, even a whole regiment of your men would not have saved him. The Court feels, however, that yours, Captain, is an exceptional case. In the battle of yesterday your valor was most conspicuous; and the universal verdict is—as all here I think will admit—that to you is very much due our great and glorious victory."

At these words loud huzzas burst forth from the surrounding throng. Every expression of resentment fiercely urged, a moment before, against the young rebel officer, was changed into noisy acclamation.

When silence was restored the president of the court-martial waved his hand in a deprecating manner, and said, "The Court, in acknowledgment of your valor, Captain Mullens, meets your request, and consents that this man, about to suffer, shall die, not by the rope, but by the bullet; and, as your men carry rifles, we hand him over to you, Captain, for execution."

The rebel officer bowed his thanks to the Court, and then set about fulfilling the grim task imposed upon him. He ordered his men to untie the arms and legs of the prisoner; and then, at Captain Vaughan's urgent request, removed from his head and from before his eyes the covering that had been drawn over them. "As a soldier, and as a Christian man," he had said, "I fear not death, and with open vision would face my executioners; and one request more I make," he added to the rebel chief. "Permit me to give the command to fire." "I grant it," replied the young chieftain, "for it is a request I would urge myself under your circumstances."

Captain Vaughan was led to the brow of the precipice down which the bodies of those killed earlier in the day had been flung. Placed upon his knees he was told that two minutes would be given him for prayer; and then the rebel officer left his side to arrange his men for firing, at the prisoner's own signal.

The given moments were speeding fast; one of the accorded minutes of reprieve had more than gone. The firing party had their rifles brought to the shoulder; the lips of the doomed man were seen to move in supplication, while he held one hand to his breast, and held in the other his watch to see the exact instant when it would be required of him to say the word "fire." The crowd looking on was breathless in dread suspense, all nature, the air being still, seemed itself to be struck with awe, when Sylph, having dexterously evaded resistance, ran to where her betrothed lover was kneeling and knelt beside him, imploring to die with him. Her face aglow with exalted passion, she was fervently urging her plea. Supplicating it as a special and great favor, she was weeping forth her prayer, when the rebel officer, after beating down the rifles of his men with a rapid motion of his arm, bounded towards her, and caught her in his arms. The rebel officer was Miles Rossiter.

This interruption in the dread programme confounded and amazed every beholder; and as much Sylph and Captain Vaughan as any one. Years produce a greater change in a man's appearance than in a woman's; Sylph, therefore, confused and trembling, did not know Miles until he named himself; and as for Captain Vaughan, he had never made the acquaintance of the young Irishman who once found shelter under the same roof as Sylph, at Chester.

"Thank God! thank God! I was in time to save you," he said to Sylph. "Another moment, and you had perished. I saw near me men who, willing to take you at your word, would have killed you. Come with me, Sylph. Yes, you must," he added, as he saw her reluctant to leave, "I will put you in safety. This is no place for you, beside this man, who must die."

"I will not leave this spot," she answered, "unless you save the life of my companion."

"That is impossible, Sylph," he replied, and quickly, "quite impossible. In a civil war, the military taken captive seldom get mercy; and I am certain that this man, at all events, will not be spared by those around us. The people yesterday suffered dreadfully under the fire of the soldi and those who escaped are savage with rage, spite of all that I could do they will certainly avenge themselves."

"Mr. Rossiter," said Sylph, "your life once in sore peril, and I and Dr. Gilbert did best to save it. You solemnly promised that if opportunity were given you of making a return our kindness you would do it; and I call upon now to fulfil your pledge. Save the life of him side me, or be assured you cannot save mine, for he is to die I am resolved to die with him."

And yet, however difficult it might be, Rossiter love for Sylph, and the remembrance of his objection to her irresistibly forced him, after a moment's thought, to put the matter to the test. Leaving place near Sylph, he returned to where his stood, and who had grounded their rifles. They expected that he would again command them to appointed task, but, to their surprise, passing beyond them, he moved on to where the judges

"How was he to order his plea, and what should he say best fitted to move them?" Rapidly came over this difficult question in his thoughts, praying to God for guidance, he resolved to relate the story of his sojourn in Doctor Gilbert's dwelling in spite of the unmistakable signs of a violent impatience among the multitude.

The narrative related in tones full of tenderness and trembling pathos, deeply moved the pressional and impulsive throng around him. That a Protestant doctor—as Miles described him to have been—should give his best services to a young Irishman, and he a student for the Roman Catholic priesthood; and who was a perfect stranger to him and unbefriended, and that without reward, touched their warm natures and quickened sensibilities to the core. That Sylph had well kindly seconded this physician's endeavors, and that for many week, aroused their best sympathies in her favor. And Miles's further assertion "that Doctor Gilbert and his daughter" as Miles still supposed her to be, "were the enemies of oppression and tyranny, and the friends of all oppressed peoples, of which he was certain," he said "from many conversations with them during sojourn in their house," was a climax that served to disarm the wrathful emotions and prejudice the listening crowd most effectually.

Miles' most difficult task remained, however, any case the life of Sylph was not aimed at, either by the judges of the rebel court-martial or by the constituents. Their declared rule was "to honor woman's life sacred." The arduous point was that this sentiment of sacredness transferred, in thoughts of the insurgents, to the man already doomed to death by the insurgent tribunal. Ready Miles had obtained a concession in his favor, and hard it was to do so, although it only amounted to a change in the manner of his death. The likelihood was there at all that he could persuade either the presiding judges, or those who supported their authority, to forego their meed of vengeance altogether?

The words of Sylph however, "Save him, you cannot save me," rang again in Miles's ear, forced him at all hazards to beg for the life of still kneeling prisoner.

At the first inkling of Miles's request, and before he uttered a dozen words, there was noisy opposition. To the stern refusal of the judges, was added the clamor for blood by the people. "No, no," they cried out, "We've giv' in to ye wanst, Captain Rossiter, and we'll giv' in to ye no more. Back that fellas life, indeed, who yesterday shot down by the score widout mercy? We won't that ye have the face to ax it. You'll be wantin' next, maybe, to stand up before the hangdog militia and bow thim our thanks for shootin' uz—"

"But it's no use, Captin, yer thrying to get us in this way; we've made up our minds that English sojer shall die, and all ye can say to the contrary will be of no manner o' use." And wild huzzas were taken up over the whole rebel camp.

Miles, however, knew his countrymen and their fickleness of purpose too well to give up in the task he had undertaken. Turning round, a silence was restored, he pointed to Captain Vaughan an still kneeling where he had been placed, and who, calm and self-possessed, was waiting—although without hope—the result of Miles's interposition.

"Look at him, my countrymen," he said. "See his unflinching courage and calm composure. How can you bear the thought of taking in cold blood the life of a man so noble in his bearing as that?" "Aye, but he tuk our lives," was the answer; "and we're only goin' to pay him off in his own coin."

"What?" cried Miles, indignantly. "Took the lives of your friends in cold blood, as you now propose to take his? Never! This man you wish to murder—for I will call it nothing else—did his work of death—and you know it—in fair battle, exposing, at the same time, his own life; and if he did not do this, his soldier's duty, and as a soldier should, there is not one of you but would look upon him as a perjured traitor and a coward."

"You look for the independence of your country one of these days—and I trust it will come soon—what would you say to an Irish soldier, officer or private, who in that day would not do as this man has done, and fight his best for the cause he was sworn to uphold? Would you not hate him?"

"Then I call upon you to honor in this English officer what you would honor in an Irish officer. As one who has put his life at your service, and who, you confess, has served you well, I ask for this brave man's life."

Giving a rapid glance at those who sat in judgment, and into the faces of the crowd around him, Miles could perceive that his words were not without their effect—that the sense of right and justice, was moved and quickened at his words. Embracing the good omen, he resolved to put it to instant use. Walking with a firm step to where Captain Vaughan knelt, he placed himself in front of him, and facing the rebel crowd, he stretched forth his arms, and cried out, "Spare this brave man, my countrymen; or reach his life through the heart of Miles Rossiter!"

The effect was electric. That an Irish soldier should thus be willing to jeopardize his life for an English soldier kindled the highest enthusiasm of an imaginative people. Nothing so touches the human breast as an act of self-sacrifice for another. It is the self-sacrifice of Christ, not for friends, but for foes, which constitutes the crowning glory of the Book of God and the power which exercises the mightiest force upon sinful and perishing men. It is felt to have in it something of a divine beauty and loveliness.

(To be continued.)

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S.S. Lesson for March 26, Luke 24: 19. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 1: 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN reviewing our lessons for the past quarter we have seen the power of Jesus exemplified in four different ways: His power to forgive; to heal disease and to cast out devils; to work miracles; and to win men from a life of self-pleasing to one of heroic self-abnegation, a life of leaving all for His sake. Wherever Jesus was,

HIS PRESENCE WAS A POWER.

John the Baptist said of Him, "There cometh One mightier than I after me." In the time of the wilderness temptation Satan felt His power and retreated vanquished, and thus the mightiest power outside heaven was conquered. Walking by the sea of Galilee, there was power enough in the "Come" of Jesus to induce Simon and Andrew, James and John, to set aside all personal, all family, all business considerations, and to follow Him who had "not where to lay His head." Our devotion to the Lord Jesus will be in proportion to the power which His presence and His teaching have exercised over us. If we have been brought to a point in which the claims of business and the claims of Jesus clash, our decision just at that point will show whether Jesus is really the power of God to us. Let a Christian man be engaged in the drink traffic, or as a tobaccoist, or one who deals largely in opium and morphia; let the Spirit of God convict such a man that the business through which he gains his living is doing harm to the souls and bodies of his fellow-creatures, is strengthening the world, the flesh, and the devil, and therefore is not hallowing God's name, nor bringing His kingdom, nor doing His will, and let him abandon it at any cost and seek any situation however humble, however much he may have to retrench, and men will see that Christ is the power of God to him. But let him flinch, and make excuses, say that he does things in a respectable way, meaning all the time, "I do not count Jesus worth the sacrifice of my comfort and my position," and it is very clear that to such an one Jesus is not made "the power of God."

We have seen that Jesus was the power of God to evil spirits, that they could not remain hidden, they must manifest themselves in His presence, and release their poor victims; that presence made darkness turn into light, and the demons were forced to testify that He was the Holy One of God. But O their sad cry, "What have we to do with Thee?" how awful it was! Knowing that the mighty Deliverer was there, but that they could not be delivered, that although the very beings which they had been oppressing were being wrested from their grasp, no hope was held out to them, well might they say, "What have I to do with Thee, Thou Jesus of Nazareth?" well might they say, "Let us alone . . . art Thou come to destroy us?" Destruction would have been a relief, but they must live, and without Him who alone is Life in the great eternity to come.

And Jesus was, as we have seen, the power of God in the presence of sickness; no fever could resist the touch of His hand, no sickness hold its own when He had commanded it to depart. Christ is the power of God against fever, dropsy, palsy, blindness, lameness, and divers diseases, leprosy not excluded; how comes it, then, that we do not see more of healing around us, why not more of deliverance from lunacy? Surely there is but one answer: We do not give "place enough to Jesus; we do not know fully His power over sin. O it is heartrending to hear one story after another of those who have known peace with God, or have professed to know it, who have talked about Jesus and sung hymns of praise and yet are guilty of adultery, theft, drunkenness, etc. Jesus is ready to do all His mighty works in soul and body; but while such sin is being perpetrated under the cloak of His name there needs a double devotedness on the part of His true disciples, that the chaff be separated from the wheat, in order that the power of Christ may be made manifest. The time is come when religion must be a thing of deeds, when Christ must be the power of God in our wills, our tempers, our affections, our home-life, or it will be manifest that we have believed in vain.

A RAG-PICKER

who had been a notorious drunkard and evil liver, found Christ in the Salvation Army meetings. One morning the wheel of his cart got entangled by accident with a clothes-prop which was holding some clothes-lines, and the prop was broken. Instead of cursing and swearing as formerly, he inquired in the neighborhood who was the owner of the clothes-prop, and he went and called upon the laundress, telling her of the accident and that he would buy her a new prop. His character was so well known that the woman opened her eyes and asked what had come to him. "I've got converted," he said, "at the Salvation Army meetings, and the Lord has given me a clean heart." The woman believed in a religion which would give her a new clothes-prop and she came to the meetings and God met with her too; she saw that Christ was the power of God to the poor rag picker, and she wanted this power too. Let there be more of this kind of religion, a religion which costs something, and which yet is not counted too dear a cost, and we shall soon find that faith in the Lord as the Healer will follow as a necessary consequence; bodies which are given to the Lord as a living sacrifice will be found to respond to His healing touch as to no other.

It is most striking that in the five chapters of Mark which we have been considering during the past three months only one of our Lord's miracles is recorded; that of stilling the tempest, while His healing is mentioned twelve times. Again in choosing His apostles His object was that He "might send them forth to preach, and to have power to heal sicknesses, and to cast out devils," but He never authorized them to do miracles. Thus we gather that while preaching and healing is His ordinary work and that of His disciples, the working of miracles was, and is an exception; and we see also that healing cannot be classed among miracles, but is "a statute and an ordinance" (Ex. 15: 25), and is to be reckoned with the work of His redemption, "Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases." "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick: the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." "Behold I will bring it health and cure, and I will cure them, and will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth" (Ps. 103: 3; Isa. 33: 24; Jer. 33: 6).

We have seen Christ as

THE WISDOM OF GOD

in His answers to the Pharisees. He always took them to higher ground, never met them where they were; the question of fasting was really one of possession of the Bridegroom. John the Baptist knew something about this, but the Pharisees were all at sea about anything experimental, it was out of their horizon altogether; they could talk about doctrine with any one, and as to externals, the very ritualists do not beat them; but Christ in the heart, the presence of the Bridegroom, this was beyond their depth. And we saw Christ as the Wisdom of God in the question of the Sabbath. Very much sin was covered over by the Jews in their extreme scrupulousness in this matter. Hypocrisy, oppression of the poor, extreme usury, disobedience to parents, and much uncleanness were all covered over by their zealous regard for the Sabbath. It was so much easier to be strict on this point than to exercise love, self-denial, or even justice; and then there was the flattering balsam of self-righteousness to

SWEETEN THE PILL OF

Sabbath self denial. And the holy eye of Jesus saw through all this, and He said, "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath. Therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath." Again, when under accusation from the Jews of casting out devils through the prince of the devils, He takes them higher, explains the matter to them and then shows them the awful danger of thus condemning Him, the Son of God.

We learned also His Wisdom as the Teacher. The picture of the heart in the parable of the sower is indeed drawn from life—the Lord teach us to profit by it; and if for the sake of wearing down the hard resisting rock into fertile soil the Lord must sometimes blast the rock, and work at it with pickaxe and hammer, roll the little fragments of rock into a stream, where they will be well worn one against another, until they become fine sand or even mud, let us not flinch from the process, if only in the end we may bring forth thirty-fold, sixty-fold, and an hundred-fold. Again, in evangelistic work, if our hearts are sore for those who have received the word with joy, and yet in time of temptation fall away, let us not forget that the Lord has told us in this parable that it would be so, and let us not think ourselves wiser than our Master. Only let us not forget these young ones in the faith, let us seek to bring them in contact with Christ who is the power of God and the wisdom of God, to restore them and to keep them, and let us, above all, learn the lesson that if any do run well, it is never thanks to our earnestness or gifts, but it is purely of the grace of God; nothing else.

It is a marvel with such a Lord, the power of God to us and the wisdom of God to us, that we Christians are not a greater power in the world. There must be in us a good deal of self-dependence which is taking the place of His power, or we should be doing the works which He did, and greater works, as He tells us (John 14: 12); there must be a good deal of leaning to our own understanding, or we should be more thoroughly possessed with the wisdom of God. Whenever we are quite empty, He fills us. O how often have we said this! Now Lord undertake and turn out from me and from my brethren all which is of self, that no power and no wisdom may dwell in us, but Thyself alone!

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER, BY B. AITKEN.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate, on Friday last, Passed the Bill providing for a commission on the subject of the Liquor Traffic and sent it to the House. The duty of the commission will be "to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to revenue and taxation, and its general economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people." As passed, the bill provides for seven commissioners to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation. They are to hold office two years, and besides inquiring as to the various relations of the liquor traffic, are to take testimony as to the practical results of license and prohibitory legislation. The commissioners are to serve without salary, and $10,000 is appropriated to pay incidental expenses. A report is to be made to the President for transmission to Congress. The bill was introduced by Senator Omar D. Conger, of Michigan, and supported by petitions from all the States. It was passed by 34 votes to 14. In the majority were 26 Republicans, 6 Democrats and 2 Independents. The minority was composed of 13 Democrats and one Republican. It is understood that the Democratic opponents of the bill based their opposition on the belief that the commission was a needless expenditure and that all the facts it could collect might be obtained without its intervention.

Mr. Conkling's Letter to the President Declining the Associate-Justiceship of the Supreme Court has not been published, but is understood to have been decisive. It is probably the wisest course Mr. Conkling could have taken in view of the fierce opposition the nomination called forth. In appointments to the bench, especially to that of the Supreme Court, it is important that the opinions and even the prejudices of the people should be respected, in order that the decisions of the highest court in the land should command the confidence of all. No one appears to have cast any imputation on Mr. Conkling's integrity, but there are many members of the Republican party who sympathized very strongly with President Garfield and Mr. Blaine in their contest with Mr. Conkling last year, and who therefore regarded Mr. Conkling's nomination in the light of a reflection on the memory of the late President. An active opposition to the appointment was also aroused in the Republican party by personal opponents of the ex-senator. One of these did not scruple to charge Mr. Conkling with being indirectly responsible for the assassination of President Garfield, a charge which came with singularly bad grace from the hand which wrote the famous "midnight despatch."

An Appeal from the Women of Utah has been issued. On February 27th a mass meeting of women was held in Salt Lake City at which strong anti-polygamy resolutions were passed. The speakers had good reason to understand the evils of polygamy, and their utterances caused a profound sensation in the city. The following was one of the resolutions adopted. "We beseech Congress to rely no longer on half measures, but at once to take from the Mormons all political privileges until they accept as sovereign the laws of the United States; that we fear that Mr. Edmonds's bill will be found fatally defective, like the present anti-Polygamy law, because, while it disfranchises polygamists, it provides no machinery whatever for enforcing said disfranchisement; that we believe that a commission of sterling citizens of this Territory, given full legislative powers and working under the supervision of Congress, is the only real, prompt, and merciful remedy for Utah's wrongs."

The Aggregate Losses by the Michigan Fires are thus stated by Governor Jerome in his special message to the Legislature of Michigan. The Governor says that the losses of those who have asked and received aid, as shown by sworn appraisals, amounted to $2,346,943, or an average of over $726 for each family. The losses of those who have neither asked nor required assistance is known to have been of great magnitude. For relief, in addition to large amounts contributed by churches, societies, and individuals directly to the sufferers, of which there is no attainable record, but which is known to aggregate many thousands of dollars, there has been received by the State Fire Relief Commission, the Detroit and Port Huron committees, and committees of other localities, as reported to the Governor, the sum of $623,436.89 in cash, together with donations in kind which, when added to the cash contribution, would equal the sum of $1,000,000.

The Death of Dr. Henry Highland Garnet is announced in a brief telegram received at the State Department on March 10th. Dr. Garnet was well known as the leader of the colored race in New York State, and he for some time occupied a prominent position in Washington as pastor of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church. One of the first of the nominations made by President Garfield was that of Dr. Garnet to be United States Minister to the Republic of Liberia, and it is said that one of the last official acts of President Garfield was that of signing Dr. Garnet's commission. After President Garfield's death President Arthur sent Dr. Garnet's name again to the Senate. The nomination was promptly confirmed, and on the 12th of November, 1881, the first colored Minister and Consul-General of the United States sailed on his mission. His daughter, Mary Highland Garnet Barbosa, had already preceded him by about a year, having been sent out under the auspices of a ladies' society in New York to found in the African Republic a school for native girls. The telegram announcing Dr. Garnet's death came by way of Madeira and states that he died at Monrovia on February 13th. Dr. Garnet was sixty-seven years of age.

Another Extensive Defalcation was Announced last week. The officials of the Fourth National Bank of New York discovered that valuable securities had been removed from the bank and deposited elsewhere as security for loans. Thirty thousand dollars also had been abstracted from the funds of the bank, which, with the forty thousand required to redeem the securities, made the loss of the bank $70,000. It is alleged that the culprit in the case is Mr. Richard H. Cornewell, the loan clerk of the bank, who has been in the establishment eleven years, and is sixty-five years of age. The charge caused much surprise in New York, where he was formerly a member of the Stock Exchange, and also at Plainfield, N. J., where he resides. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and an active Sunday-school teacher. Mr. Cornewell had speculated in stocks to a considerable extent, it appears, and to protect his margins with his brokers had from time to time deposited one after another of the bonds in his care. He was unfortunate in his speculations, had been obliged to "cover" by more margins and had finally been sold out by his brokers. As is usual in such cases, the Christian church suffers reproach by the defaulter's prominence in religious work. These scandals are becoming alarmingly frequent, and suggest the fear that the sin of avarice is very prevalent in the church. We cannot be surprised at the fall of men under fierce temptation when we see people professing to be Christians plotting and deceiving and stooping to meanness for the sake of gain. It will be well for every Christian to examine his own heart lest the love of money, which is the root of all evil, should find a place there. A man who is greedy of money is on dangerous ground; when Satan assaults him, the citadel of the heart is weakened by the presence of a traitor within.

Sergeant John A. Mason, the Officer who fired at Guiteau through the window of the jail at Washington last September, has been tried before a military court for his breach of discipline. He has been found guilty, and the verdict and sentence having been submitted to General Hancock and approved, are now published. Mason has been condemned by the court-martial to be dishonorably discharged from the army, with loss of all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor in a penitentiary for eight years, and the penitentiary at Albany is designated as the place, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. The offence for which Mason was put on trial before the military tribunal was the same for which Guiteau himself would have been tried if President Garfield had recovered from his wound—assault with intent to kill; and the sentence of eight years in the penitentiary is all that could have been inflicted on Guiteau, had not the President's wound proved fatal.

The Loss and Misery caused by the Floods of the Mississippi are described as appalling by Captain J. M. Lee, the army officer appointed by the Secretary of War to ascertain the condition of affairs. On his return from Arkansas City, Captain Lee said no one who had not seen the country overflowed could form any idea of its true condition. From a point twenty miles below Memphis, where the first break on the levee occurred, the entire country is one vast sheet of water. The people all through this submerged region are utterly destitute and in a starving condition, their stock having been drowned. They are living in gin houses, stable lofts, and upper stories of cabins. Hundreds are subsisting on parched corn. Many have been temporarily relieved by the distribution of government rations, but others could not be reached, and their suffering is very great. The levee along the river front is broken in forty different places between Memphis and Arkansas City, and at some points the river is fifty miles wide. All published reports have fallen far short of giving an idea of the damage done, or of the destitution prevailing. Captain Lee's first estimate, made to the Secretary of War, that $360,000 would be required to feed the 18,000 needy persons in the State of Mississippi will, he says fall short, as the destitute will probably be double the number first estimated.

Nearly Three Million Dollars have Become payable to religious and philanthropic societies by the death of an aged lady in New York. She was the survivor of three sisters, daughters of Mr. Isaac Burr, who died in 1857. Mr. Burr beside other property, owned a farm which is now covered by handsome residences. This farm extended from Fortieth Street, New York city, along Fifth Avenue to Forty-fourth Street, and east beyond Madison Avenue. It was the enormous increase in value of this farm that enriched the family. Each of the three sisters made a will leaving the interest of her respective share in the property to her sisters for their lives, and at the death of the survivor certain small legacies were to be paid, and the balance divided among the asylums, hospitals, and societies of the city. Prominent among those which receive the largest sums are the American Bible Society, the American Church Missionary Society, and the Foreign Missionary Society of the Episcopal Church for Africa and China.

The Services Held at Nashville, Tenn., by Rev. E. P. Hammond appear to have been of a very successful character. One of the indirect results is of an interesting character, and is thus described by Mr. Hammond: "Last Monday, two prominent physicians in town, who had been at the meeting the night before, stopped me in the street, and asked if I would address the medical students in their college. As they were not Christian men I was surprised at this, and asked 'What shall be the subject?' 'Anything you please,' was the reply. 'But if I accept your invitation I shall entreat them to become Christian men.' 'That's what we want,' they answered. At the appointed time I went, and I have never spoken to a more attentive audience. I found there representatives from fifteen different States." Mr. Hammond's friends will regret to learn that at Nashville he has not had the valuable assistance of Mrs. Hammond. She was thrown violently from a buggy and nearly run over by a railroad train three weeks ago and is still suffering from the effects of the accident.

No Light Shone from the Ship Shoal Lighthouse near Morgan City, La., on two consecutive nights last month. The unusual darkness at that point caused some surprise, but surprise was turned into indignation when the facts became known. One of the keepers had seen a man in a boat who needed assistance, his vessel being becalmed. The keeper kindly towed the boat to the lighthouse and treated the man hospitably. In the night the guest made a murderous attack on the two lighthouse-keepers, shooting both of them and inflicting dangerous wounds. He held possession of the lighthouse for forty-eight hours, during which he never lighted the lamps. Then, as he could not find food, he surrendered. A man more utterly depraved it is difficult to imagine. But there are many men trying to do a more disastrous thing. Reading in the Bible a condemnation of their lives they would be glad to quench, if they could, its warning light (Luke 11: 52).

The Glossograph is a New Invention Described in the scientific journal Iron, and appears to be, like the telephone and phonograph, a most wonderful and ingenious instrument. It consists of a combination of delicate levers and blades which, placed upon the tongue and lips and under the nostrils of the speaker, are vibrated by the movements of the former and the breath flowing from the latter. Attached to the levers are pencils, which register in signs the sounds uttered by the tongue and lips upon a strip of paper moved by a mechanical arrangement. Similar to shorthand, a special system of writing, which may fitly be termed glossography, is produced, based upon the principle of syllable construction and combination of consonants. If such a machine were in frequent use in society what a record of rapid and trifling conversation would be registered! We can imagine that even the most frivolous people would be ashamed to read the words they had spoken. People too often forget that an account will have to be rendered of their words (Matt. 12: 36).

A Remarkable Cure is in Progress in San Francisco. It appears that five months ago a teamster named John Coltery, who attempted to drive his team through a barn door, had his head forced down on his breast until his neck was broken. Police Surgeon Stambaugh made an examination of the injured man and found that the seventh vertebra was fractured, and that the spinal cord had been stretched nearly two inches. After his removal to his home Coltery states that he was laid flat on his back with a sort of fence about his neck and head which kept him immovable for over two months. The body of the vertebra was discovered to be broken, and the operation of joining it together without pinching the spinal cord where it had sagged between the ragged edges is described as one of the most difficult ever performed. For a month the patient lay on his back, completely paralyzed in one half of his body and with but little feeling in the other. If he moved in the slightest degree during the first fortnight he could plainly feel the jagged edges of the bone grate together, and for hours after such an attempt he was content to lie on his hard bed without attempting to move a muscle for fear that the spinal cord should be crushed and his existence ended in a twinkling. The straightest position attainable was required, and to this end Dr. Stambaugh was compelled to refuse him a mattress, forcing him to lie on a wide plank. Coltery says that before his eight weeks of enforced quietness were ended he thought that board was made of adamant. The paralysis has now almost disappeared. Surgeons say that such injuries are nearly always fatal; only one patient in one thousand recorded cases recovered. But the great Healer cures cases of spiritual suffering of which this is a type without fail, and sometimes it is by the same process of making the sufferer remain perfectly still until he sees "the salvation of God."

A Curious Incident in a Texas Law Court is thus described in a local journal. "It was in Crosby County and a prisoner was convicted of shooting a bull that did not belong to him, and was fined $75. 'Why, judge,' said the doomed man, 'I haven't got no $75; I can't pay no sitch fine.' 'The State of Texas puts me in this office to find out a way to make men pay their fines. You will cut cedar poles until you have cut enough to satisfy the majesty of the law,' replied the justice. 'But, judge, what use has the State of Texas got for cedar poles?' 'The State of Texas hasn't got no use for cedar poles. It's this court who needs them cedar poles to build a fence. I'll take the poles, and settle with the State of Texas for them.' And the prisoner forthwith commenced his work." He probably supposed that as he was too poor to pay a heavy fine, and his imprisonment would entail the expense of his board on the State, he might escape altogether. The discovery that another alternative existed which solved both difficulties must have been a disagreeable surprise to him. It may be that a similar surprise awaits the men of liberal ideas who now console themselves with the notion that the doctrine of eternal punishment is false, and inconsistent with the character of a loving God (2 Thess. 1: 8).

A Bad Scare was Administered Recently to a man who boasted that he could easily check a panic in a crowded building. A Detroit paper says that six or eight men were gathered round the stove in a Grand River grocery when the subject of stampedes in churches, halls, and theatres caused by alarm of fire was introduced. One of the men said he would like to see such a panic that he might show how easy it would be for a level-headed man to stop it. "I would stand," he said, "upon my seat, pull a revolver from my pocket, and shout out that I'd shoot the first man who attempted to crowd or rush. One cool man would check the panic in ten seconds." The grocer went quietly to the rear of the store and poured a little gunpowder on a board. In a minute or two there was a bright flash and a cry of "fire!" and every man made for the door. The boaster did not stay to threaten shooting, but would have been the first man out of the store had he not fallen over a rack of brooms in his eagerness to reach the sidewalk. It will be well to remember this instance of empty boasting when we hear atheists vaunt what bold things they will say when they come to die and if after death they find there is a judgment. These boasts win applause and admiration from thoughtless people who forget how little likely they are to be fulfilled (Ezek. 35: 13).

Held Fast While the Tide Rose, was the sad fate of a woman in Brooklyn who was found drowned last week in Bushwick Creek. There is only mud when the tide is out at that point of the coast, and it is supposed the unfortunate woman while drunk attempted to cross, and got fastened in the mud. She was unable to extricate herself before the tide, coming in, washed over her. Her husband is serving a term in prison for habitual drunkenness, and several of her children are being cared for at public institutions. The woman's situation when she saw the tide rising around her yet could not escape, is a fit illustration of the situation of thousands of men and women whose habits and associations hold them back from salvation, though they know that to stay in their sins must end in eternal death. If such sinners would but ask for the help God has promised to give, they might be saved (Ezek. 11: 19).

OUR LORD'S FIRST APPEARANCE BEFORE PILATE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Pilate saith unto them, I find in Him no fault at all."—John 18: 38.

A Sad Procession—A Hypocritical Device—Two Accusations Against Jesus—I. That He was a Malefactor—A Novel Charge—Without Evidence—Not Denied by Jesus—Reasons for His Silence—II. That He Claimed Kingship—Who were the Informers—A Frivolous Charge—What Jesus Meant—His Kingdom a Very Real One—Every Inch a King—Who are His Subjects—Disciples who are not Subjects—III. The Acquittal—Pilate's Verdict a Right One—Found by all who have Examined Christ—By all who have Associated with Him—Eventually a Universal Verdict—Three Practical Words—Beware of External Religion—Shun Worldliness—Submit to Jesus as King.

I SHOULD like, if God spares us, to present to you on Sabbath mornings the full story of our Saviour's sufferings. We began last Lord's-day by going with Him to the hall of Caiaphas, and it was a sadly solemn time when we beheld the Prince of Peace a prisoner, heard Him falsely accused and unjustly condemned, and then saw Him abused, till servants and abjects did spit in His face and make a mockery of Him.

I hope that you will not be wearied with this subject. If so, it will be the fault of the preacher, for the subject is ever full and fresh; or if the preacher be not to blame, there will be something of censure due to his hearers. If we do grow tired of the story of the cross it will be a sad indication of secret soul-sickness, and it will be well to observe the symptom and hasten to the great Physician for healing. To true saints in a healthy condition there is no place more attractive than the place of our Lord's passion, where He accomplished the glorious work of our redemption. They love to linger along that Via Dolorosa which leads from Gethsemane to Golgotha; let us linger with them.

Our Lord was condemned by the chief priests for blasphemy, because He declared Himself to be the Son of God, and told them that they should hereafter see Him coming in the clouds of heaven to be their judge. Rending His garments, the high priest said, "What need have we of any further witness? Ye have heard His blasphemy." When the morning light had come, and they had gone through the formality of a set trial by daylight, having really condemned Him in the night, they led Jesus away to Pilate. According to tradition, He was led with a rope about His neck, and his hands bound; and I can fully believe in the tradition when I remember the words of Isaiah: "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter." It was which moved through Jerusalem a little after six in the morning. Those men of the Sanhedrim in all their pomp and power surrounding this one poor victim, whom they were about to deliver to the Gentiles with the one design that He might be put to death!

A STRANGELY SAD PROCESSION

When they came to the house of the Roman governor, they would not themselves enter within its doors. It is said to have been one of the many magnificent palaces which Herod the Great built for himself; the architecture was gorgeous, the floors were inlaid with choice marbles, and all the chambers were richly gilded and furnished with Oriental splendor. Into the great hall these scrupulous hypocrites would not enter, because they must by no means be defiled by the touch of a Gentile, for they had already commenced to keep the Passover. So they waited in the courtyard, and Pilate condescended to come out to them and learn the pressing business which brought them there so early in the morning.

The Roman governor was proud and cruel, and abhorred the Jews; but still, knowing their fanaticism and the readiness with which they broke loose at Passover times, he stood at his palace-gate and heard their demands. He soon ascertained that they had brought him a prisoner, evidently a poor man, and in personal appearance emaciated, weary, and suffering. About him there was at mysterious dignity combined with singular gentleness, and Pilate for this and other reasons evidently took a singular interest in him. Fixing his gaze first upon the extraordinary prisoner, he turned to the angry priests and demanded, "What accusation bring ye against this man?"

The one object of the priests in bringing Jesus to Pilate was to get Him put to death; for when Pilate told them to go and judge Him according to their law, they replied that they would gladly do so, but that the power of life and death had been taken from them, implying that nothing but His death would content them. They were, however, very anxious at this stage to lay the responsibility of His death upon the Romans, for the fear of the people was still upon them, and if they could secure His death by Pilate, then they might in after days protest that they merely handed Him over to the Roman governor and could not foresee that He would be handled so roughly.

Humanly speaking, they could have put Him to death themselves, for He was entirely in their power, and they frequently forgot the Roman law and slew men in riotous fury, as when they stoned Stephen. They had frequently attempted to stone our Lord Himself, so that they were not always so mindful of Roman law. They might have taken His life on this occasion, but they were led by a mysterious impulse to desire that the actual responsibility of the deed should rest on Pilate. Further on they were willing to join with the fickle throng in sharing the guilt of His blood, but as yet they would fain throw it upon others. During their great festivals if they took innocent blood, their hypocrisy made them wish to do it by forms of law and by an alien hand. To do this they must bring an accusation, for no Roman ruler would condemn a man till an accusation had been made.

We shall, this morning, consider that they brought, and after that we shall hear the verdict of acquittal which Pilate gave in the language of the text: "I find in Him no fault at all."

THE TWO ACCUSATIONS

I. The first accusation, if you will turn to the chapter and read the thirtieth verse, was that He was a malefactor. "They answered and said unto him, If He were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered Him up unto thee." He was said to be a factor, or doer of that which is evil; a person of such a mischievous life that He ought not to live.

Upon which we remark, first, that it was a novel charge. It was hot from their mint; for when He stood before Caiaphas nothing was said of any evil that He had done, but only of evil that He had spoken. They charged Him with saying this and that, but not with doing any evil deed. The accusation of evil speaking had broken down, and they did not venture upon it a second time, because they knew very well that Pilate did not care what the man had said; all he would attend to would be some actual breach of law by act and deed.

The Romans were a practical people, and so when Pilate led our Lord into the audience chamber he said to Him, "What hast thou done?" He did not say to Him, "What has thou taught or preached?" but, "What hast thou done?" For this reason, the priests brought forward this newly-invented accusation and totally unfounded charge that He was a bad doer, which might mean little or much, as the hearer chose to interpret it—malice is seldom specific in its charges. The accusation of being a malefactor grew out of their malevolence, and not out of any action of our Lord's perfect life. One is surprised that even hate should be so blind as to assail His perfections. Whatever men may think of our Lord as a teacher, candor demands that they admire His example and award it the highest meed of honor.

Observe, the priests herein brought against our Lord a charge which they did not attempt to sustain. How craftily they evaded the task of supplying proof! They brought no witnesses, their suborned perjurers were left behind; they even forbore from specific charges, but the general statement that He was a malefactor, was supported only by their reputation. "If He were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered Him up unto thee;" as much as to say, "You must take it for granted that He is guilty, or we would not say so. Here is our high priest; can it be supposed that such a gem of an individual would bring a false accusation? We also are the chief priests and the scribes and teachers of Israel; can it be imagined that persons of our station and sanctity could by any possibility have brought an innocent person before you to be condemned!"

I think I see the scornful glance of Pilate as he bade them judge Him themselves if that was their style of justice; as for him, he must hear an accusation or dismiss them to do their own pleasure if they dare. He knew that through envy they had brought Jesus unto him, and he loathed the hypocrites as he heard the wretched syllables sibilating from their sanctimonious lips.

I want to call your attention to this remarkable fact, that although this charge of being a malefactor was a grievous one, a trumped-up one, and unsustained by any evidence, yet by the Lord Jesus Christ. It was useless to deny it before the priests. He had already challenged them to find fault with His life, saying, "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them; behold, they know what I said."

IT WAS NEVER DENIED

His appeal had been unavailing, for it was as useless to argue with them as for a lamb to enter into controversy with a pack of wolves eager to devour. But there might have been some use, one would think, in His answering to Pilate, for Pilate was evidently very favorably impressed with his prisoner; and if the Saviour had deigned to give a full account of His life, and to prove that instead of being a malefactor He had gone about doing good, might He not have escaped?

The question that Pilate put, "What hast Thou done?" was one which Jesus might have grandly answered: "What have I done? I have fed the hungry, I have healed the sick, I have raised the fallen, I have restored the dead. What have I done? I have lived a self-sacrificing life, caring nothing for myself or my own honor. I have been the vindicator of God and the friend of man. What have I done? Certainly nothing wherefore they could put me to death, but everything why they should accept me as their Leader and their Saviour." We hear not a word of this. The exculpation would have been complete, but it was not spoken.

Yet further, our Lord willed that by being counted as a transgressor by Pilate He might die the death appointed for malefactors by the Roman law. If the Jews had put our Lord to death for blasphemy, it would have been by stoning; but then, none of the prophecies that went before concerning the Messiah spoke of His being dashed to the ground by stones. The death ordained for Him was crucifixion. John says in the eighteenth chapter at the thirty-second verse, "That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which He spake, signifying what death He should die." What was that saying? Is it not the saying in the twelfth chapter of John's gospel at the thirty-second verse, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This He said, signifying what death He should die." Being lifted up from the earth on the cross was a death which could only come from the Romans; the Jews, as I have said before, executed men by stoning; therefore He must be condemned by the Romans that His own words may be fulfilled.

When I think of that word "malefactor," another word leaps to my lips directly. Call Him not malefactor, but benefactor. What a benefactor must He be who in order to benefit us allows Himself to be branded as a "malefactor!" Only think that He who at this moment sits in the centre of adoring angels should have been called "malefactor;" that He from whose inexhaustible store of goodness all the saints in heaven and on earth are fed should yet be called "malefactor;" that He who never thought of harm to men, but whose very soul is love, whose every word and thought has been kindness towards this fallen race, should yet be called "malefactor." O earth, how couldst thou bear so grave a lie against the infinite goodness of the Son of God! And yet, forever blessed be His name, He does not hurl back the charge, for that would have been to ruin us. He meekly bears the scandal for our sakes.

Should not this sweeten every title of reproach that can ever fall upon us? What if they call us ill names! They called the Master of the house "malefactor," can they call us anything worse? Shall we look for honor where our Captain found nothing but shame? Wherefore let it be our glory to bear shame and reproach for Jesus's sake. So much for the first accusation.

II. Secondly, when the priests and scribes found that merely calling Him a malefactor was not sufficient, these wretched men changed their tactics, and, according to Luke, they charged Him with setting up to be

A KING.

They said that He wrought sedition, that He forbade to pay tribute unto Cæsar, and made Himself out to be a king. These were three great lies, for Jesus had preached peace, and not sedition; His example was submission, not rebellion; His spirit was that of a servant not that of a turbulent party leader. He had never said that men were not to pay tribute to Cæsar; on the contrary, He had said, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," and submitted Himself to every ordinance of authority. He had never in their sense set Himself up to be a king; if He had done so, many who were now His accusers might have been His partisans.

And please to notice that this charge of Christ being a king did not come from the governing power. When Pilate asked our Lord, "Art Thou the King of the Jews?" our Saviour wisely replied, "Sayest thou this of thyself, or did another tell thee of me? Have you any reason to think that I am a leader of sedition? As the governor of this nation you have to watch carefully, for the people are seditious; have you ever seen or heard anything of me that looks like an attack on your authority? Have you anything of your own knowledge that would lead you to bring a charge against me?"

Pilate, knowing nothing whatever against Him, and indeed scorning the idea that he knew anything about the Jewish people, whom he detested, replied haughtily, "Am I a Jew? Your own nation and your own rulers have brought this charge against you, not I." A great point was gained when Pilate said this; the charge was shown to be a mere invention, since the eagle eye of the Roman procurator had never seen the slightest ground for it.

It was a frivolous charge on the very face of it. How could that harmless, forsaken man be a peril to Cæsar? What had the Roman legions to fear from that solitary sufferer? He was too meek and pure to threaten warfare and strife in the domain of Tiberius. Look at Him, and realize the absurdity of the situation. Moreover, it would seem a strange thing that the Jewish people should bring before the Roman governor their own king. Is this the way that subjects treat their monarchs? If He be a leader of sedition He does not seem to have succeeded with His countrymen, for the heads of the people are seeking His death. There could be upon the face of it no chance of danger whatever from rebellion which was so summarily put down by the Jews themselves. If they had not been besotted by their rage, they would themselves have shrunk from so absurd a position.

But yet I want you to note very carefully that the Lord never denied this charge in the sense in which He chose to understand it. He first explained what He meant by His being a king, and when He had explained it then He openly confessed that it was even so.

First, I say, He explained what He meant by being a king, and notice carefully that He did not explain it away. He said, "My kingdom," and also when Pilate said, "Art Thou a king then?" He said, "Thou sayest that I am a king." He was there and then a real king, and He avowed it without reserve. We are constantly told that the kingdom of Christ is a spiritual kingdom, and this saying is true; but I would have you take heed that you do not spirit away.

HIS KINGDOM

as if it were only a pious dream. Spiritual or not, the kingdom of Christ on earth is real and powerful. It is real none the less, but all the more, because it may fitly be called spiritual.

You remember the remarkable saying which is attributed to Napoleon Bonaparte in his later days at St. Helena: "I have founded a kingdom by force, and it has passed away; but Jesus founded His empire upon love, and therefore it will last forever." Verily, Napoleon spoke the truth—Jesus, the right royal Jesus, is Master of innumerable hearts to-day. The world knoweth Him not, but yet He has a kingdom in it which shall ere long break in pieces all other kingdoms. True and loyal hearts are to be found among the sons of men, and in them His name still wakes enthusiasm, so that for Him they are prepared to live and die.

Our Lord is every inch a king, He has His throne of grace, has His sceptre of truth, His officers who, like Himself, witness to the truth, and His armies of warriors who wrestle not with flesh and blood, and use no carnal weapons, but yet go forth conquering and to conquer. Our Lord has His palace wherein He dwells, His chariot in which He rides, His revenues, though they be not treasures of gold and silver, and His proclamations, which are law in His church. His reigning power affects the destiny of the world at this present moment far more than the counsels of the five great Powers: by the preaching of the truth His servants shape the ages, and set up and cast down the thrones of earth. There is no prince so powerful as Jesus, and no empire so mighty as the kingdom of heaven.

Our Lord also said that His kingdom came not from this world; for that, I take it, is the more correct translation of the passage: "My kingdom is not of this world." It came not from this world; it is a substantial kingdom, but it did not spring from the same sources as the kingdoms of the world, neither is it supported, maintained, or increased by the same power as that which the kingdoms of the world depend upon. Christ's kingdom does not depend upon the force of arms; He would have His followers lay these weapons all aside.

Christ's kingdom does not depend, as earthly kingdoms too often do, upon craft, policy, and duplicity. It used to be said that an ambassador was a gentleman who was sent abroad to lie for the good of His country, and I fear it might still describe full many an ambassador. What is the science of diplomacy but the art of deceit? When statesmen are thoroughly honest, and are guided by principle, they are generally suspected, and an outcry is raised that the interests of the country will be sacrificed. But there is no diplomacy in Christ's rule; everything like crooked policy is of the devil, and not of Christ. He comes to bear witness to the truth, and it is by the truth, not by force nor by craft, that His throne is established among the sons of men, and therefore it is not from this world.

To be a king is indeed so little wrong in the sight of Jesus that it is the ultimate purpose of His coming to earth. He came to save men, did He not? Yes, but still He says, "For this purpose was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth;" which is another way of saying, "that I might be a king." This is His ultimatum. Christ is a teacher that He may be a king; Christ is an exemplar that He may be a king; Christ is a Saviour that He may be a king; this is the great end and object that He hath in His life, His death, His resurrection, and His second coming—that He may set up a kingdom among the sons of men to the glory of God. Oh that this great object of His mission might be furthered in our time, and consummated speedily in the long-promised age of gold.

Dear hearers, let each one of us ask himself, "Do I belong to His kingdom? Will I have this Man to reign over me? Do I desire to get rid of everything in myself that is not true? Am I anxious to put down around me everything that is false and wicked? Do I wish to uphold God's laws, for they are truth? Do I desire to spread the principles of love and kindness, for they are truth? Am I willing to learn, and so become the disciple of the greatest of all teachers; and then, am I willing to bear witness to what I have learned, and so spread the sway of truth? If so, then I am of His kingdom.

Poor Pilate, he did not understand our Lord, even as the men of this world understand not the kingdom of Christ. He said to Him, "What is truth?" and without waiting for a reply he went out to the Jews. Ah, brethren, let us never ourselves deny that Jesus is a king; but we shall deny it if we do not live according to His bidding. Oh, you that claim to be Christ's, but do not live according to Christ's laws, you practically deny that He is a king. I dread the men who say, "We believe, and therefore we are saved," and then do not live in holiness; for these divide our Lord's offices, setting up His priesthood and denying His kingship. Half a Christ is no Christ—a Christ who is a priest but never a king is not the Christ of God. Oh brethren, live as those who feel that every word of Jesus is law, and that you must do what He bids you, as He bids you, and because He bids you; and so let all men know that unto you Jesus is both Lord and God.

III. I conclude by noticing

THE ACQUITTAL

which Pilate gave to our Lord Jesus. He had heard the charge of being a malefactor, to which the prisoner pleaded nothing; he had heard the charge of His being a king, which the prisoner had most satisfactorily explained; and now Pilate coming out to the people said, "I find in Him no fault at all." Pilate, thou hast well spoken. Thy verdict is typical of the verdict of all who have ever examined Christ. Some have examined Him with an unfriendly eye, but in proportion as they have been candid in the observation of facts, they have been struck with His life and spirit. It is a very rare thing to hear even the infidel rail at the character of Jesus; in fact, some of the foremost sceptics as to our Lord's teaching have been remarkably impressed with admiration of His life.

Let me add that this verdict of Pilate is the verdict of all that have ever associated with Christ. One disciple who was with Christ betrayed Him, but He spoke nothing against Him. Nay, the last witness of Judas before he hanged himself was this: "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." If there had been a fault in Jesus, the traitor would have spied it out; his unquiet conscience would have been glad enough to find therein a sedative, but even he was compelled to say, "I have betrayed the innocent blood."

Some of us have lived with Christ spiritually. In the course of His providence He has brought some of us very low by sickness, or by bereavement, or loss. Every one saved by our Lord has come under the discipline of His house, for "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." Now, what is the verdict of all here present who know Jesus, our king? For my part, I find no fault at all in Him. He is everything that is lovely. He is all my salvation and all my desire.

Do you not think that out of the millions of Christians who have lived hoping in Christ some one would have told us if it is His habit to disappoint His people? Out of so many believers who dwell with Him surely some one or other of them, when they came to die, would have told us if He is not all that He professes to be. Would not some one or other have confessed, "I trusted in Christ and He has not delivered me; it is all a delusion? He cannot save, He cannot help, He cannot deliver." But never one dying believer throughout the ages has spoken ill of Him, but all have said, "We find no fault at all in Him."

Mark you, that will be the verdict of every one among you all. If any of you reject Christ, when you shall stand at His judgment-seat to be condemned because you believe not on Him, and when that withering word, "Depart, ye cursed!" shall consign you to your everlasting portion, you shall then be obliged to say, "I find no fault at all in Him." There was no failure in His blood, the failure was in my want of faith; no failure in His Spirit—the failure was in my obstinate will; no failure in His promise—the failure was that I would not receive Him; there was no fault at all in Him. He never spurned me. He never refused to hear my prayers. From all parts of creation shall go up one general attestation to His perfection. Heaven and earth and hell shall all join the common verdict, "We find no fault at all in Him."

I will send you away when I give you to think of. The first is this: Beware of an external religion, for the men that called Jesus malefactor and falsely accused Him were very religious people, and would not go into Pilate's hall for fear of polluting themselves. They were strong in rituals, but weak in morals. None are so inveterate against the principles of the Gospel as those whose religion consists in form and ceremony but does not affect their hearts. I charge you rend your hearts and not your garments. Follow Christ spiritually; follow Christ in your very souls, or else sacraments will be your ruin, and even in trying to keep yourselves from ceremonial defilement you will be defiling yourselves with hypocrisy.

THREE PRACTICAL WORDS

The next thing is to charge you, dear friends, and to charge myself also, to shun all proud worldliness like that of Pilate. Pilate treats the whole matter cavalierly; he is a proud and haughty Roman; he hates the people whom he governs, and though he has a conscience, and at the first he shows a tenderness toward his prisoner, yet his chief end and aim was to keep his office and amass money, and therefore innocent blood must be spilt. He must please the Jews, even if he murder the "Just One." This selfish worldliness in which a man makes his gold and himself his god always treats religion with contempt. The man minds the main chance, and sneeringly cries, "What is truth?" He knows what money is and what power is, but what is truth? It is a dream, a folly to him, and he despises it.

There are persons around us now, clever time-serving men, with grand notions of their own abilities, and to them Jesus and His Gospel are matters for old women, servant girls, and what they call a Puritan crew. Such topics are not for gentlemen of thought, culture, and understanding, like their high and mighty selves. "What is truth?" say they. They are rather favorably inclined to religion; that is to say, they do not persecute, but they despise, which in some respects is worse. They say, "We are agnostics"; we have no particular views; we are large-hearted, and let every man think as he chooses, but still there is nothing in it; it is all matter of opinion.

"For differing creeds let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

This is this great man's conclusion of the matter, and yet it so happens that this gentleman's life is not in the right at all, and therefore on his own showing he has not much joy of his pretty rhyme. I think I see him as he turns on his heel with, "What is truth?" Let him be a warning to you. Come not near to such arrogant trifling.

Last of all, let us all submit ourselves to Jesus our King. Wayworn and weary, emaciated and broken down, with His face more marred than that of any man, yet let us bow before Him and say, "All hail, Thou King of the Jews! Thou art our King forever and ever." If we are willing thus to acknowledge Him as our King in His shame and derision He will by-and-by honor us when He cometh in the glory of the Father, and all His holy angels with Him. Then shall He cause it to be seen that He hath made us who follow Him to be kings and priests unto God, and we shall reign with Him forever and ever. Amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

Esquimaux Spearing Wild Ducks.

Ploughing with an Elephant in India.

ESQUIMAUX SPEARING WILD DUCKS.

TRAVELLERS in Greenland describe the hunting of the wild duck, conducted as it is after the ancient fashion depicted above, as one of the most exciting and interesting pursuits. The Esquimaux seem to have the agility of goats, and when in search of game they climb to places which appear to the unaccustomed eye of the traveller as wholly inaccessible. There standing on ledges covered with ice they poise themselves so securely that they can use the unwieldy spears with which they strike their game. These spears, or harpoons, are all constructed on a most ingenious plan. One of them—the bird spear—used in such places as the one here depicted, has several supplementary points projecting from both sides, so that if they should miss the bird with the main point they have a chance of striking it by a supplementary one. An inflated bladder is sometimes attached to the end of the spear to relieve the weight of the spear and to assist them in their work.

Greenland, with a climate cold and cheerless beyond measure, and a soil sterile almost as the flinty rock, was the last place where one would have thought European missionaries would have planted themselves. But to these dreary regions the devoted Hans Egede went in 1721, and labored with a moral heroism worthy of all honor. He was followed several years afterwards by the self-denying Moravian missionaries, whose praise is in all the churches. Unpromising as were the materials on which they had to operate, a pleasing measure of success has been achieved, over which all friends of missions rejoice. The "Brethren" will not be in much danger of competition in their arduous work, but other Christian communities who may not be able to send forth laborers to share in their toil and sufferings, may sustain them by their sympathy, prayers, and contributions.

The unevangelized Greenlanders are said to live in a perfect atmosphere of gods. In every wind that blows he hears spirits; in the darkness of the night their whispers reach him; every animal has its guardian angel; the aurora as it lights up the snow is supposed to be the spirits of the dead fighting in the air. Their heaven is "a something better than this world, a region where men revel in plenty of land-ice, with seals and reindeer in abundance, where blubber never fails, and hunger is unknown."

How much, therefore, do these hardy dwellers in the icy regions of the north need the labors of zealous missionaries who will, despite the difficulties of the work, carry to them the good news of salvation through Christ.

A STRICKEN FATHER'S STRUGGLE.

"I CANNOT, will not spare you," said a father as he stood beside the dying bed of his only daughter. He was wealthy and had summoned the most eminent physicians he knew to prescribe for his beloved child. They had consulted and had done all they could for her, but without avail. The terrible words had been spoken, "We can do no more; she will die. There is no hope."

To the patient herself the fiat was not so overwhelming as to her father. She would like to have lived, for life seemed very bright before her. Her father's love, and his riches had made her lot a pleasant one and it seemed hard to leave it. Beside that he was a widower, and she knew that when she was laid in the tomb his heart would be desolate. She had no fear of the future for herself. She had given her heart to the Saviour and trusted in Him for eternal life. The nurse who attended her in her illness had been her attendant from the day when a mother's death left her a helpless orphaned infant. She was a good Christian woman, and her prayers day and night had been for the conversion of her charge; and they had been answered. She stood now just outside the door, not wishing to disturb this sad interview between father and daughter.

Such an inward struggle as was going on in that man's breast was hard to witness, and it was the more acute because he rejected the only comfort that could have served him in his dire need. He rebelled against God and called this act of His Providence a cruel one. But after many days, during which he never left the sick room, his heart was softened. It seemed as if God granted to His dying child special power of intercession. Her one prayer was not for herself but for her father, and her constant petition that this heavy trouble might open his heart to the truth. Her prayer, was answered. On the morning of the day on which she died she had the happiness of hearing from her father's lips the words: "Not my will, O Lord, but Thine be done;" "no sound could have been more welcome to her ears, for she knew that a heart so softened into acquiescence would surely be given to the Lord. It was so. Before his daughter's corpse was consigned to the tomb he had the assurance that he was accepted in the beloved, and rejoiced in hope of a reunion in the land beyond the grave.

ELEPHANTS AND THEIR WAYS.

OUR acquaintance with these unwieldy animals is confined to visits to menageries. In Northern India it is not uncommon to see them engaged in useful occupations and not as mere exhibitions. A missionary travelling in the outlying districts of India on the back of an elephant is not an unusual sight. For although the elephant is heavy and unwieldy, sometimes weighing six or seven thousand pounds, he is, nevertheless, as Bernier says, "sure-footed, feeling his way when the road is difficult and dangerous, taking a firm hold by one foot before moving another."

A native Rajah now and then comes into Calcutta upon some mission to the British authorities, riding in a magnificent howdah, with his elephant covered with brilliant trappings; but generally this stately animal is used for the conveyance of the manifold servants who wait upon the rich in India; or he is laden with tents and tent-poles, or with water-bottles, pots, saucepans, and every other paraphernalia of the kitchen, slung about his body in all directions. His appearance then is somewhat more ludicrous than dignified.

As seen in the accompanying picture, the elephant is often trained to agricultural purposes. Its great strength is of much value in ploughing, at which work it is able to accomplish more than a large team of oxen or horses.

An elephant's love for his home and his mate has within the last few days involved a lawsuit. Mr. P. T. Barnum, the well-known American showman, purchased from the Trustees of the Zoological Gardens in London about a month ago

"JUMBO," the great African elephant, for $10,000. The New York Herald thus describes what followed: "The agents arrived and constructed a large box in which to convey the elephant to Millwall Docks, his passage having been taken in the Persian Monarch. The trolley which carried the box had to be sunk into the ground so that the elephant could walk into it. This, however, he declined to do. Ultimately his fore legs were got to the front of the box, but he would not enter further. He was from time to time walked about and led and re-led to the box, but without any influence on his determination. This was on Saturday evening, and as the elephant had to be on board the Persian Monarch next morning the tactics were changed.

"At midnight eight horses were ordered to take the trolley and box to Millwall Docks, where they were to be left under the crane. The elephant was to be made to walk to the steamer, and then it was hoped, being tired after his march, he would enter the box for rest. As soon, however, as the elephant got into the road he refused to proceed, and lay down. Then came one of the most pathetic scenes in which a 'dumb' animal was ever the chief actor. The poor brute moaned sadly and appealed in all but human words to his keeper, embracing the man with his trunk, and actually kneeling before him. Jumbo's cries were soon heard in the elephant house, where poor Alice, his 'little wife,' as she is called, was seized with alarm and grief, so that every note of sorrow from the kneeling elephant in the road had its response within the gardens.

"At sound of Alice's increasing lamentations Jumbo became almost frantic and flung himself down on his side. All who knew the beast were by this time convinced that, even could he be persuaded to march a little distance, some new alarm would again arrest his progress, perhaps at a more inconvenient stage of the road. Jumbo, having risen from the roadway, accompanied his keeper willingly back to the elephant house, where on his return the joy of Alice knew no bounds, her delight being expressed by clumsy gambols round her compartment."

Many English visitors to the gardens begged that the elephant might be permitted to remain, and Mr. Barnum was asked by cable if he would forego his bargain. He, however, having bought the animal declined to give him up. So pertinacious was the opposition to the removal taking place that an application was made to Chancery, and an injunction delaying his removal was obtained.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.
A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 159.)

Taking Orders.

FELICITA's pale face and closed eyes, the expression of unutterable perplexity and anguish in her knitted brows and quivering lips, filled Felix with wonder and grief. He had risen from his kneeling posture at her feet, and now he drew her beloved head on to his breast, and held her in a firm and loving grasp.

A Stricken Father's Agony.

"I would not grieve or pain you for worlds," he said falteringly, "nor would Alice. I love you better than myself; as much as I love her. We will talk of it another day, mother."

She pressed close to him, and he felt her arms strained about him as if she could not hold him near enough to her heart. It seemed to him as if she was striving to draw him into the very heart of her motherhood; but she knew how deep the gulf was between her and him, and shuddered at her own loneliness.

"It is losing you, my son," she whispered with her quivering lips.

"No, no," he said eagerly; "it is not losing me, but finding another child. Don't take a gloomy view of it, mother. I shall be as happy as my father was with you."

He could not keep himself from thinking of his father, or of speaking of him. He understood more perfectly now what his father's worship of his mother had been; the tenderness of a stronger being towards a weaker one, blended with the chivalrous homage of a generous nature to the one woman chosen to represent all womanhood. There was a keener trouble to him to-night, than before, in the thought that his mother was a widow.

"Leave me now, Felix," she said, loosing him from her close embrace, and shutting her eyes from the sight of him. "Do not let any one come to me again to-night. I must be alone."

But when she was alone it was only to let her thoughts whirl round and round in one monotonous circle. If Roland was dead her secret was safe, and Felix might be happy. If he was not dead, Felix must not marry Alice Pascal. There had been an unconscious and vague feeling in her heart that her son loved her too passionately to be easily pleased by any girl; and, almost unawares to herself, she had been in the habit of comparing her own attractions and loveliness with those of the younger women who crossed his path. There was no personal vanity in the calm conviction she possessed that Felix had never seen a woman more beautiful and fascinating than the mother he had always admired with so much enthusiasm.

When the morning came, and Canon Pascal made his appearance, Felicitia received him in her library, apparently composed, but grave and almost stern in her manner. They were old friends; but the friendship on his side was warm and genial, while on hers it was cold and reserved. He lost no time in beginning on the subject which had brought him to her.

"My dear Felicitia," he said, "Felix tells me he had some talk with you last night. What do you think of our young people?"

"What does Alice say?" she asked.

"Oh, Alice!" he answered in an amused yet tender tone; "she would be of one mind with Felix. There is something beautiful in the innocent, unworldly love of children like these, who are ready to built a nest under any eaves. Felicitia, you do not disapprove of it?"

"I cannot disapprove of Alice," she replied gloomily; "but I do disapprove of Felix marrying so young. A man should not marry under thirty."

"Thirty!" echoed Canon Pascal; "that would be in seven years. It is a long time; but if they do not object I should not. I'm in no hurry to lose my daughter. But they will not wait so long."

"Do not let them be engaged yet," she said in hurried and sad tones. "They may see others whom they would love more. Early marriages and long engagements are both bad. Tell them from me that it is better for them to be free a while longer, till they know themselves and the world better. I would rather Felix and Hilda never married. When I see Phebe so free from all the gnawing cares and anxieties of this life, and so joyous in her freedom, I wish to heaven I could have had a single life like hers."

"Why! Felicitia!" he exclaimed; "this is morbid. You have never forgiven God for taking away your husband. You have been keeping a grudge against Him all these years of your widowhood."

"No, no!" she interrupted; "it is not that. They married me too soon, my uncle and Mr. Sefton. I never loved Roland as I ought. Oh! if I had loved him, how different my life would have been, and his!"

Her voice faltered and broke into deep sobs, which cut off all further speech. For a few minutes Canon Pascal endeavored to reason with her and comfort her, but in vain. At length he quietly went away and sent Phebe to her. There could be no more discussion of the subject for the present.

The darkness that had dwelt so long in the heart of Felicitia began now to cast its gloom over the whole household. A sharp attack of illness, which followed immediately upon her great and inexplicable agitation, caused great consternation to her friends, and above all to Felix.

All further mention of his love for Alice was out of the question now for Felix. Bitter as silence was, it was imperative; for as long as his mother's objections and prejudices were not overcome, Canon Pascal would not hear of any closer tie than that which already existed being formed between the young people. He had, however, the comfort of believing that Alice had heard so much of what had passed from her mother, as that she knew he loved her, and had owned his love to her father. There was a subtle change in her manner towards him; she was more silent in his presence, and there was a tremulous tone in her voice at times when she spoke to him, yet she lingered beside him, and listened more closely to all he had to say; and when they left Westminster to return to their country rectory the tears glistened in her eyes as they had never done before when he bade her good-bye.

"Come and see us as soon as it will not vex your mother, my boy," said Canon Pascal; "you may always think of our home as your home."

The only person who was not perplexed by Felicita's inexplicable conduct and her illness, was Phebe Marlowe, who believed that she knew the cause, and was drawn closer to her in the deepest sympathy and pity. It seemed to Phebe that Felicita was creating the obstacle, which existed chiefly in her fancy; and with her usual frankness and directness she went to Canon Pascal's abode in the Cloisters at Westminster, to tell him simply what she thought.

"I want to ask you," she said, with her clear, honest gaze fastened on his face, "if you know why Mrs. Sefton left Riversborough thirteen years ago?"

"Partly," he answered; "my wife is a Riversford, you know, Felicita's second or third cousin. There was some painful suspicion attaching to Roland Sefton."

"Yes," answered Phebe sadly.

"Was it not quite cleared up?" asked Canon Pascal.

Phebe shook her head.

"We heard," he went on, "that it was believed Roland Sefton's confidential clerk was the actual culprit; and Sefton himself was only guilty of negligence. Mr. Clifford himself told Lord Riversford that Sefton was gone away on a long holiday, and might not be back for months; and something of the same kind was put forth in a circular issued from the Old Bank. I had one sent to me; for some little business of my wife's was in the hands of the firm. I recollect thinking it was an odd affair, but it passed out of my mind; and the poor fellow's death quite obliterated all accusing surmises against him."

"That is the scruple in Felicita's mind," said Phebe in a sorrowful tone; "she feels that you ought to know everything before you consent to Alice marrying Felix, and she cannot bring herself to speak of it."

"But how morbid that is!" he answered; "as if I did not know Felix, every thought of him, and every motion of his soul! His father was a careless, negligent man. He was nothing worse, was he, Phebe?"

"He was the best friend I ever had," she answered earnestly, though her face grew pale, and her eyelids drooped, "I owe all I am to him. But it was not Acton who was guilty. It was Felix and Hilda's father."

"And Felicita knew it?" he exclaimed.

"She knew nothing about it until I told her," answered Phebe. "Roland Sefton came to me when he was trying to escape out of the country, and my father and I helped him to get away. He told me all; and oh! he was not so much to blame as you might think. But he was guilty of the crime; and if he had been taken he would have been sent to jail. I would have died sooner than let him be taken to jail."

"If I had only known this from the beginning!" said Canon Pascal.

"What would you have done?" asked Phebe eagerly. "Would you have refused to take Felix into your home? He has done no wrong. Hilda has done no wrong. There would have been disgrace and shame for them if their father had been sent to jail; but his death saved them from all danger of that. Nobody would ever speak a word against Roland Sefton now. Yet this is what is preying on Felicita's mind. If she was sure you knew all, and still consented to Felix marrying Alice, she would be at peace again. And I too think you ought to know all. But you will not visit the sins of the father upon the son—"

"Divine providence does so," he interrupted; "if the fathers eat sour grapes the teeth of the sons are set on edge. Phebe, Phebe, that is only too true."

"But Roland's death set the children free from the curse," answered Phebe, weeping. "If he had been arrested, they would have gone away to some foreign land where they were not known; or even if he had not died, we must have done differently from what we have done. But there is no one now to bring this condemnation against them. Even old Mr. Clifford has more than forgiven Roland; and if possible would have the time over again, that he might act so as to reinstate him in his position. No one in the world bears a grudge against Roland."

"I'm not hard-hearted, God knows," he answered, "but no man likes to give his child to the son of a felon, convicted or unconvicted."

"Then I have done harm by telling you," said Phebe.

"No, no; you have done rightly," he replied, "it was good for me to know the truth. We will let things be for awhile. And yet," he added, his grave, stern face softening a little, "if it would be good for Felicita, tell her that I know all, and that after a battle or two with myself, I am sure to yield. I could not see Alice unhappy; and that had holds her heart in his hands. After all she too must bear her part in the sins of the world."

But though Phebe watched for an opportunity for telling Felicita what she had done, no chance came. If Felicita had been reserved before, she enclosed herself in almost unbroken silence now. During her illness she had been on the verge of delirium; and then she had shut her lips with a stern determination, which even her weak and fevered brain could not betray. She had once begged Phebe, if she grew really delirious, to dismiss all other attendants, so that no ear but hers might hear her wanderings; but this emergency had not arisen. And since then she had sunk more and more into a stern silence.

Felix had left home, and entered into his lodgings, taking his father's portrait with him. He was not so far from home but that he either visited it, or received visitors from it, almost every day. His mother's illness troubled him; or otherwise the change in his life, his first step in independent manhood, would have been one of great happiness to him. He did not feel any deep misgivings as to Alice, and the blessedness of the future with her; and in the meantime, while he was waiting, there was his work to do.

He had taken orders, not from ambition or any hope of worldly gain, those lay quite apart from the part he had chosen, but from the simple desire of fighting as best he might against the growing vices and miseries of civilization. Step for step with the ever-increasing luxury of the rich he saw marching beside it the gaunt degradation of the poor. The life of refined self-indulgence in the one class was caricatured by a loathsome self-indulgence in the other. On the one hand he saw, young as he was, something of the languor and weariness of life of those who have nothing to do, and from satiety have little to hope or to fear; and on the other the ignorance and want which deprived both mind and body of all healthful activity, and in the pressure of utter need left but little scope for hope or fear. He fancied that such civilization sank its victims into deeper depths of misery than those of barbarism.

Before him seemed to lie a huge, weltering mass of slime, a very quagmire of foulness and miasma, in the depths and darkness of which he could dimly discern the innumerable coils of a deadly dragon, breathing forth poison and death into the air, which those beloved of God and himself must breathe, and crushing in its pestilential folds the bodies and souls of immortal men. He was one of the young

St. Michaels called by God to give combat to that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan, which was deceiving the whole world.

(To be continued.)

A COMING WONDER.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 159.)

Dr. Bonar's Exposition—The Time of Unequalled Tribulation—A French National Decree—Napoleon's Successor—The Division of the Roman Earth—The Legs of Daniel's Image—Dr. Brooks on the Elements of Interpretation—Napoleon and the Jews—Alison's Account of the Sanhedrim—Jewish Writers on the Event—Dr. Kellsall's Views.

DR. ANDREW BONAR thus continues his observations: "The last half of the seven years, when the covenant has been broken, are the times of the unequalled tribulation, of which so much is said in Scripture. God has mercifully shortened those days, and told His people in every different mode of expressing it what the limit is; viz. 'the midst of the week, or hebdomad of seven years, that is, three years and a half;' the '1260 days;' the '42 months;' the 'time, times, and half a time;'† all expressing exactly the same duration, and all, if taken with the context, pointing distinctly to the same dreadful period." "During it God will raise up Two Witnesses, doubtless individual men from what is said of them, whom he will miraculously protect during the three and a half years of their testimony, inasmuch as he has never left himself without a witness on the earth." (Daniel 7: 25; 9: 27; 12: 7; Rev. 11: 2, 3; 12: 6, 14; 13: 5; Acts 14: 17.)

"In France, before the revolution of 1793, a well-known 'falling away' or 'apostasy' occurred following upon the doctrines taught by Voltaire, when a national decree was passed that death was a perpetual sleep. The scenes of the Reign of Terror which followed, showed what man will dare to do if left to himself, and called forth Napoleon Bonaparte, who showed the features of the Antichrist, flattering at first the system he found prevailing, while using it all the while to establish himself in power. . . . So the Antichrist will not at his first appearance shock the prejudices of those whose faith he at last overthrows, for he is to come in 'by flatteries.' (Dan. 11: 21.)

"In France Napoleon Bonaparte was a Roman Catholic, and in Egypt a worshipper of Mahomet, till finding himself, as by and by Antichrist will do, fairly established in power, he dropped the deception under which he had entered, proclaiming himself the monarch and only source of authority. 'La France! c'est moi,' was the laconic way in which he announced it. What may be raised up to accomplish is yet to be seen, but already the tendency is clearly toward a still more extensive development of the clay-iron principle of government which is to prevail in both feet of the image, before the ten toes of it are developed. Such an instance as this, should cause us to ponder well, when we read of a still future and more fearful 'falling away', which to distinguish it from others, in the original is styled emphatically 'the apostasy,' (ἡ ἀποστασία,) 2 Thess. 2: 3, with the revealing after or out of it of 'that man of sin, the son of perdition, who will oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.'

THE SUCCESSOR TO HIS NAME

"We are told in Daniel 7: 24, that the ten horns out of this kingdom (the Roman Empire) are ten kings that shall arise, and another (the little horn) shall rise after them. The ten kingdoms must therefore appear before Antichrist, inasmuch as he rises after them. . . . The remarkable division of the Roman earth into ten kingdoms has not yet taken place, and the Antichrist, who rises after them, is of necessity future also. The limits of the Roman earth are sufficiently known to all; and no division of it, which does not include the whole, can be said to have fulfilled its division into the ten foes or kingdoms predicted at the time of the end. The iron legs of Daniel's prophetic image (Dan. 2 : 31-45) mean the Eastern and Western divisions of the Roman Empire, and the Eastern embraces the portion most important in Bible history, namely, the Holy Land, Syria, Egypt, Turkey and Greece. . . . In Daniel 7 Antichrist is foreshown rising out of the ten kingdoms into which the Roman Empire will then have been divided, while in Daniel 8 he is shown as rising out of the four horns* or kingdoms into which the Grecian Empire was divided under Alexander the Great's generals (namely Greece, Turkey, Syria, and Egypt). In this there is no discrepancy, for the Roman Empire received its most valuable additions from the territories which it wrested from those successors of Alexander; all therefore will be accomplished should Antichrist rise out of the Grecian portion of the Roman earth in the latter time of their kingdom when the transgressors are come to the full (Dan. 8 : 23)."

* An extract from "Forty Coming Wonders," By Rev. M. Baxter. Obtainable from the American News Company and all Booksellers. Price, 7s.

† Rev. 11: 2, 3; 12: 6, 14, 13: 5; Dan. 7: 25; 12: 7.

The Rev. J. Brooks, a learned expositor, states, in his Elements of Prophetic Interpretation, that "The Fathers of antiquity, who, at least, were acquainted with the earlier traditions of the church on the subject, thought that the Jews would be restored to Palestine in an unconverted state by means of human policy, and that they would be the first to declare for Antichrist, who would, in the first instance, rebuild the city and temple of Jerusalem, and then cajole them by flatteries, and impose upon them by spurious miracles, and that the Jews will deceive themselves with the hope that the kingdom of Israel will be restored by his means to its former splendor."

"In regard to the numerous promises of Scripture, which have given rise to the expectation that the posterity of Abraham, according to the flesh, shall be restored in their national character, as Jews or Israelites, to the land of their forefathers, with scarcely any exception, the eminent Fathers and expositors of the church have interpreted these prophecies as having respect to a literal or national restoration."

The prospect of some Napoleon taking the Jews under his patronage, and helping them to recover possession of their long-lost fatherland, is rendered the more probable from the example set by Napoleon I., who, in May, 1806, issued a decree for a Convention of Jewish Deputies to meet at Paris in the following July. It was decided at this Convention, at the emperor's suggestion, that a Grand Sanhedrim should assemble in Paris, on February 9th, 1807. The proposed Sanhedrim was held, and the Deputies left Paris in the following June, 1807, after 1800 francs—about $360 sterling—had been paid to each of them for their expenses by the Minister of the Interior. The terms of their relief from many civil disabilities were settled, and important rights and privileges were granted to them, not only in France, but in other places as well, as, for instance, in Frankfurt, where, until August, 1806, they were confined to the most unhealthy and unclean quarter of the city, and a notice was fixed in the public gardens and walks of the city, "Jews and swine are not admitted here."

THE SANHEDRIM.

The historian Alison thus refers to this convention in his "History of Europe" (vol. vii. p. 494, and vol. x. p. 418):

"Early in March, 1807, a grand convocation of the Jews assembled in Paris, in pursuance of the commands of Napoleon, issued in the July preceding. Seventy-one doctors and chiefs of that ancient nation attended this great assembly, the first meeting of the kind which had occurred since the dispersion of the Israelites on the capture of Jerusalem. For 1700 years the children of Israel had sojourned as strangers in foreign realms; reviled, oppressed, persecuted, without a capital, without a government, without a home, far from the tombs of their forefathers, banished from the land of their ancestors; but preserving unimpaired amid all their calamities, their traditions, their usages, their faith; exhibiting in every nation of the earth a lasting miracle to attest the verity of the Christian prophecies."

"On this occasion, the great Sanhedrim, or assembly, published the results of their deliberations in a variety of statutes and declarations, calculated to remove from the Israelites a portion of that odium under which they had so long labored in all the nations of Christendom; and Napoleon, in return, took them under his protection, and, under certain modifications, admitted them to the privileges of his empire."

"This first approach to a reunion and settlement of the Jews, impossible under any other circumstances but the rule of so great a conqueror as Napoleon, is very remarkable. The immediate cause of it, doubtless, was the desire of the emperor to secure the support of so numerous and opulent a body as the Jews of Old Prussia, Poland, and the southern provinces of Russia, which was of great importance in the contest in which he was engaged; but it is impossible not to see in its result a step in the development of Christian prophecy. And thus, from the mysterious manner in which the wisdom of Providence makes the wickedness and passions of men to work out its great designs for the government of human affairs, did the French Revolution, which, nursed in infidelity and crime, set out with the abolition of Christian worship, and the open denial of God by a whole nation, in its secondary results lead to the first great step which had occurred in modern Europe to the reassembling of the Jews, so early foretold by our Saviour."

"And it will appear, in the sequel, that in its ultimate effects it is destined, to all human appearance, by the irresistible strength which it has given to the British navy, and the vast impulse which it has communicated to the Russian army, to lead to the wresting of Jerusalem from the hands of the infidels, and the spread of the Christian faith alike over the forests of the New and the deserts of the Old World."

"The Jews, that peculiar people, whose fate is bound up by supreme agency, alike with the last as the first ages of the world, have risen in the last times to extraordinary power and importance. Already their interests, as the great capitalists of nations, rule the internal policy of England, under the specious guise of free trade, and a safe currency; their influence, as the bankers of government, is felt in every capital of Europe; and their power, constantly increasing with the augmentation of wealth, is everywhere, in modern Europe, for good or for evil, substituting, as in ancient Rome, the influence of accumulated riches for the old aristocracy of the land."

In a book published in 1807, called "Causes and Consequences of the French Emperor's Conduct towards the Jews," full particulars are given of this Sanhedrim in Paris in 1807. Its writer states, "It cannot be concealed that the Jews of this Sanhedrim acknowledge the Head of the French Government as their Deliverer and the Great Prince predicted in the sacred writings, and they have shown a disposition to persuade themselves that he is the promised Messiah predicted by the ancient prophets." A noted Jewish writer, M. Jacobsohn, in his Letter to the French Emperor at that time, said, "I belong to that people who expected in you their Saviour, and who in you, Sire, have found him."

A. M. Crouzet wrote a metrical translation of the second Psalm, making it a panegyric upon the emperor. And in the Jewish festival, on August 15th, 1806, the cyphers of Napoleon and Josephine were blended with the letters expressing the name of Jehovah, and the imperial eagle was placed over the Sacred Ark, which is said to have given offence to some, as a profanation. At the same period a pamphlet appeared in Paris, and was advertised in the Moniteur, Who is this (meaning the emperor) but an Israelitish Christian? The speeches of some of the Deputies to the Sanhedrim were in the highest degree adulatory to Napoleon I., and foreshadowed the eulogies which will be expressed regarding the coming Napoleon when he shall enter into a covenant with the Jews for seven years to promote their resettlement in Palestine.

DR. HENRY KELSALL,

in his book "The Antichrist," published in 1846, observed upon Daniel 8:

"Alexander the Great fulfilled the prophecy of the notable horn on the head of the He Goat—the Grecian Empire—in Daniel 8 : 5. 6. 7. 21, and four kingdoms arose out of his conquests, none of which were governed by his posterity; for 1. Ptolemy became King of Egypt and Judea; 2. Seleucus King of Syria; 3. Lysimachus King of Thrace and Bithynia; 4. Cassander King of Macedonia and Greece. This quadruple or fourfold division of Alexander's Grecian Empire, as predicted by the four horns on the goat in Daniel 8 : 8, 22, corresponds with the four-winged leopard of Daniel 7 : 6, and so far the two visions are parallel; but in chapter 8 Daniel, after describing the Grecian Empire, passes entirely over the fourth beast with ten horns of chapter 7, the Roman Empire, which succeeded the Grecian Empire; and abruptly proceeds to speak of the 'Time of the End.' Here therefore there is a break or chasm in the thread of the prophecy which has continued from the time of the fourfold division of the Grecian Empire up to the present year 1845."

"At verses 9 and 23 the thread of prophecy is resumed with the prediction of things which will occur in Jerusalem at the 'Time of the End' (verse 9). 'And out of one of them (the four horns) came forth a little horn, which waxed exceedingly great toward the South and toward the East and toward the pleasant land,' etc. (verses 22-3). Now the great horn being broken, whereas four horns stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance and understanding such sentences (the little horn) shall stand up, etc."

"This 'little horn' is here described as arising out of one of the four horns of the Grecian Empire. This limits the place of his first appearance to the Eastern Limb of the Roman Empire. The quadruply divided Grecian Empire was included territorially in the Roman Empire, and when the final settlement of the latter into ten kingdoms takes place, the four ancient Grecian kingdoms, viz., 1. Egypt with Judea; 2. Syria; 3. Thrace and Bithynia; 4. Macedonia and Greece, will most likely be restored and make four of the ten. Out of one of these four kingdoms Antichrist will arise as a little horn, and not from any part of the Roman Empire, which extended beyond the limits of Alexander's Grecian Empire."

"This little horn in Daniel 8, where his connection with the Jews and Jerusalem is detailed, is the same as the little horn in Daniel 7, which describes his connection with the wide scope of the Gentile prophecies in these words: 'The ten horns are ten kings which shall arise, and another (the little horn) shall arise after them and shall subdue three kings' (Dan. 7 : 24). These are ten co-existing kingdoms. When the tenfold division of the Roman earth shall have been finally settled, then Antichrist shall make his appearance (as a horn or sovereign) among the ten kingdoms."

"Ireland was never brought within the limits of the Roman Empire and probably does not come within the scope of the prophecy. The present course of events in that Island indicates that its separation from England may hereafter take place."

"Belgium was within the limits of the Roman earth; the principal part of Holland was not, and in 1832 they were separated. The restoration of the kingdom of Greece in 1827 is also worthy of observation. It seems as if the ten kingdoms were gradually developing themselves. . . . The ten toes of the image seen in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which are partly of iron and partly of clay, signify that the Roman Empire will be divided into ten kingdoms; the clay-iron denotes a heterogeneous mixture of strength and weakness, i.e. kingly power combined with democratic opposition to that power—monarchs limited as to the exercise of their power by the will of the people."

* That "a horn" in the days of Babylon was used as the emblem of kingly rank may be witnessed in the Nineveh sculptures in the British Museum, where the "horns" on their head-dress or caps are seen distinctly denoting the monarch from his attendants.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

MacLean, the Man who Attempted to Assassinate the Queen of England, has been charged with high treason and remanded for trial. The solicitor of his family writes that he possesses certificates of eminent physicians of the existence of mental aberration in the prisoner of long standing, and that he has no hesitation in saying that there will be no difficulty in establishing the fact of his insanity. He adds that the prisoner is the same person who attempted to wreck a railway train in 1874, and that he was formerly confined in the Wells Asylum. He has also been identified as a man who, last summer, frequented the vicinity of Windsor Castle and acted in a suspicious manner. The Queen's private secretary has written the following note to our Minister in London in reply to the message Mr. Lowell forwarded her from Secretary Frelinghuysen: "Dear Mr. Lowell: I received your telegram to-day and gave it to the Queen, who was very much touched by the kind feeling shown. I felt that the expression of one nation to another was rather too important for me to answer, and therefore gave it to Lord Granville with the Queen's request that he would convey her most hearty thanks for this telegram." Lord Granville's letter was as follows: "My dear Mr. Lowell: I have just received a message from the Queen desiring me to convey Her Majesty's acknowledgments for the congratulations you offered on behalf of the President and people of the United States and to express her hearty thanks for the kind feeling manifested toward Her Majesty. Yours very sincerely, GRANVILLE."

A New King has been Added to the European family of monarchs. The principality of Servia, carved out of the territories of Turkey by the Berlin Congress, has been made into a kingdom, and its ruler, Prince Milan, proclaimed king under the title of Milan I. The elevation is looked upon in Europe as an omen of future trouble. The king is a protégé of Austria, while a large part of his subjects are the friends of Russia. This latter party was opposed to the proclamation of Milan as a king, and is deeply offended by it. If the mere change of title should precipitate a civil conflict the king may have cause to wish he had been content with his more modest title, especially if Austria and Russia take a hand in the fight. This is not improbable, as the great nations of Europe clearly understand the advantages of choosing the territory of some weak neighbor as a battlefield instead of having the struggle within their own borders.

The Condition of Ireland is Declared by those who have opportunities of knowing, to be as bad as at any time during the agitation, in spite of the statements incorporated in the Queen's speech. A gentleman writing from Ennis, Clare County, says that only a few days before, "a band of men, armed and disguised, paid a visit to a number of tenants in this district who were supposed to have sent in applications for judicial rents under the Land act, and forced them on their knees, while firing shots, to swear that they would withdraw the applications, never enter the Land Courts, nor pay their rents until Parnell and the other political prisoners were released. The terrified men and women took the oath, and they now say, without hesitation, that they will suffer eviction before disobeying the mandate of the Moonlighters. The terror of the Moonlighters is stronger than the terror of eviction."

Lieutenant Danenhower, of the Jeannette Expedition, in a second letter to his father, describes the trip up the river from Bolonenga to Yakutsk, which occupied thirty-six days and was made on sledges with dogs, reindeer, and horses. He says it was one full of severe hardships. There were stations at intervals on the way constructed of logs. The last one of these, seventeen miles from Yakutsk, and the best one of the lot, was a small log building, with a cow shed attached. It was composed of one room, in which were about twenty people when his party arrived. In the centre was the body of a horse that had been killed for food and brought into the room to thaw out. During the night that the party stopped at this hut Jack Cole, the boatswain, while laboring under aberration of mind, got up and started out to walk to New York to see his wife. The thermometer was 60 degrees below zero. It required all of Lieutenant Danenhower's persuasive powers to induce him to come back into the hut. In speaking of the terrible voyage of the party Lieutenant Danenhower says that they had to travel seven hundred miles over the ice from the ship to the mouth of the Lena. They landed in shoal water and were compelled to wade two miles to land. They were forced to travel one hundred miles further before they reached shelter, and he says he was up five days and four nights without sleep or rest. He mentions the fact that out of the thirty-three comprising the crew and officers of the Jeannette only thirteen are known to be living and one is known to be dead.

Mr. Forster has Displayed Considerable courage by making an excursion into the most disturbed district in Ireland. As he is the Secretary of State for Ireland, and as such is responsible for the arrest and detention of Mr. Parnell and the other Land League leaders, he is probably the best hated man in the cabinet. On March 6th he was at Tullamore, where he made a speech in the open air to a crowd, among whom were many disaffected people. He said that the reason he had undertaken a personal tour was to see for himself whether the stories which came to Dublin Castle were exaggerated. He was sorry that he had found them to a great extent true. The result of his inspection on his mind was that the people had it in their own power to stop the outrages which disgrace the name of Ireland and which would not happen in Great Britain or on the Continent. There were no more courageous men in the world in battle than the Irish. "Those who commit the outrages," said Mr. Forster, "are broken-down men and violent, reckless boys. Whether you stop them or not it is the duty of the government to do so. It is especially my duty, and stop them we will. The instigators of outrage have several Powers to contend with—namely, the Irish government—though, perhaps, they think they can defy that—also the imperial government and the people of Great Britain. But they have also a stronger force to oppose—the force of God's law. I can call on you to do what you can to stop these things," he continued. "Let me say one word about the English people. There is no ill feeling in England toward Ireland. We know that you have been a miserably and badly governed country, that the English Government of past days has done many cruel and very unjust things to Ireland, and has allowed many to be done. We wish to undo that, make you prosperous, rich, and powerful as ourselves."

When will the Suspects be Released, was one of the questions addressed to Mr. Forster by his audience. He replied, "As soon as we can fairly say that the outrages have ceased—that men are not ruined, not maimed, not murdered for doing their duty, or what they have a legal right to do, the suspects will be released." Some one raised the cry of "God save Ireland," which words, Mr. Forster said, "sometimes conclude letters telling me I must have a bullet through my head. I say 'God save Ireland,' too, but from cruel men, grasping landlords, rack-renting landlords, dishonest tenants and midnight marauders. God save Ireland from pestilence which walketh at noon and terror which stealeth at night. And I believe God will save Ireland, for with all her faults the amount of virtue among the Irish people, the love of country and of family, which are abiding virtues, will cause God's laws to be respected."

The Speech Delivered by the Russian General Skobelev is still a prominent topic of discussion throughout Europe. This curious statement, the accuracy of which is vouched for by a St. Petersburg newspaper correspondent, is published: "General Skobelev's St. Petersburg speech was written for him by a M. Aksakoff. Skobelev submitted the manuscript to General Ignatieff, who struck out several pages, making no secret of it at that time. Shrewd though Skobelev is he allowed himself to be carried away by champagne, and took no account of the erasures when he delivered the speech. This is what led to the rumor that he and Ignatieff were in collusion." That the whole matter may have been prearranged is suspected by the Berlin correspondent of the London News, who declares he has good authority for saying that during the day, on the evening of which General Skobelev made his first speech, General Ignatieff hinted to a friend that General Skobelev would make some remarks which would create a profound sensation in Europe. Those acquainted with General Skobelev believe that his language was authorized.

A Sensational Murder Trial Commenced in England March 8th. The accused is an American physician who is charged with causing the death of his wife's brother, Percy M. John, by poison. The deceased was a young man nineteen years of age and was possessed of considerable wealth. He was at a boarding school, where he was visited on December 3d by the accused Dr. Lamson, who, after some casual conversation, induced him to take a gelatine capsule, in which his visitor ostensibly placed merely some powdered sugar, telling him to see how easy it would be, in such capsules, to take even the most disagreeable medicines. Immediately afterward Lamson left, saying that he was en route for Florence and must catch the eight o'clock train for Paris. Within a very short time the boy complained of being seriously unwell, and at half-past eleven the same night he died, his symptoms throughout having been strongly indicative of vegetable poisoning. On a subsequent search among John's effects a number of powders were found labelled "Quinine," two of which, however, contained aconitia in poisonous doses. It was shown in evidence that these powders were sent to the deceased by Dr. Lamson, who was also proved to have purchased aconitia of various chemists. The evidence is entirely circumstantial and is on that account regarded with suspicion, but the chain is so complete as to lead to the expectation that Dr. Lamson will be convicted.

OBTAINABLE ONLY AT THE BOOKSELLERS:

NOT AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

BY THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.—Price, $1.

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, SOLE AGENTS.

Obtainable through all Booksellers.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, MARCH 23, 1882.

16th Year. No. 12.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT OF REV. ADONIRAM JUDSON, D.D.,
 America's Pioneer Missionary to Burmah.
LOST SHEEP. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.
SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Cuffe" (Continued).
PICTURE OF MR. PARROTT, of the China Inland Mission and his Helpers Preaching at a Fair.
A Malagasy Slave-Girl (with Illustration).

THE GREAT PYRAMID PROPHECY ABOUT 1882.

CURRENT EVENTS: The Vacant Associate Justice-ship—The Anti-po'ygamy Bill Passed—The Mississippi Floods—An Alarming Outbreak of Small-Pox—Desperate Conduct of an Unsuccessful Litigant A Brakeman's Last Trip—Disappointment of a Prospective Duchess—A Convict's Death from Remorse, etc.

PICTURE OF A SCENE ON BOARD A WRECKED VESSEL: A Captain's Heroism.

OUR LORD BEFORE HEROD. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

The Mission of the Twelve. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

COBWEBS AND CABLES. By Hesba Stretton (con'd).
A Mandarin's Son Visiting a Missionary (with illustration).

FOREIGN TOPICS: The State of Ireland—Queen Victoria's Gratitude—The House of Commons and Mr. Bradlaugh—The Jeannette's Survivors, etc.

DR. ADONIRAM JUDSON, the First Foreign Missionary from America.

THE REV. ADONIRAM JUDSON, D.D.

Birth and Early Characteristics—Wonderful Progress at College—Becomes an Unbeliever—Alarming Death of an Infidel Friend—Joins Andover Seminary—Conversion—Resolution to be a Missionary—Early Difficulties—Capture and Imprisonment in France—Appointment to India or Burmah—Marriage—Arrival at Calcutta—Discouragements—Settlement at Rangoon—Labors and Successes—Long Imprisonment at Ava—Mrs. Judson's Devotion—His Release and Her Death—Translation of the Bible—Visit to America—Return to Burmah—Last Labors—Illness and Death.

ADONIRAM JUDSON was born on the 9th of August, 1788, at Malden, Mass., where his father was pastor of a Congregational church. He was taught to read by his mother when only three years old, and learned with such facility that he was able to read a chapter of the Bible to his father before the latter was aware that he knew the alphabet. Before he was seven years old he formed an affectionate intimacy with his sister, and till he grew up to manhood she was his confidante in many a secret.

Like a great many able and eminent men whose lives have been marked by a serious purpose, Adoniram, as a boy, was jovial and excitable, full of spirits and a leader in fun. When he was fourteen years old he was prostrated for more than a twelvemonth by a serious attack of illness, and on his recovery his thoughts began to be occupied with extravagant schemes of distinguishing himself in the world. But whether he forecast the career of an orator, or of a poet, or of a statesman, one serious thought crept into his mind and embittered all his musings; that was, that his honors would not last forever, but that less than a hundred years would turn him into dust.

Adoniram entered college at the age of sixteen, and applied himself very closely to his studies, seldom giving himself any respite, even during the holidays. He was ambitious to excel, and a class-mate says of him that he has no recollection of his ever failing or even hesitating in recitation. He had a powerful rival in his friend John Bailey, who was afterward member of Congress from Massachusetts, and that probably added zest to his ambition. When he received the highest appointment in the commencement exercises, his delight knew no bounds. He hurried to his room and wrote, "Dear Father: I have got it. Your affectionate son, A. J."

It was at the period we are now writing of that French infidelity invaded the New England States and swept over the land like a flood; and unbridled exploration in matters of religion began to be considered a necessary part of the education of every man of spirit. In the class above young Judson there was a young man of the name of E—, who was amiable, talented, witty, exceedingly agreeable in person and manners, but a confirmed Deist. A strong friendship sprang up between the two young men, and Judson soon professed himself as great an unbeliever as the other.

Having left college Mr. Judson taught school for a time in Plymouth, where his father had moved from Malden, and then, in August, 1808, set out on a tour through some of the States. He found his way to Albany, N. Y., with a crowd, to see the wonder of the world of that time, the newly invented steamship, Robert Fulton, and took passage in it to New York. Under the exciting influence of a first visit to a great city, he adopted a fictitious name and perpetrated some extravagances which might scarcely have been expected in one of so solid an understanding. He was somewhat estranged from his family too; for he had disclosed to them his changed views, and had been sternly answered by his father, whose attitude, however, did not move him as much as the tears and prayers of his mother.

After seeing what he wished of New York, Mr. Judson turned his steps westward, and the second or third night, at a country inn, he got from the Holy Spirit. The landlord mentioned, as he lighted him to his room, that he had been obliged to give him a room next to one occupied by a young man who was exceedingly ill, probably in a dying state. Judson assured him that would occasion him no inconvenience, but nevertheless he passed a restless night. As he listened to the movements of the watchers and the groans of the sick man, he could not help asking himself, "Is he prepared to die?" and he contrasted the resources of his own feeble philosophy with the strong faith of a Christian for meeting the awful and inevitable emergency with which the stranger, separated from him only by a partition, was vainly grappling. He shuddered to think that he might himself be placed any day in a similar position.

A TRUMPET CALL

As soon as it was day he went in search of the landlord and inquired about the sick man. "He is dead," was the reply. "Dead!" Judson gasped. "Yes, poor fellow!" said the landlord, "the doctor said he would probably not survive the night." "Do you know who he was?" "Yes, he was a young man from Providence College, a very fine fellow. His name was E—." And he gave the name of Judson's friend, the freethinker. Judson was completely stunned; and although, some hours afterward, he attempted to pursue his journey, the words "Dead! lost! lost!" kept ringing in his ears. He knew the religion of the Bible to be true; he felt its truth; and he was in despair. In that state of mind he abandoned his scheme of travelling, and the same day turned his horse's head toward Plymouth. But he was not yet prepared to bow his proud heart to the Son of God.

On the 12th of October, the same year, 1808, Mr. Judson went to Andover, and attended the theological classes at the seminary; and in that calm retirement, guided by learned and pious ministers of God, with nothing to distract his attention from the great concerns of eternity, light dawned upon his all-awakened mind, and he surrendered to Christ as his atoning Saviour.

On Dec. 2d he made a solemn dedication of himself to God, and on the 28th of the following May he publicly joined his father's church in Plymouth. Some months later he read Buchanan's "Star in the East," which led him to think about becoming a missionary to the heathen; and in February, 1810, he resolved upon that course of life, and thenceforth followed out his purpose with all the ardor of his active nature, and with a persistency of will which met discouragement and sickness, and persecution and danger with equanimity for forty years. His firmness was severely tested as soon as he announced what he intended to do, for his mother and sister besought him with tears not to leave them and risk his welfare in unknown lands, while his father disclosed to him a plan for his appointment immediately, young and inexperienced as he was, to be the colleague of the Rev. Dr. Griffin in the largest church in Boston. But if young Judson had been a man to be moved by such considerations, he would never have made the missionary he afterward became.

THE MISSION CAUSE IN 1810.

At that time the cause of foreign missions was in its infancy in America, and was very little more advanced in Great Britain. There was no Society whatever in this country to which Mr. Judson and several other young men, who purposed with him to devote their lives to labor among the heathen, could turn for support and direction. The young men laid their views, however, before a Conference of the leading Congregational ministers, which met at Bradford, Mass., in June, 1810, asking whether they might expect help from them, or whether they must place themselves under the direction of some European Society. The result was the formation of a mission board from among the assembled ministers. But, as it was feared that the infant board might not immediately be able to provide for all the proposed missionaries, it was resolved that Mr. Judson should go to London to confer with the London Missionary Society.

There is another thing which should never be forgotten in considering the heroism of the first missionaries of this century, and that is the suffering and dangers to which they exposed themselves for the love of Christ. At the present day large portions of the foreign field are under the well-ordered machinery of the British Government; and with the exception of Central Africa and Tartary all non-Christian countries are sufficiently in fear of European or American arms to afford security to the life and liberty of a white man. But at the time Carey and Marshman and Judson went abroad, most of those countries were under the absolute sway of savage despots who neither knew nor cared about foreign powers; and the East India Company, which ruled what was then British India, was so implacably hostile to the introduction of the Gospel that a missionary had a better chance in trusting himself to the favor of a heathen king.

Moreover, in place of the sure and regular service of steamships, and the perfect postal system which now prevail between all countries, there was in those days no means of communication except the uncertain sailing-ships of the merchant service; and those were not more dependent upon the winds and waves than they were in danger from the irresponsible armed vessels of rival nations then at war. Under these unfavorable circumstances Mr. Judson entered upon the career of a missionary of the Gospel; and he began to experience its trials at the outset. The packet in which he sailed for England was captured by a French privateer; and after severe hardships and wearying delays, including a protracted detention in France, he was allowed to proceed to England in May, 1811. Somebody has described his personal appearance at that time: "He was small and exceedingly delicate in figure, with a round, rosy face which gave him the appearance of extreme youthfulness. His hair and eyes were of a dark shade of brown, in his French passport described as chestnut. His voice, however, usually took his listeners by surprise."

Mr. Judson received a promise of support from the London Society in case of failure from the American Board, and returned home in August. But before long it was discovered that foreign aid was not required; for the first difficulties were safely overcome, and the American Board appointed Mr. Judson and his colleagues to labor in some Asiatic field—as the Holy Spirit might be pleased to direct. About the same time Mr. Judson united himself to a suitable companion in Miss Ann Hasseltine, a young lady who had got the keynote of her life from the words of 1 Tim. 5:6, "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth."

INDIA OR BURMAH,

The departure of the missionaries was delayed, through their having to wait, first for a ship and then for a fair wind, till the 19th February, 1812, when Mr. and Mrs. Judson and a Mr. and Mrs. Newell embarked at Salem, in the brig Caravan, Captain Heard, bound for Calcutta. They reached their destination on the 17th of June, or just about two years from the time that they offered themselves to the Conference at Bradford.

That was only the beginning of a course of delays that Mr. Judson suffered all through his missionary career, and such as would, at the present day, be considered too vexatious to be borne. And yet, notwithstanding the loss of months at a time, Mr. Judson was enabled by God's grace to accomplish what many a modern missionary would be proud to do. This is a convenient place to say that during the voyage to India Mr. and Mrs. Judson changed their views about baptism, and that they were re-baptized in Calcutta in the September following their arrival. That severed their connection with the Congregational Board, and threw them, for the means of support, on the Baptist churches at home. The latter responded promptly and generously to the appeal.

The missionaries were warmly welcomed at Calcutta, or rather at the adjoining Dutch settlement of Serampore, by the venerable Dr. Carey, who had gone out to India from England in 1793; but before they had been under his roof ten days, they received a peremptory order from the government of the East India Company to leave the country and return to America. That threw them into great perplexity, for accounts from Burmah had been so discouraging that they had renounced the idea of going there. They petitioned for leave to settle in any part of India, or to take ship for Ceylon or for Mauritius; but the imperious representatives of the Company forbade every such design; and at length, partly by eluding the authorities, contrived to make their way, nearly three and miles by sea, to the last-mentioned island. After remaining there a time, the Judsons resolved to return to the Bay of Bengal and attempt a misadventure at Penang, in the Strait of Malacca, although it implied a visit to Madras, and their exposure to the power of the Indian Government. They waited long at Madras without finding a ship to take them to Penang, and their position became so intolerable that they felt themselves obliged to go on board a rickety old vessel for Rangoon, where they arrived on the 13th of July, 1813, after a tedious and distressing passage which nearly cost Mrs. Judson her life. Thus God fixed the destination for his chosen servant, by circumstances over which the latter had no control.

Burmah was at that time all ruled by a native king, who had his capital at Ava. Rangoon, since the possession of part of the country by England has become the principal city, was then an important seaport. A mission had been lately set on foot there by the London Missionary Society, but it had made little progress. Mr. Carey, of Dr. Carey, of Serampore, was the only missionary in the country when Mr. Judson arrived. The religion of the country was Buddhism, and no one had yet embraced Christianity. A translation of the Gospel of Matthew and an elementary grammar prepared by Mr. Carey, were the only helps to the study of the language. There existed no interpreter, and there was no interpreter who could more than pronounce in Burmese the names of things that were pointed to. Under these disfavoring conditions Mr. Judson, supported by his wife and by his devoted wife, settled down steadily to acquire the language, as the first means of making known the Gospel to the people of Burmah. The limited space compels us to hurry over the details of the though they form one of the most thrilling stories of literature. It would be difficult in any case to tell the long narrative, as detailed in Mr. Judson's, or, as he became during that period, Dr. Judson's, journal and Mrs. Judson's letters, with- out depriving it of a proportionate measure of interest. Dr. Judson held daily conferences with Burmese of different classes who came to visit him, many of whom were partially convicted of sin, but deterred by the fear of the king's anger from confessing Christ. He proceeded assiduously with the tremendous work of translating the Bible. His heart was gladdened by the arrival of other missionaries. He made a journey to Ava to present his cause before the king, and was received with majesty with a gorgeous display of barbaric splendor, but was repulsed when he requested the king's favorable hearing of the Christian doctrine. On the 27th June, 1819, Dr. Judson had the joy of baptizing whose number increased slowly to ten, including a woman and a man of distinguished learning. The latter made a very satisfactory confession of sin, after a long and severe struggle with selfishness and with the wish to keep up his position as a teacher before his countrymen. In 1824, when Dr. and Mrs. Judson were in endeavoring to start a branch mission there, a civil war broke out between Burmah and England, and Dr. Judson was made a prisoner on the ground of being a spy. Then follows the never-forgotten story of his twenty-one months' imprisonment in a wretched hovel, his ankles chained together with one, three, or five pairs of irons, according to the mood of his jailers, and a bloody passed between his legs and made fast to the wall, so that his feet were immovable and he lay stretched out on the floor. He was starved, insulted, exposed to the noonday heat and the cold night chills, and left without help or comfort when attacks of fever racked his frame.

NEXT THIRTEEN YEARS,

THE FIRST BURMAN CONVERT,

For the greater part of all that time his wife sustained herself to the mitigation of his sufferings by a fortitude which has not often been surpassed. As often as she was repulsed by the jail guards, she returned and contrived by entreaty, by entreaty, and by such presents as small means enabled her to give, to obtain access to her husband and minister to his wants. Many a time during that period of protracted anxiety her desolate condition and trying circumstances drove her to the verge of despair; but she found strength in the faithful God who has ever been a refuge to His children. Her unwearying and self-denying devotion excited the sympathy of some of the Burmans, so that along with much very rough treatment she experienced a good deal of kindness.

One interesting incident of that imprisonment was the concealment of the manuscript translation of part of the Bible, upon which Dr. Judson had spent ten years' labor. When the doctor was arrested, the native police searched his house and helped themselves to whatever of his and his wife's property they pleased. Every scrap of paper was especially regarded with suspicion, and Mrs. Judson, therefore, took pains to hide the invaluable manuscript, which she at length effectually did by sewing it up in a hard and dirty pillow, which would not excite the cupidity of the guards, and giving that to her husband to put under his head.

Mrs. Judson's care saved her husband's life, but it was at the cost of her own; for when the war came to an end in 1826, and Dr. Judson was released, he found his wife lying on a bed, reduced almost to a skeleton, and unable to stand. She rallied under the joy of seeing him free, and after some days they went down the river to Rangoon; but she died the same year at a place called Amherst, a new settlement that the British had formed. Some months later Dr. Judson buried his third and last surviving child, Maria, who had been born while he was a captive at Ava, and his wife, ill-nourished and untended, was wearing herself out in attendance upon him. These were the bitter dregs of his long and terrible trial, and his character as a disciple of Christ came out purified and strengthened.

Rangoon, although it did not become a British possession until the second war of 1852, had been placed under British supervision, and the fear of the king no longer kept the natives from coming to learn the new religion. Moreover, the war had revolutionized the ways and prejudices of the people, and had excited a spirit of curiosity that was very hopeful for the reception of the Gospel.

Dr. Judson left other missionaries at Rangoon and established himself in the town of where he was absorbed in the translation of the Bible, and lived a retired and thoughtful life. One of his biographers writes that he labored at that time under "the pressure of recent sorrow, a deepening sense of sin, and a growing yearning for deeper communion with God. He used often to live alone for days in a little cottage far in the woods, spending the time in fasting and prayer, and seeing only those who came to him for religious instruction. It seems to have been a crisis in his spiritual history, through which he passed to clearer light and more unwavering faith."

MAULMAIN,

Dr. Judson continued in his improved field of labor till 1845, and met many compensations for the sorrows of his earlier service. He baptized more than a hundred converts, many of whom loved him with ardent devotion. He extended his operations to Prome, and to the wild Karen tribes. He brought to completion the Burmese Bible, a stupendous work, that puts this gifted man of God on a level with Jerome, Wycliffe, Luther, and two or three other men who have single-handedly undertaken and finished the translation of the entire Holy Scriptures from one language into another. He also took in hand the preparation of a Burmese dictionary, which would make easy for all his successors the acquisition of the language which had been such an incredible task to himself.

In 1834 he had married

MRS. SARAH H. BOARDMAN,

a lady of rare intellectual gifts, who quickly learned the Burmese and Karen languages, and made translations and wrote hymns for the use of the native Church. It was the alarming illness of this lady, in 1845, that made Dr. Judson reluctantly leave his work and turn his face homeward, after an absence of nearly thirty-four years. He took his oldest three children with him to be educated in America, and left three younger ones with friends in Burmah, but they were all motherless when he reached his native land, for Mrs. Judson succumbed to her disease at sea, and was buried at St. Helena.

Dr. Judson stayed only nine months in America, and he appears to have had no idea till shortly before he sailed, of taking a wife back with him to the field of his missionary labors. But he sought out and made the acquaintance of a Miss Emily Chubbuck, because of an exceedingly well-written book of stories by her that fell into his hands, and he thought she might be induced to write a memoir of the late Mrs. Judson, which he wished much to see suitably done. But the acquaintance thus formed speedily deepened into mutual affection, and Dr. Judson and Miss Chubbuck sailed from America as man and wife in July, 1846. On the 28th of November they anchored off Amherst, and were welcomed with great rejoicings by the native Christians. Even at that date missionaries in heathen countries had not the comfortable houses they have now, as our readers will see from the following description of her new house, named "Bat Castle," that Mrs. Judson wrote to one of the children in America:

"Think of me in an immense brick house, with rooms as large as the entire 'loggers,' and only one small window apiece. When I speak of windows, do not think I make any allusion to glass—of course not. The windows (holes) are closed by means of heavy board or plank shutters, tinned over on the outside as a preventive of fire. Imagine us, then, on the second floor of this immense den, with nine rooms at our command, the smallest of which (bathing-room and a kind of pantry) are, I think, quite as large as your dining-room, and the rest very much larger. Part of the floors are of brick, and part of boards; but old 'Green Turban' white-washed them all, with the walls, before we came, because the Doctor told him, when he was over here, that he must 'make the house shine for madam.' He did make it shine with a vengeance, between whitewashing and greasing. His doors and other woodwork were fairly dripping, and we have not got rid of the smell yet, nor, with all our rubbing, is it quite safe to hold too long on the door. The floor overhead is quite low, and the beams, which are frequent, afford shelter to thousands and thousands of bats that disturb us in the daytime only by a little cricket-like music, but in the night—oh, if you could only hear them carouse!"

LAST YEARS.

For four years longer Dr. Judson prosecuted his work of extending the native Church in Burmah, and made great progress with his dictionary. But British influence had become slack in the country again, and the native authorities held their terrors over the converts. Dr. Judson longed to see the day, which he felt sure was drawing on, when the British power would open up the whole country to the Gospel, but he passed to his reward before that day came. He was in robust health, living in the greatest enjoyment with his family, when he caught a severe cold, accompanied by fever, which settled into a fatal illness. He languished for some months, having fits of great agony, but never flinching in his trust in his Saviour, and then a voyage to Mauritius was resolved upon as giving him the last chance for his life.

On the 3d April, 1850, he was carried on board a French barque, and although it was impracticable for his wife to accompany him on the voyage, she followed him for three days down the river in a boat. They parted under the most distressing circumstances, but Mrs. Judson had the consolation of knowing that her husband had a kind friend and faithful attendants on board the vessel. The barque put out to sea, and the fresh breezes revived the sick man the first day; but on Friday, the 12th, after a day of much suffering, he said to his Burmese servant, "It is done: I am going. Take care of poor mistress," and quietly breathed his last. The same day his body was committed to the sea.

Thus lived, and toiled, and died Burmah's pioneer missionary. To-day there are in that country and the adjoining kingdom of Siam 21,594 native Christians.

LOST SHEEP.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
March 19, 1882.

"All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."—ISAIAH 53:6.

A Solemn Time—I. An Indictment—It Takes all in—Sheep get Astray in Two Ways—Trying to get into other Pastures—Scared by Dogs—A Pitiable Man who has only Business to Comfort Him—The Actor and his Sleeping Auditor—The World's Poor Pasturage—Two Russian Frigates at the Bombardment of Sebastopol—II. An Open Door—Can no Man carry his Sin?—The Appeal of Lost Souls—A Wife's Farewell Letter—A Lost Woman—Flung in City Life—The Sin-Bearer—A Clergyman's Prediction Fulfilled—An Appeal to One Man—An Eternal Adieu—Lost Opportunities.

WITHIN ninety years at the longest this entire audience will be in eternity. During the next fifty years, you will nearly all be gone. The next ten years will cut a wide swathe among the people. The year 1882 will to some be the finality. This may be the last sermon that some one will hear. Under these circumstances, while I have a somewhat poetic nature and might indulge in trope and figure and simile, I dare not do so. God never gave to any man a greater fondness for mirth than I naturally have, and yet under this solemnity I would not dare to indulge it. This service, this hour in spiritual things, will be to some in this assemblage a life struggle or a death grapple.

I. The first half of my text is

AN INDICTMENT:

"All we like sheep have gone astray." Some one says: "Can't you drop that first word? that is too general; that sweeps too great a circle." Some man rises in the audience and he looks over on the opposite side of the house, and says: "There is a blasphemer, and I understand how he has gone astray. And there in another part of the house is a defrauder, and he has gone astray. And there is an impure person and he has gone astray." Sit down, my brother, and look at home. My text takes us all in. It starts behind the pulpit, sweeps the circuit of the room and comes back to the point where it started, when it says: "All we like sheep have gone astray."

I can very easily understand why Martin Luther threw up his hands after he had found the Bible and cried out: "O! my sins, my sins," and why the publican, according to the custom to this day in the East, when they have any great grief, began to beat himself and cry as he smote upon his breast: "God be merciful to me a sinner."

I was, like many of you, brought up in the country, and I know some of the habits of sheep, and how they get astray, and what my text means when it says, "All we like sheep have gone astray." Sheep get astray in two ways: either by trying to get into other pasture, or from being scared by the dogs. In the former way some of us get astray. We thought the religion of Jesus Christ short commons. We thought there was better pasturage somewhere else. We thought if we could only lie down on the banks of distant streams, or under great oaks on the other side of some hill, we might be better fed. We wanted other pasturage than that which God through Jesus Christ gave our soul, and we wandered on, and we wandered on, and we were lost. We wanted bread and we found garbage. The further we wandered, instead of finding rich pasturage, we found blasted heath and sharper rocks and more stinging nettles. No pasture. How was it in the clubhouse when you lost your child? Did they come around and help you very much? Did your worldly associates console you very much? Did not the plain Christian man who came into your house and sat up with your darling child, give you more comfort than all worldly associations? Did all the convivial songs you ever heard comfort you in that day of bereavement so much as the song they sang to you, perhaps the very song that was sung by your little child the last Sabbath afternoon of her life?

"There is a happy land, far, far away,
Where saints immortal reign, bright, bright as day."

Did your business associates in that day of darkness and trouble give you any especial condolence? Business exasperated you, business wore you out, business left you limp as a rag, business made you mad. You got dollars, but you got no peace. God have mercy on the man who has nothing but business to comfort him. The world afforded you no luxuriant pasturage.

A famous English actor stood on the stage impersonating, and thunders of applause came down from the galleries, and many thought it was the proudest moment of all his life; but there was a man asleep just in front of him and the fact that that man was indifferent and somnolent spoiled all the occasion for him, and he cried "Wake up, wake up!" So one little annoyance in life has been more pervading to your mind than all the brilliant congratulations and success.

Poor pasturage for your soul you found in this world. The world has cheated you, the world has belied you, the world has misinterpreted you, the world has persecuted you. It never comforted you. O! this world is a good rack from which a horse may pick his food; it is a good trough from which the swine may crunch their mess; but it gives but little food to a soul blood-bought and immortal.

WHAT IS A SOUL?

It is a hope high as the throne of God. What is a man? You say: "It is only a man." It is only a man gone overboard in sin. It is only a man gone overboard in business life. What is a man? The battle ground of three worlds, with his hands taking hold of destinies of light or darkness. A man! No line can measure him. No limit can bound him. The archangel before the throne cannot outlive him. The stars shall die, but he will watch their extinguishment. The world will burn, but he will gaze on the conflagration. Endless ages will march on, he will watch the procession. A man! The masterpiece of God Almighty. Yet you say, "It is only a man." Can a nature like that be fed on husks of the wilderness?

"Substantial comfort will not grow
On nature's barren soil;
All we can boast till Christ we know
Is vanity and toil."

Some of you got astray by looking for better pasturage; others by being

SCARED OF THE DOGS.

The hound gets over into the pasture field. The poor things fly in every direction. In a few moments they are torn of the hedges and they are plashed of the ditch, and the lost sheep never gets home unless the farmer goes after it. There is nothing so thoroughly lost as a lost sheep.

It may have been in 1857 during the financial panic or during the financial stress in the fall of 1873, when you got astray. You almost became an atheist. You said: "Where is God, that honest men go down and thieves prosper?" You were dogged of creditors, you were dogged of the banks, you were dogged of worldly disaster, and some of you went into misanthropy, and some of you took to strong drink, and others of you fled out of Christian association, and you got astray. O! man, that was the last time when you ought to have forsaken God. Standing amid the foundering of your earthly fortunes, how could you get along without a God to comfort you, and a God to deliver you, and a God to help you, and a God to save you?

You tell me you have been through enough business trouble almost to kill you. I know it. I cannot understand how the boat could live one hour in that chopped sea. But I do not know by what process you got astray; some in one way, and some in another, and if you could really see the position some of you occupy before God this morning, your soul would burst into an agony of tears and you would pelt the heavens with the cry: "God have mercy!" Sinai's batteries have been unlimbered above your soul and at times you have heard it thunder: "The wages of sin is death." "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." "The soul that sinneth, it shall die."

When Sebastopol was being bombarded Russian frigates burned all night in the harbor, throwing a glare upon the trembling fortress some of you, from what you have told me of yourselves, some of you are standing in the night of your soul's trouble; the cannonade and the conflagration and the multiplication and the multitude of your sorrows and troubles I think must make the wings of God's hovering angels shiver to the touch. II. But the last part of my text opens wide enough to let us all out and to let all in. Sound it on the organ with all the stops. Thrum it on the harps with all the tunes as with all the melody possible let the heavens sing it to the earth and let the earth tell it to the heavens. "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." I am glad that the prophet did not try to explain whom he meant by "Him." Him the manger, Him of the bloody sweat, Him of the urection throne, Him of the crucifixion, Him of Him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all.

A DOOR

"O!" says some man, "that isn't general; that isn't fair; let every man carry his own burden and pay his own debts." That sounds reasonable. If I have an obligation and I have the means to meet it, and I come to you and ask you to that obligation, you rightly say, "Pay your debts." If you and I walking down the street, hale, hearty, and well, I ask you to carry me, say and say rightly: "Walk on your own feet. But suppose you and I were in a regiment and wounded in the battle and I fell unconscious at feet with gunshot fractures and dislocations, would you do? You would call to your comrade saying, 'Come and help, this man is helpless, bring the ambulance; let us take him to the hospital,' and I would be a dead lift in your arms; you would lift me from the ground where I fallen and put me in the ambulance and take me to the hospital and have all kindness shown. Would there be anything mean in your doing? Would there be anything bemeaning in my asking that kindness? O! no. You would be glad to do it."

That is what Christ does. If we could pay our debts then it would be better to go up and tell them, saying, "Here, Lord, here is my obligation; here are the means with which I mean to settle my obligation; now give me a receipt; cross out." The debt is paid. But the fact is we have fallen in the battle, we have gone down under the hot fire of our transgressions, we have been wounded by the sabres of sin, we are helpless, we are done. Christ comes. The loud clang heard the sky on that Christmas night was only the resounding bell of the ambulance. Clear the way for the Son of God. He comes down to up the wounds, and to scatter the darkness, and to save the lost. Clear the way for the Son of God. Christ comes down to us, and we are a dead lift. He does not lift us with the tips of His fingers; He does not lift us with one arm. He comes upon His knee and then with a dead lift He lifts us to honor and glory and immortality. Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.

Why then

WILL NO MAN CARRY HIS SINS?

You cannot carry successfully the smallest sin ever committed. You might as well put a cannon on one shoulder and the Alps on the other—how much less can you carry all the sins of your lifetime? Christ comes and looks down your face and says: "I have come through the lacerations of these days, and through the tempests of these nights; I have come to your burdens and to pardon your sins and your debts. Put them on my shoulder; put them on my heart." "On Him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all."

Sin has almost pestered the life out of some of you. At times it has made you cross and unbearable, and it has spoiled the brightness of your days and the peace of your nights. There are men who have been riddled of sin. The world gives them no solace. Gossamery and volatile the while eternity, as they look forward to it, is as midnight. They writhe under the sting of science which proposes to give no rest here no rest hereafter; and yet they do not repent, do not pray, they do not weep. They do not see that just the position they occupy is the poor occupied by scores, hundreds, and thousands of men who never found any hope. They went of life just as they are now. They sat in the place where you sit, then they heard the Gospel, they rejected it, they passed out of life their voice comes to us from the eternal world morning, saying: "Take the Gospel; this is chance; my day is gone; I am undone! who shove back this bolt? Who will put down sorrow?" And the caverns forlornly echo, "ho, who?"

"This meeting should be thrown open and the people who are here could give their testimony, of thrilling experiences we should hear on all sides! There is a man in the gallery who would say: 'I had brilliant surroundings, I had the best education that one of the best collegiate institutions of this country could give, and I observed all moralities of life, and I was self-righteous, and thought I was all right before God as I am all before men; but the Holy Spirit came to me one day and said, 'You are a sinner;' the Holy Spirit persuaded me of the fact. While I had eschewed the sins against the law of the land, I had fully committed the worst sin a man ever commits—the driving back of the Son of God from my heart's affections. And I saw that my hands were with the blood of the Son of God, and I began to pray and peace came to my heart, and I know experience that what you say this morning is true. 'On Him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all.'"

"Yonder is a man who would say: 'I was the first drunkard in New York; I went from bad to worse; I destroyed myself, I destroyed my home; my children cowered when I entered the house; when they put up their lips to be kissed I struck them; when my wife protested against the maltreatment, I kicked her into the street. I know all the bruises and all the terrors of a drunkard's woe. I went on further and further from God until one day saying: 'MY DEAR HUSBAND: I have tried every way, done everything, and prayed earnestly and fervently for your reformation, but it seems of no avail. Since our little Henry died, with the exception of those few happy weeks when you remained sober, my life has been one of sorrow. Any of the nights I have sat by the window, with my face bathed in tears, watching for your coming. I am broken-hearted, I am sick. Mother and father have been here frequently and begged me to come home, but my love for you and my hope for brighter days have always made me refuse them. That hope seems now beyond realization, and I have returned to them. It is hard, and I battled long before doing it. May God bless and preserve you, and take from you that accursed appetite and hasten the day when we shall be again living happily together. This will be my daily prayer, knowing that He has said: 'Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' From your loving wife,

"I GOT A LETTER

"MARY."

"And so I wandered on and wandered on, until that man, 'until one night I passed a Methodist meeting-house, and I said to myself, 'I'll go and see what they are doing,' and I got to the door, and they were singing:

"All may come, whoever will,
This Man receives poor sinners still."

"And I dropped right there where I was and I said, 'God have mercy,' and He had mercy on me. My home is restored, my wife sings all day long during work, my children come out a long way to greet me home, and my household is a little heaven. I will tell you what did all this for me. It was the truth that this day you proclaim: 'On Him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all.'"

"Yonder is a woman who would say: 'I wandered off from my father's house; I heard the storm hat pelts on a lost soul; my feet were blistered on the hot rocks. I went on and on, thinking that no one cared for my soul, when one night Jesus met me and He said, 'Poor thing, go home! your father is waiting for you, your mother is waiting for you. Go home, poor thing!' and, sir, I was too weak to pray, and I was too weak to repent, but I just cried out, I sobbed out my sins and my sorrows on the shoulders of Him of whom it is said: 'the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.'"

There is a young man who would say: "I had a Christian bringing up; I came from the country to

CITY LIFE;

I started well; I had a good position, a good commercial position, but one night at the theatre I met some young men who did me no good. They dragged me all through the sewers of iniquity, and I lost my morals and I lost my position, and I was shabby and wretched. I was going down the street, thinking that no one cared for me, when a young man tapped me on the shoulder and said: 'George, come with me and I will do you good.' I looked at him to see whether he was joking or not. I saw he was in earnest, and I said: 'What do you mean, sir?' 'Well,' he replied, 'I mean if you will come to the meeting to-night, I will be very glad to introduce you. I will meet you at the door. Will you come?' Said I, 'I will.'

"I went to the place where I was tarrying. I fixed myself up as well as I could. I buttoned my coat over a ragged vest and went to the door of the church, and the young man met me, and we went in; and as I went in I heard an old man praying, and he looked so much like my father, I sobbed right out and they were all around so kind and sympathetic that I just there gave my heart to God and I know this morning, that what you say is true; I believe it in my own experience." "On Him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all."

O! my brother, without stopping to look as to whether your hand trembles or not, without stopping to look whether your hand is bloated with sin or not, put it in my hand, let me give you one warm, brotherly Christian grip, and invite you right up to the heart, to the compassion, to the sympathy, to the pardon of Him on whom the Lord had laid the iniquity of us all. Throw away your sins. Carry them no longer. I proclaim emancipation this morning to all who are bound, pardon for all sin, and eternal life for all the dead.

SOME ONE COMES HERE

this morning, and I stand aside. He comes up these steps. He comes to this place. I must stand aside. Taking that place He spreads abroad His hands, and they were nailed. You see His feet, they were bruised. He pulls aside the robe and shows you His wounded heart. I say, "Art Thou weary?" "Yes," He says, "weary with the world's woe." I say, "Whence camest Thou?" He says, "I come from Calvary." I say, "Who comes with Thee?" He says, "No one; I have trodden the winepress alone." I say, "Why comest Thou here?" "O!" He says, "I came here to carry all the sins and the sorrows of the people." And He kneels and He says: "Put on my shoulders all the sorrows and all the sins." And conscious of my own sins, first, I take them and put them on the shoulders of the Son of God.

I say: "Canst Thou bear any more, O Christ?" He says, "Yea, more." And I gather up the sins of all those who serve at these altars, the officers of the church of Jesus Christ—I gather up all their sins and I put them on Christ's shoulders, and I say: "Canst Thou bear any more?" He says: "Yea, more." Then I gather up all the sins of a hundred people in this house and I put them on the shoulders of Christ, and I say: "Canst Thou bear more?" He says, "Yea, more." And I gather up all the sins of this assembly and I put them on the shoulders of the Son of God and I say: "Canst Thou bear them?" "Yea," He says, "more."

But He is departing. Clear the way for Him, the Son of God. Open the door and let Him pass out. He is carrying our sins and bearing them away. We shall never see them again. He throws them down into the abyss, and you hear the long reverberating echo of their fall. "On Him the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all." Will you let Him take your sins to-day? or do you say, "I will take charge of them myself, I will fight my own battles, I will risk eternity on my own account?" O! brother, then you will perish. I know not how near some of you have come to crossing the line.

A clergyman said in his pulpit one Sabbath: "Before next Saturday night, one of this audience will have passed out of life." A gentleman said to another seated next to him: "I don't believe it; I mean to watch, and if it doesn't come true by next Saturday night, I shall tell that clergyman his falsehood." The man seated next to him said: "Perhaps it will be yourself." "O! no," the other replied, "I shall live to be an old man." That night he breathed his last.

To-day, the Saviour calls. All may come. God never pushes a man off. God never destroys anybody. The man jumps off, he jumps off. It is suicide—soul suicide—if the man perishes, for the invitation is, "Whosoever will, let him come." Whosoever, whosoever, whosoever!

There may be in this audience just one man who will reject the Gospel. It seems to me that the vast multitude will see that the Gospel is reasonable and they will surrender themselves to God; but there may be in this house just one who will refuse the Gospel, and pass out and pass down. Let me take solemn leave of such an one. Watch cautiously your health, for when your life ceases here, all pleasant experiences cease. Walk not near the scaffolding lest a brick or a stone should fall and you should be ushered into a world for which you have no preparation. To-morrow morning you will go over to the store, or the bank, or the factory, and they will say: "Where were you on the Sabbath?" You will say, "I was at the Tabernacle and I heard the Gospel preached; there were some things in the sermon I didn't believe, I could not receive, I could not accept." And so the days will go by, and the hours and the moments until after a while eternity will rush upon you. I am speaking to just that one soul. Farewell, thou doomed spirit. As thou shovest off from hope I waive thee this salutation. O! it is hard to part forever. I bid thee a long, a last, a bitter,

AN ETERNAL ADIEU!

"While God invites, how blest the day,
How sweet the Gospel's charming sound
Come, sinner, haste, oh, haste away,
While yet a pardoning God is found."

In this day of merciful visitation, while many are coming into the kingdom of God, join the procession Heavenward.

Seated here during the last service we had was a man who came in and said: "I don't know that there is any God." That was on Friday night. I said: "We will kneel down and find out whether there is any God." And in the second seat from the pulpit we knelt. He said: "I have found Him. There is a God, a pardoning God. I feel Him here." He knelt in the darkness of sin. He arose two minutes afterward in the liberty of the Gospel; while another sitting under the gallery on Friday night said: "My opportunity is gone; last week I might have been saved, not now; the door is shut." And another from the very midst of the meeting, during the week, rushed out the front door of the Tabernacle, saying: "I am a lost man."

"Behold! the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." "Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation." "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that—the judgment!"

A Son of the Pretended Mormon Prophet

Joseph Smith attended a public meeting in Chicago a few days ago to denounce polygamy. The Chicago correspondent of a contemporary says that Smith is himself a Mormon, but an uncompromising opponent of polygamy, which he claims does not belong to the system, but has been fastened upon it by gross sensualists. Resolutions were adopted at the meeting declaring "that the Constitution and fundamental authority of the United States Government ought to mean exactly the same thing in Utah as in Illinois, in Idaho as in Ohio;" and "that Mormonism with its recognized disloyalty and defiance, should have given it quick and utter ending."

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 167.)

Capt. Vaughan's Release—He and Sylph Hidden—Sylph Urges Rossiter to Leave the Insurgents—Rossiter's Love Revived—His Resolve to Win Her—Reproached for His Absence—Reprimanded by the Insurgent Court—Hears of Abandonment of the French Expedition.

THE generous self-surrender and romantic boldness, at all events, thrilled the hearts of the Celtic multitude addressed by Miles Rossiter. Their fierce resentment and thirst for revenge were all subdued and quenched in a moment; and the rebel camp, which had lately rung with angry shouts for vengeance, rang more loudly still with the cries of "Bravo, Rossiter!" "None shall hurt a hair of yer head, that's shure; yer an honor to us, and disarve to get all ye ask." "Take yer Englishman, an' welcome, with ye, and we hope he'll never forget that he owes his life to a good Irishman." "Hurrah! Erin go bragh!" All their truculence of aspect was gone, transformed into sunshine.

"Come, let us be going at once," Miles said to Sylph and the man he had rescued. "There is no knowing how long this enthusiasm will last. Follow me, and I will get my men to surround us. I know a farmer in the neighborhood who will give you shelter, at least until affairs in the district will permit of your getting in safety to your friends."

With their hearts uplifted to heaven in sincere gratitude for this unexpected deliverance, Sylph and Captain Vaughan did not need to be urged to quit a scene of so much ghastly terror—a place of experiences, so intense in their wretchedness, that never would they fade from their minds, so long as memory held its seat. Keeping close to Miles, they soon found themselves on the way from the camp, having on either hand his band of riflemen. Corny also, who had been an anxious looker-on during the whole of the late proceedings, had fallen in behind his mistress. No attempt was made to intercept their progress; and in due time they arrived at the place of refuge which Miles had spoken of.

Sylph and Captain Vaughan, however, were not to be lodged under the same roof. Miles, we fear, had his own jealous reasons for this. Sylph, it was arranged, should abide at one farm-house, about two miles from the camp, and Captain Vaughan, half a mile off, in another. And neither was to appear outside doors—"for," said Miles, and his words were confirmed by both the hospitable farmers, "the whole district is scourged by insurgent bands in search of all persons opposed to the national outbreak."

The rebel camp was maintained on Vinegar Hill from 29th May to 21st June, when it was stormed by General Lake, with dreadful slaughter of the insurgents. During the three weeks of occupation, Musgrave, a historian of the Rebellion, declares that no less than five hundred persons, sentenced by the court-martial in session near the Old Mill, were massacred. Only twenty-four of them, however, suffered death on the first day, although upon it, the rebels must have been full of heat and fury from their recent victory.

Our account of Captain Vaughan's trial and escape would furnish a reason for this. His case took up a long time; and the incidents of his release damped for a while the sanguinary ardor of the rebels.

Miles, after safely hiding Captain Vaughan and Sylph, prepared to return to the rebel camp. "I hate most of their proceedings up there," he said to Sylph. "The plunder of the houses of the gentry around I could perhaps excuse, for it is usual in war, but these cold-blooded murders on the hill I cannot away with. They are infamous."

"Then turn from these men," said Sylph, "and come back to your allegiance."

"I owe no allegiance to the English power, Sylph," he replied. "See! I am a French officer," and he showed her his commission signed in due form. "Eight years ago I entered the French army as a friend to the political principles for which it battled; which principles as you know I learned from dear Doctor Gilbert. I am proud to tell you

I joined as a volunteer in the ranks, but have won my way to a captaincy."

Sylph smiled at the young man's pardonable exultation, to the delight of Miles, who took it as a token of her approval and admiration. "I am sure you have won your distinction bravely," she said, "but it is only a further argument for withdrawing yourself from those cruel fanatics on the hill."

"Ah!" he said, "you do not know how I am placed. I am awaiting a French landing, the particulars of which I must not tell even you, Sylph. When it is effected, these atrocities will be discountenanced and put down. Meanwhile (as in the case of your companion), I may, by my presence on the hill, save life and mitigate these horrors."

"But farewell, Sylph," and he clasped her hand. "I must now return to the camp with my men; but if I can I shall run over again in the evening. Until then, take the very best care of yourself," and he spoke this with a demonstrative solicitude.

Miles accompanied his men to Vinegar Hill, the subject of strong and varied emotions. The sight of Sylph and of her courage, and his short interview with her had fanned into a glow the old passion which years ago first took possession of his heart as he looked upon her from the window of his invalid chamber in the house in the Rows, at Chester. The extraordinary circumstances under which it was his fortune to recognize her, served to fling around her, in his imagination, the halo of romance. The vision he had suddenly caught of her, her beauty marvellously and strangely enhanced by the glow of a lofty resolve and a martyr's courage, left an impression upon him so living and powerful, that it renewed itself again and again upon his thoughts. His whole conception of her as the very ideal of female charm and loveliness was not belied; rather must be added to it, he said within himself, the virtues of a heroic soul and of a sublime devotedness. "Could I win her," thought Miles, "I should be a man to be envied by the world."

As Miles Rossiter revolved the question in his mind again and again, "Is it possible for me to win Sylph Somers?" the difficulties which lay in his way seemed insurmountable. "I am an officer in the French service," he thought, "and I am also an insurgent chief, compromised in this outbreak, which is most uncertain of success, and even if successful, would the English-born girl ever give up British rule to live with me under either a French or an Irish Republic. How can I think it? or how could I propose it to her?"

"And yet—and yet how can I exist without her? She has drawn into and around herself my very being, and I am lost in her. Life without her would be a desolation and a darkness—a blank wretchedness that I cannot contemplate. I must either win her or die."

"Win her," his thoughts again echoed to themselves, "if I could but awaken in Sylph the all-subduing passion that masters my own bosom, who can tell what it would inspire her to do? Women before this have sacrificed country, kindred, home, wealth, everything, for those who had won their affection. Sylph is capable of the greatest self-sacrifice. Every fact of her history which I know attests this. Then win her heart I will and shall!" he cried. "Oh, may heaven give good speed to this my most sacred enterprise!"

So Miles described it, since, no doubt, he thought it so; but also, it may be, because in his desperate case he felt no power but that of heaven could bring him success; and he would enlist its aid by giving a good name to the arduous project before him.

When he reached the rebel camp he was met with sinister cries. Father John, who had left in the morning with a large body of men to carry on "the holy war," as it was called, by an attack on the town of Wexford, had sent back word to Vinegar Hill that "he had learned from scouts that a large body of military was on its way from Duncannon Fort to the town he meant to attack; that he wished to assail them at the foot of the Forth Mountain, beyond Wexford town, and ordered up all his reinforcements."

Several men prepared at once to leave the camp in obedience to this direction, but when Rossiter and his men were looked for to accompany them, nowhere could they be found. Coming now, when it was too late to march thence beyond the town of Wexford, excite jeers and angry taunts of the non-combatant maining on the hill, and especially of the women.

Amid hisses, and hoots, and groans, these threats were heard—"Dissarters!" "Cowards!" "Thraitors!" "Yees good min, indeed." "Yee havn't the courage of hares, yees havn't." "Nice ye have managed, like sleeveens that yee to be out of the way whin yees war wan." "The fathers o' big families have had to go risk their lives, while yees young min, wid no depindin' on yees, whin invited to the front nowhere." "If yees meant to show the feather in this way, why didn't ye, purshu yees, lave yer guns, anny way, behind ye? good min, that won't turn tail, might have thim wid them, and not be with nothin' switches o' pikes in their han's to meet bums and cannons." "Our husbands and gray-he fathers, all knocked into smithereens, 'll be brc home to us, kilt and massacred, and all bec o' yees." And some viragos, in their mad took up stones to pelt the armed band of y men headed by Miles, who, as they contended proved recreant.

In vain did Miles attempt to excuse himself, vain did he tell them that, for personal reasons, Father John would not have accepted his assistance; in vain would it have been if he explained the chief reason of all—namely, that he had escaped from the thralldom of the Romish priesthood, was feeling his way towards the light and life which he knew Christ alone could give. And more than vain was his explanation that he was bound both by good manners and the claims of duty honor, to conduct the prisoners reprieved by court-martial to a place of safety.

"Aye, that's just it," shouted out a termagant whose good man had been forced from her arm fight in the expected battle, "ye care more be for the enemy than fur yer own side, so ye purshuin' to ye; and I shuldn't at all wondh that English lady, with her wax-doll face, ha bewitched ye, so that gallavantin' after her it have been, and lettin', holus-polus, from yer dhuty both to yer cumrades and yer counth."

Miles's face reddened at this charge, for he was conscious there was, at all events, a modicum of truth in it. He felt ashamed and indignant, however, that such disorder should be permitted in camp; that such coarse and violent women, should set themselves foremost as heroines and representatives of the national cause; and that men and himself should be subjected to such a rillous invective. "Quick march; forward!" cried to his men. "Suffer no one to bar your way. I mean to see those who claim authority here, and to ask them who is responsible for such riotous disgraceful conduct."

Miles, however, did not reap much comfort from his recourse to headquarters on the hill. His pause in the work of death near the old mill, occasioned by his remonstrance and appeal earlier in the day, had ended; and the inquisition of blood had only become more unsparing from its temporary cessation. Miles was just in time to see an unfortunate gentleman piked, a rebel on either side giving the lunge of death—his body then, by the same weapons, raised on high and contemptuously flung over the precipice. At the dreadful sight shuddered, the whole moral nature of the young man feeling outraged and horrified.

He stamped with indignation; he uttered a vexed and loud cry of protest; he even half drew his sword, which actions did not serve, as may be supposed, to gain from the insurgent authorities a favorable hearing of his complaint against the leaders at the lower part of the hill. With a frolic the president told him "that he had better mind what he was about and not dare menace the men who were performing an unwelcome but wholesome duty for their country. That he'd well to take to heart the lesson he had received from his patriotic countrywomen, of whom he could plained. That no half-hearted services would suit the present emergency. That they knew quite well what they were about, ridding the land of tyrants and reptiles;" and the whole tirade against his interference was wound up with the recommendation "that he, too, should attend to his business and not tempt from the camp, on his own account, men who constituted the most capable part of the forces of the Irish Republic."

Miles bit his lip at this closing insinuation; although it had, perhaps, some foundation, it was a charge, at the same time, he felt most unjust and ungenerous. If he had subverted his own private ends in that he had left the camp and took his men with him, it had also, he knew, greatly advantaged the public interest. It would have been a disgrace to the general cause if released prisoners were set upon and murdered, of which crime there was danger if his men had not formed an escort; and besides this, if his immediate followers were confessed to be the flower of the rebel army, that they were so, and, indeed, combatants at all, was due completely to himself. He had not only trained them, it was owing altogether to his personal influence and enthusiasm that they had joined in the insurrection.

He felt himself, however, completely in the power of his traducers, and saw that to wrangle with them would be altogether foolish and vain. He resolved, therefore, to suppress his wrath. The French expedition would soon land on the Irish coast, he reflected; he would then bid farewell to the fanatic rabble on the hill; would take his due and proper place as captain in the French ranks; and would help them both to subdue the British soldiery, and keep in check the excesses of his fanatical, impulsive, and undisciplined countrymen.

Alas! for the hopes and prospective intentions of Miles. Before an hour passed, he had information conveyed to him through a messenger who had landed from a boat that had pushed into a cove on the Wexford coast, "That the project of a French expedition was abandoned; and that he was to inform the insurgent leaders that they must rely solely upon their own efforts, for that France, at the present moment, could only give them her good wishes."

(To be continued.)

THE MISSION OF THE TWELVE.

S.S. Lesson for April 2, Mark 6: 1-13. Golden Texts, ver. 12; Matt. 10: 40. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN the course of our lessons we follow Jesus into His own country; His disciples, the chosen twelve, are with Him, perhaps others also. The Sabbath day comes round, and Jesus, who has probably been staying in the house of Joseph, begins to teach in the synagogue. His sermon is an unusual one; He takes the Word of God, reads Isaiah 61: 1, 2, in the power of the Holy Ghost, and a marvellous impression is made, every eye is fixed on the Reader. He closes the book, gives it to the minister, and sits down. There is no excitement, no attempt to produce an effect, but the power of the Holy Ghost has been in every word, in every tone, and the audience are sensible of an unwonted something which awes them. The scribes have often read these words, they are not unknown, but now they thrill like something living. "This day," says the Reader, "is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke 4: 21). It was but a step to turn from the Word to the Person, and at this they are stumbled. They bear Him witness and wonder at the gracious words which proceed out of His mouth; the doctrine, the ideas are so lovely; the healing of the broken-hearted, the deliverance of the captives, the recovering of sight to the blind—all this is beautiful. But

NOW COMES THE TEST;

"I, the Anointed One, am here, ready to do these things, to do them now, and to do them to you." They feel the power, but their wills are not ready for a full surrender; they do not want the power of God to operate on them personally, they would rather keep God at a distance. Satan is at hand to furnish them with an excuse; he suggests, "How can this man be the Anointed of God?"

and so they begin to say, "From whence hath this man these things? and what wisdom is this which is given unto Him, that even such mighty works are wrought by His hands? Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and of Juda, and Simon? and are not His sisters here with us? And they were offended at Him."

Alas! this kind of thing is not confined to the days of our Lord. Again and again we have seen that when any one is healed of disease by simple obedience to the scriptural injunction in James 5: 14 (the only command to the sick in the whole Word of God) every kind of criticism is let loose; it is declared that the whole disease has been only fancy, that the healed cripple could have walked before if he had chosen, that the spinal patient who for many years could not sit or walk, and now can use more exertion than many who have never been invalids, might have done the same before if she had only possessed the resolution. It seems strange to us that if this is so, the doctors who attended these cases never found it out. But the real, sad, grievous thing is, that men do not like to see and acknowledge the hand of the living God in active operation around them; they don't like this message which they who preach the Gospel and heal the sick are charged to deliver, "Notwithstanding, be ye sure of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you" (Luke 10: 11).

Jesus had one word to speak to the men of Nazareth, "A prophet is not without honor, but in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house. And He could there do no mighty work, save that He laid His hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them." He could not—Jesus, the Son of God, incapable, what is this? "Why shouldest Thou be as a man astonished, as

A MIGHTY MAN THAT CANNOT SAVE?" (Jer. 14: 9). There is one answer, "Because of your unbelief" (Matt. 17: 20). God does not deal with us as irresponsible creatures, the co-operation of our will and our faith is a condition with which He will not dispense for the doing of His mighty works. It was at this same time that He said, "I tell you of a truth, many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land; but unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Eliseus the prophet; and none of them was cleansed, saving Naaman the Syrian" (Luke 4: 25-27). God was ready, and His prophet was ready, to come to the succor of any widow who would believe and would have to do immediately with God, but they would not, and so they perished. Elisha was ready to send any number of lepers to the Jordan or elsewhere to test their faith and obedience, and to bring them in real close contact with the Lord their Physician (Ex. 15: 26, Heb.); but they took it for granted that because other lepers were not healed they could not expect healing, and so they bore their curse to the grave with them.

"And He went round about the villages teaching." Jesus had only three years and a half in which to exercise His ministry, but He found time to spend whole nights alone in prayer, not in an all-night prayer-meeting, but an all-night alone with God; and He found time to preach in the villages to the poor, uneducated, and undeveloped country people. "And He called unto Him the twelve, and began to send them forth by two and two." By this means no one among them would run the risk of hero worship, and there could also be prayerful sympathy in the work. And He "gave them power over unclean spirits." If it had been otherwise how could those who were possessed take in their teaching? it would have been lost time. How can one who is possessed by opium or drink apprehend the truths of the Gospel? The poor creature is a slave to the demon who governs him, he is not free to think, or speak, or act apart from the fatal influence; let the slave be set free from his master, and then he can yield himself to God as His freeman. Let one possessed by a spirit of uncleanness, of gambling, of monomania, or of violent temper, be brought under the influence of the Gospel, if he cannot be delivered from the bondage which rules all his being, and enslaves all his powers, he cannot follow its precepts; deliverance is what he needs. Christ sent His disciples with word and with power; they were commissioned not only to talk about deliverance, but to deliver; so that they should leave behind them as the track of their passage, men who were set free from the power of the devil, and brought into real conscious contact with God.

He "commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse, but be shod with sandals; and not put on two coats." Why? They were to exemplify a life of faith in God, and to show that they could afford to dispense with all the care and anxiety which makes up the life of most men; they were to prove by experience and manifest to others, that in seeking first the kingdom of God and His righteousness all other things were added to them. While the burden of other men's lives was, "What shall we eat? What shall we drink? Wherewithal shall we be clothed?" these considerations were to be the last in the lives of these first apostles. "And He said unto them, In what place soever ye enter into an house, there abide till ye depart from that place." In the parallel passage (Matt. 10: 12), He said, "When ye come into an house, salute it," i.e., say, "Peace be to this house." They were not lightly to quit a house where God had sent them with the message of peace. If the inhabitants received them, they were not to feel themselves at liberty to move away because the food was bad or ill cooked, or the beds were damp, or the children noisy; because they were not making a pleasure trip in which their own enjoyment was the avowed object, they were on business for the Master, and His interests alone were to be considered.

Preachers with such a spirit would soon turn the world upside down. This is the spirit which animates an old peasant woman in Germany who, possessing a good deal of land and ten farm servants, has her house furnished like the poor, works with her own hands, dresses in the common blue cotton, and gives away to missions with a liberality which would shame the largest donors from a higher class. It becomes an awful sin to refuse the messenger possessed of such a spirit, sent forth by Jesus Himself, with such a message, and endowed with such powers. "Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for that city." "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth Him that sent me." What then about him that rejecteth?

"They went out, and preached that men should repent." But with their preaching there was power, "they cast out many devils." Of powerless preaching we have had enough, we want men to be really delivered, and men when they are at all awake want deliverance. God show us so to live in the power of God that we may be able to bring it to bear upon those who are in any way in the power of the devil. There is more reality than some of us think in expressions which are often used without a full appreciation of their meaning—possessed with a spirit of lying, possessed with an uncontrollable temper, possessed with a spirit of contradiction etc. There is no doubt that the enemy does hold many in his possession through these sins, and they need, and some of them long for, deliverance. O how blessed it is to know that the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin; that it is a real, active power to deliver, and take out from us the sin, like stains from a white garment, like weeds from a garden. And they "anointed many that were sick, and healed them." The outward release from sickness was the lesser work, but it was the indication of how the inward deliverance was effected. Jesus came, and He sent His disciples to put all wrong things right, both in soul and body, that all might be in a state to serve Him. Lord do the same by Thy servants now. Amen.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

Our correspondents will facilitate the business of the Christian Herald Office and ensure prompt attention to their communications, if they exercise discrimination in addressing them. Letters relating to business, and all letters containing remittances should be addressed to THE MANAGER. Letters containing matter for publication or relating to the contents of the paper should be addressed to THE EDITOR.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President Sent to the Senate on Monday March 13th the nomination of Judge Samuel Blatchford, of New York, to be Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. The nomination gives general satisfaction in the Republican Party, to the bar, and to those citizens who have business with the Supreme Court. Judge Blatchford, in the exercise of judicial functions in the District Court of New York and in the United States Circuit Court, has earned an excellent reputation for learning, sound judgment, and indefatigable industry, and his decisions have seldom been reversed on appeal. He is sixty-two years of age; was born in New York; graduated from Columbia College at the age of seventeen; became secretary to William H. Seward when that statesman was Governor of New York; succeeded Judge Betts in the District Court in 1867, and was appointed the successor of Judge Johnson in the United States Circuit Court in 1868. His name is well known to the legal profession as the compiler of Blatchford's Reports.

The Offer of the Associate Justiceship of the Supreme Court to Senator George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, was an act of the President of a very gratifying character. Mr. Edmunds enjoys the respect of the country as an honest, fearless man, of unimpeachable integrity and distinguished abilities, and his appointment would have been generally acceptable. His graceful reply to the letter in which the President offered him the position shows that he was not unmindful of the confidence implied, or of the honor conferred. In declining the President's offer Senator Edmunds is understood to have been actuated by reluctance to leave the Senate and to abandon the pursuit of politics for that of law.

Mr. John Russell Young's Nomination to the Chinese Mission is regarded as a concession to General Grant and the Stalwarts. Mr. Young accompanied General Grant on his tour around the world and devoted much attention to the subject of Eastern questions; he was especially interested in China and is believed to be thoroughly versed in the merits of the questions involved in our diplomatic relations with that country. One of the first breaches between President Garfield's administration and the Stalwarts was caused by his refusal to nominate Mr. Young as Minister to China, a nomination which General Grant is said to have urged. If Mr. Young succeeds in explaining to the Chinese Government the principles which guide our policy in relation to Chinese immigration he will achieve the most remarkable triumph recorded in the annals of diplomacy.

The House of Representatives Passed the anti-polygamy bill on Tuesday, March 14th, by a vote of 199 to 42. It is believed that as the bill renders polygamists ineligible for office and disfranchises them, the question of Mr. Cannon's claim to represent Utah in the House will be rejected. During the progress of the bill many doubts have been expressed as to its utility. On this question weight is given to the opinion of Judge McBride, who has acted as attorney for Mr. Campbell, the non-Mormon contestant for the Utah delegation. Mr. McBride being asked if he thought the new law could be executed, said he thought it could, but that he did not think its execution would take the Territory from the hands of the Mormons. "The Commission," he said, "will doubtless admit the competency of many Mormons who are not polygamists to vote and to hold offices, and the most that can be effected will be to secure a Legislature with a Gentile minority of perhaps one-third. The Mormons, even where they are not polygamists, are all under control of the Church—the most slavish control—and the Gentiles will not make the Territorial laws."

Temperance may in Future be made a Branch of common school education in Connecticut. A communication from Hartford says that on February 23d a bill was passed by a large majority of the House enacting "That if in any town in the State twelve persons of adult years shall petition the Board of School Visitors to order instruction in the public schools concerning the effects of intoxicating beverages on individuals and on the community, the Board of School Visitors shall consider this petition, and, by a formal vote, decide whether or not to grant its request." Temperance workers have now two objects on which to concentrate their attention. They have to take care that every town shall have at least twelve earnest temperance men in it; and then to see that proper persons constitute the Board of School Visitors. If they do this we may hope to see a rapid increase in the temperance vote in that State.

Mr. Lincoln, as Secretary of War, Sent to the Speaker of the House on Friday a report estimating the number of persons made destitute by the overflow of the Mississippi River and its tributaries and the time for which the necessity of Congressional aid will continue. In his communication, Mr. Lincoln estimates the number of persons rendered destitute at 85,000, as follows: Missouri, 2200; Illinois, 2000; Kentucky, 800; Tennessee, 5000; Mississippi, 30,000; Arkansas, 20,000; Louisiana, 25,000; and states that 713,000 rations have been distributed. The communication further states that the appropriation already made is sufficient to purchase 800,000 rations of a substantial kind, and estimates that the supply will be exhausted in Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana about the 31st. No estimate, Mr. Lincoln thinks, can be made of the time during which the necessity for Congressional aid will continue.

The Floods Resulting from the Overflow of the Mississippi are reported as covering a larger area now than they did last week. A telegram to the New York Tribune from New Orleans says that in the Yazoo valley the water is rising rapidly. In the Yazoo Delta, from Vicksburg to Coldwater, a distance by river of over 400 miles, and from the hills on the east to the Mississippi River on the west, forty to sixty miles in width, the greater part of the lowlands is submerged. Much suffering is reported in the overflowed section from Camden, Ark., to the mouth of the Bayou Bartholomew, and from twenty-five miles below Monroe to the mouth of the Black River. Government rations for fifteen days have been sent to this section. The water along the lower Ouachita River is six inches higher than in 1874. In response to a telegram from Governor McEnery, earnestly urging the commercial bodies of New Orleans to appoint a committee to solicit immediate relief for the destitute people, the Cotton Exchange on Saturday held a meeting and resolved to place lists in the hands of a committee and request the members to contribute to the full extent of their ability. The Commissioners appointed by the Governor to distribute government rations will distribute other gifts. The loss of property, chiefly cotton crops, will amount to forty million dollars.

An Educated Indian's Speech Delivered on a recent occasion at a reception in Philadelphia, is an evidence of the useful work being done by the Indian school at Carlisle, Penn. If the pupils at that school all learn the doctrines expressed by the Indian in question it seems a pity that many other people who are not Indians cannot be sent to some school of a like character. Dan, the Indian in question, who belongs to the Arrapahoe tribe, said, "There is nothing so good for the health as work. God knew what was good for men when He told us to work with our hands. The devil tempts everybody, but the idle, lazy man who will not work tempts the devil. He gives plenty of work to all who do not find it themselves. We are told that there are but three ways of living—by working, by begging, and by stealing. Those who do not work do one of the other two. We, at Carlisle school, do not propose either to steal or to beg for a living. When we go back to our homes, we intend to go back with good trades, strong arms, and willing hearts. We will go back to lay the foundations of a new life for our people. We work with good courage now, because we are preparing to do a great good work then."

An Afflicted Town.—An Alarming Outbreak of small-pox occurred at South Bethlehem, Pa., on Monday, March 13th. Over one hundred cases of a virulent type developed in one day, and excitement spread through the town. A telegram to Philadelphia the following day said: This morning the cases are increasing in the most alarming manner. The air is thick with the fumes of tar. Twenty barrels are burning at as many different points. Special policemen are sworn in to compel the strictest quarantine, and the fire department is on duty constantly. Nearly all the cases are in an exceptionally clean section of the town, and nearly all the victims had not been vaccinated. By the end of last week the official report stated that 106 families were afflicted, and there were more than 200 cases in South Bethlehem alone. It is difficult to obtain the exact number, as the Board of Health keeps a record only of afflicted families, and not of individual cases. It is asserted that in some instances the disease has been spread by domestic animals, and all dogs and cats found at large now are being shot. Two small-pox hospitals have been erected, to which all indigent sufferers are removed. Nurses are becoming scarce and the treatment of many cases is meagre and deficient. Business is at a stand still; the streets are deserted and desolate and an impenetrable gloom hangs over the town. All the students at private seminaries and the university have gone to their homes and these institutions are temporarily closed.

The Signatures to the Mormon Petition to Congress in favor of polygamy do not appear to have been so spontaneous as was represented. The Salt Lake Tribune cites an instance of a Mormon brother who said to a Gentile that he had signed the petition to Congress asking them to stay their hand against polygamy because the "authorities" of the Church had commanded it. "But," said he, "I hope to live to see the day when every polygamist will go to the penitentiary."

Prayer for Deliverance from the Scourge of small-pox, which has during the past few months ravaged so many of our cities and towns, was recently offered at Clarinda, Iowa. The Christians of that place saw with apprehension the approach of the epidemic, and agreed together to make it the subject of united prayer for one week that the town might be spared. Prayer was offered, and now it is stated that a day of thanksgiving is appointed, the town having been mercifully passed over by the scourge (Ps. 91: 3-7).

The Fatal Results of a Quarrel are Described in a letter published by a contemporary. The writer says: "The faithful minister has frequent occasion to refer to the uncertainties of life, and to the retribution which is to follow persistence in sin—here, or certainly hereafter. His illustrations are sometimes regarded as purely imaginary or much exaggerated. But here is a well authenticated tragedy which is now current as having occurred only last week. At a barn-raising on the plantation of Major Dews, in Rowan County, North Carolina, John Held and Peter Joseph, two of the workmen on the building, got into a quarrel. Held threw an axe at Joseph, the keen blade splitting his head in two and killing him instantly. As Held threw the axe he lost his foothold and fell from the building, breaking his neck. Three men were on the ground at the time (James Cephas, Richard Willey, and Ned Bloodgood), raising a heavy log. Cephas became so excited at the tragedy that he lost his hold on the log, and it fell, crushing Willey to death. Thus, of the five men at work on the building, only two remained alive."

Major Whittle and Mr. and Mrs. McGranahan are holding meetings in San Francisco, which have been attended by increasing numbers and deep interest has been aroused. They are held at the Howard Presbyterian Church. Both the singing and the earnest appeals of the evangelists have been blessed by God to the awakening of sinners and the conversion of souls. San Francisco journals report that the influence of the meetings has been felt throughout the city.

Remorse has Killed a Convict in the Chicago penitentiary. A man named James Burke, who murdered his brother, October 12th, 1880, died in the penitentiary on March 15th. A petition, numerously signed, for the pardon of Burke was forwarded to the governor the day before he died. After a political meeting, at which the Burke brothers became intoxicated, they started for home, and on the way became involved in a quarrel, which resulted in James stabbing his brother to death. James pleaded guilty, and was given five years in the penitentiary. No cause can be assigned for James' death, except that of a broken heart. He could not rid himself of the grief which he felt for his unfortunate deed, and gradually wasted away under the influence of the sorrow. If, as this fact proves, the reproaches of an awakened conscience are so powerful as to cause death, what must be the state of men who die impenitent and learn when too late the true character of sin (Rom. 2 : 5).

A Lady was Saved from Drowning Recently at Syracuse, N. Y., by her little eight-year old daughter. A daily journal states that Mrs. S. Dodge fell into the canal while crossing on the ice. Her little daughter, eight years of age, was with her, and had the presence of mind to catch hold of her mother's dress when she came to the surface, and held fast, in the meantime screaming for help, despite the protestations of her mother to let go her hold and save herself, as the ice threatened to give away under the child. The cries of the little girl were heard by neighbors, who hastened to the scene and succeeded in extricating Mrs. Dodge from her perilous position. What this little girl did for her mother in that moment of peril the weakest Christian may do for multitudes in danger of perishing; he may not be able to save them himself, but he can cry on their behalf to One who is all-powerful, meanwhile doing all that he can to rescue them.

The Incident of an Invalid Cured through faith and prayer which we mentioned recently as having been telegraphed from Steubenville, O., is more fully and correctly described in a communication from Mrs. Owens herself. From this it appears that about seven weeks ago she was taken ill, and for some time was confined to her bed, after which she slightly recovered, but was at no time able to leave her couch. The symptoms in her case grew more unfavorable, and she made the Bible her constant companion, receiving encouragement from the contents of the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters of John and the numerous promises given to those who trust in the Lord. She called in several friends in the church and requested them to unite their prayers with hers, and there was offered up earnest prayer from the heart that she who was afflicted might be restored. On Wednesday evening about six o'clock, while alone in her chamber, after reading the Bible and going to God in prayer Mrs. Owens felt her strength return, her disease, accompanied with pain, disappeared, and she arose in bed and commenced to dress herself, and in a short time walked the room, to the utter astonishment of her family. The next morning she went about her domestic duties, and with the exception of a feeling of weariness after being on her feet for some hours, experienced good health. Her husband verifies the statements made by his wife, as do other gentlemen acquainted with the family.

An Unsuccessful Litigant's Desperate Fight to retain possession of a house at Scranton, Pa., on February 10th, reminds the reader of our Saviour's illustration of demoniacal control (Luke 11 : 21, 22). A man named Darby Melvin held a house in Mulberry Street, Scranton, and refused to quit, although the judgment in a lawsuit recently decided required him to surrender it. On Friday an effort was made by the Sheriff and his deputies to dislodge him and his wife. The fight for possession lasted over an hour, and was witnessed by more than a thousand persons. Melvin, who was armed to the teeth, fought desperately, and fired through the windows at the Sheriff and his men, who returned the fire. The shooting on both sides was brisk, regardless of the crowd that pressed up against the windows for a glimpse of the man, who fought with the fury of an enraged tiger. The only persons in the house were Melvin and his wife, and each took part in the firing as long as their ammunition lasted, after which the Sheriff forced down the doors and broke in with his deputies. Melvin had retreated to the cellar, where he was found seriously wounded and bleeding profusely.

A Brakeman's Last Trip is Described in a Troy newspaper. He had a brother residing in the West. The two young men by the death of their grandfather became heirs to $14,000, which was left to be equally divided between them. The brakeman had been notified of the bequest, and was on his way to Troy to receive his share of the money. As he started he made known to his fellow-employees the legacy that had fallen to him, at the same time adding in a cheerful way that this was his last trip. Scarcely had an hour passed before the brakeman was a corpse. In the performance of his duties he slipped, fell under a car, and the wheels crushed him into a shapeless mass. When his remains arrived at Troy there was a letter at the Post Office transferring to him $7000. There was something very pathetic in the poor man's words being fulfilled in this tragic sense, especially in view of his brightened worldly prospects. The old adage that there's many a slip twixt the cup and the lip proved sadly true in his case. How different the certainty of the Christian's hope of eternal riches from which nothing can separate him (Rom. 8 : 38, 39).

A Lady who Expected to Become a Duchess has recently awakened to the knowledge that she has been the credulous dupe of swindlers. She lived near San Francisco, and the case has now come before the courts in that city. She was led to believe that a nobleman of England, the Duke of Leicester, had seen her in San Francisco, had been smitten with her charms, and desired to marry her. He was, however, just then ill in Vallejo. A correspondence was opened of the most loving character, and she absolutely believed, as did some of her friends, that she was about to become a duchess. In this belief she sent him several large sums of money to defray the expenses of his illness, and made every preparation for a splendid marriage. At last she discovered that she had been swindled, and that the property she had sent the "duke" had been obtained from her by false pretences, and that no such person existed. She is not the first person who has been duped by the bait of an aristocratic title. If people were as anxious to bear the incomparable title of "children of God" as to wear earthly titles they would realize their hopes and enjoy a happiness preferable to the estate even of kings (Rev. 1 : 6).

OUR LORD BEFORE HEROD.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad: for he was desirous to see Him of a long season, because he had heard many things of Him; and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him. Then he questioned with Him in many words; but He answered him nothing."—Luke 23 : 8, 9.

The Attempt to Exasperate Pilate—Its Unexpected Effect—Combination of Four Judges—I. Herod Before Jesus—Who Herod was—His Spiritual Descendants—Religious Athenians of to-day—Idle Curiosity at its Best—Herod's Hope of a Miracle—His Conscience Asleep—Idle Curiosity Disappointed—George Fox's Two Hours of Silence—Curiosity Turned into Derision—The Symbolical Robe—II. Jesus Before Herod—The Earnest Man Criticized—Jesus Sorrowfully Silent—Questions to You—Did Jesus Bear Sins of Speech?—Of Dress?—Opposition as a Bond of Friendship—Alliance of Superstition and Scepticism.

AFTER Pilate had declared to the chief priests and scribes that he found no fault at all in Jesus, they were afraid that their victim would escape, and therefore their fury was raised to the highest pitch, and they cried out the more vehemently against Him. In the course of their outcries they made use of the word "Galilee;" going, as it seems to me, a little out of their way in order to drag in the name: "He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." Galilee was a region held in very great contempt, and they mentioned it to cast a slur upon our Lord, as if He were a mere boor from among the clowns of Galilee.

To Pilate they thought that the mention of the name would, perhaps, act like the proverbial red rag held before an infuriated bull; for he appears to have been troubled by seditious persons from that province. We all remember that they were Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. The Galileans were reputed to be an ignorant people, apt to be led astray by impostors, and so enthusiastic that they ventured their lives against the Romans. The priests would not only cast contempt upon Jesus, whom they were wont to call the Galilean, but also excite the prejudices of Pilate, so that he might condemn Him to die as one of a nest of rebels.

They were mistaken, however, in the consequences of their device, for Pilate caught at the word "Galilee" directly. That province was not immediately under his rule; it was under the sway of the tetrarch Herod Antipas, and therefore he thought within himself, "I can kill two birds with one stone: I can get rid of this troublesome business by sending this prisoner to Herod, and I can also greatly gratify the king by showing him this attention." Pilate had quarrelled with Herod, and now for some purpose of his own he resolved to patch up a friendship by pretending great deference to his sovereign powers by sending one of his subjects to be tried by him. Pilate, therefore, asked, "Is this man a Galilean?" and when they told him that He was so—for He was so by repute, His birth at Bethlehem having been wilfully ignored—then Pilate at once commanded that He be led to Herod, for Herod was in his palace at Jerusalem attending the Passover festival.

See, then, my brethren, our divine Master conducted in His third march of sorrow through Jerusalem. First, He was led from the garden to the house of Annas, then He was conducted through the streets from the hall of Caiaphas to the judgment hall of Pilate, and now by Pilate's orders He is led a third time by the angry crowd of priests through the streets to the palace of Herod, there to await His fourth examination. Certain of the old writers delight to remark that as there were four evangelists to do honor to our Lord, so were there four judges to do Him shame—Annas and Caiaphas, Pilate and Herod. We are on safer ground when we observe with the early church the coalition of the heathen and the Jews: "For of a truth against Thy holy child Jesus, whom Thou hast anointed, both Herod, and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever Thy hand and Thy counsel determined before to be done."

This morning I shall endeavor to set forth this portion of the sad narrative under two heads, which will be these: Herod before Jesus, and Jesus before Herod.

I. I call your attention first to because you must know something of his character, something of the meaning of his questions, before you can rightly understand the sorrow which they caused to Jesus our Lord and Master.

HEROD BEFORE JESUS,

This Herod Antipas was the son of the old Herod the Great, who had put to death the babes at Bethlehem in the hope of destroying the King of the Jews. He was a chip of the old block, but still he was several degrees baser than his sire. There was nothing of the grandeur of his father about him; there was the same evil disposition without the courage and the decision. He did not in some things out-Herod Herod, for in certain points he was a more despicable person. Herod the Great may be called a lion, but our Lord very descriptively called this lesser Herod a fox, saying, "Go and tell that fox." He was a man of dissolute habits and frivolous mind; he was very much under the sway of a wicked woman, who destroyed any little good there might have been in him; he was a lover of pleasure, a lover of himself, depraved, weak, and trifling to the last degree. I almost grudge to call him a man, therefore let him only be called a tetrarch.

This petty tetrarch had once been the subject of religious impressions. These Herods all more or less felt the influence of religion at times, though they were by no means benefited thereby. The impressions made upon his conscience by John did not last with Herod. They were at first powerful and practical, for we are informed that "Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and a holy, and observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly." I suppose he reformed many matters in his kingdom, and cast off perhaps some of his grosser vices; but when at last John began to denounce him for having taken his brother's wife to be his paramour, while yet the brother lived, he cast his reprover into prison, and then you remember how, with reluctance, Herod, to please his mistress, beheaded John in prison.

Mark this: probably there is no more dangerous character living than a man who has once come under religious influences so as to be materially affected by them, and yet has broken loose and cast off all fear of God. He has done despite to his conscience so violently that henceforth he will know few qualms. The mind of Herod Antipas was in the condition of the chamber which has been swept and garnished, for his life had been somewhat reformed, but the unclean spirit with the terrible seven had come back to his old den, and now he was a worse man by a great deal than he had ever been before. This Herod was an Idumean, that is to say, one of the descendants of Esau, an Edomite, and though he had professedly become a Jew, yet the old blood was in him, as it is written concerning Edom, "He did pursue his brother with the sword, and cast off all pity."

Herod was in such a state of mind that he furnishes me with a typical character which I would use for the instruction and admonition of you all. He is a type of some who frequently come to this Tabernacle, and go to other places of worship occasionally—people who were once under religious impressions, and cannot forget that they were so, but who will never be under any religious impressions again. They are now hardened into vain curiosity; they wish to know about everything that is going on in the church and kingdom of Christ, but they are far enough from caring to become part and parcel of it themselves. They are possessed with an idle curiosity which would lift the golden lid of the ark, and intrude behind the veil. They like to gather together all the absurd stories which are told about ministers and to retail all the odd remarks that were ever made by preachers for centuries. All the gossip of the churches is sure to be known to them, for they eat up the sins of God's people as they eat bread.

It is not likely that their knowledge of religious things will be of any use to them, but they are ever eager after it; the church of God is their lounge, divine service is their theatre, ministers are to them as actors, and the Gospel itself so much play-house property. They are a sort of religious Athenians, spending their time in nothing else than in hearing some new thing; hoping that perhaps some singular and unexpected discourse may be delivered in their hearing which they can retail in the next company where they would raise a laugh. To them preaching is all a farce, and, worked up with a few falsehoods of their own, it makes excellent fun for them, and causes them to be regarded as amusing fellows. Let them look at Herod, and see in him their leader, the type of what they really are or may soon become.

First, let us see

IDLE CURIOSITY AT ITS BEST.

Look here, sirs, and then look in a glass and trace the likeness.

To begin with, we find that Herod's curiosity had been created in him by his having heard many things concerning Jesus. How did he come to hear of Him? His great deeds were common talk; all Jerusalem rang with the news of His miracles and wondrous words. Herod, a convert to the Jewish faith, such as he was, took interest in anything that was going on among the Jews, and all the more so if it touched upon the kingdom, for the jealousy which set his father in a rage was not altogether absent in his son.

No doubt also he had heard of Christ from John. John would not long have preached to Herod without using his own grand text, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." I am sure that, though he was a preacher of righteousness, he had not left off being the herald of the coming Saviour; and so from the stern lips of the great Baptist, Herod had heard concerning His kingdom. When John was dead Herod heard still more of Christ, so that, astonished with what was being done, he said, "This is John the Baptist whom I have beheaded; he is risen from the dead." Jesus became a kind of nightmare to his conscience; he was disturbed and alarmed by what he heard that the prophet of Nazareth was doing.

Besides that, there was one in his household who doubtless knew a great deal about the Saviour; for in Herod's court was the husband of a woman who ministered unto the Lord of her substance. The lady's name was Joanna, and her husband was Chuza, Herod's steward—I suppose Herod's butler and manager of his household. From Chuza he could readily have learned concerning Jesus, and we may be sure that he would enquire, for the fear of the great prophet was upon him. Thus Herod's curiosity had been excited about our Lord Jesus Christ for a considerable time, and he longed to see Him. I am not sorry when this happens to any of my hearers; I am glad that they should hear something about the Lord from His friends, something about Him from His ministers, and from those of us whose highest glory it is that, though we are not worthy to unloose the latches of His shoes, yet it is all our business to cry, "Behold the Lamb!"

It is said of Herod, in consequence of this curiosity, that he rejoiced to see Jesus. It is said that he was "exceeding glad." What a hopeful state to be in! May we not expect great things when a man sees Jesus and is exceeding glad? As I read this passage to myself, I thought, Why, the language might well describe a child of God; but yet the meaning was not the high and spiritual one which we could put into it, it was a frivolous gladness, because he hoped that now his curiosity would be satisfied. He hoped to see Him work a miracle, even He, of whom the record was, "He hath done all things well." Could not the great prophet be induced to multiply loaves and fishes? Might He not persuade Him to heal a blind beggar, or make a lame man leap as a hart? Would not a miracle make rare mirth in Herod's palace, and cause a new sensation in the mind of the worn-out debauchee? If, for instance, a corpse were dug up, and Jesus would restore it to life, it would be something to tell of when next the king sat down to a drinking bout with Herodias and her like. When each was trying to exceed the other in telling strange tales Herod would match them all!

In this style many people come to hear the Gospel. They want to have an anecdote of their own about a notorious preacher, and if they do not see something ludicrous, or hear something striking, they will invent a tale, and swear that they heard it and saw it, though the lie might well choke them. They act thus because they come to hear for nothing but to feed their hungry curiosity. None carry this to such an extreme as those who did at one time feel a measure of the power of the Word of God, but have shaken it off. These are the mockers whose bands are made strong; these are the idlers who turn even the testimony of the Lord into food for mirth. Still, at the first blush, there is something that looks very hopeful about them, and we are pleased that they exhibit such gladness when Christ is set forth before them.

One ill sign about Herod was the fact that after having for a while troubled him. For a little he had been afraid of Jesus, and trembled lest John had risen from the dead; but that fear had subsided, and superstition had given way before his Sadducean scepticism. He hoped that Jesus would perform some wonderful thing in his presence; but he had lost all dread of the Just and Holy One. He was a man of vain mind; the man whom he feared one day he murdered the next, and he whom he welcomed with gladness, he hurried off with derision. There was left to Herod no feeling towards Jesus but the craving after something new, the desire to be astonished, the wish to be amused. I think I see him now, sitting on his throne, expectant of wonders, like the trifler that he was.

HIS CONSCIENCE HAD GONE TO SLEEP

When Jesus was set before him he began to ask Him questions: "Then he questioned with Him in many words." I am glad the questions are not recorded; they could have done us no good; and, besides, our modern Herods nowadays are great masters of the art, and need not that any man teach them. We need not to be furnished with the old-fashioned quibbles and questions; for the supply is quite equal to our requirements. Fools can ask more questions in ten minutes than wise men are able to answer in fifty years.

The curious in religion are generally very apt at question-asking; not that they want Christ, nor that they want heaven, nor that they want pardon of sin, nor that they want any good thing; but still they would like to know everything that is dark and mysterious in theology; they would like to have a list of the difficulties of belief, a catalogue of the curiosities of spiritual experience. Some men collect ferns, others are learned upon beetles, and these persons pry into church life, its doctrines, pursuits, aims, and infirmities—especially the latter. They could write a book upon orthodox England and unorthodox England, and dwell with unction upon mental vagaries. It furnishes them with something new, and adds to their store of information, and so they spare no prying questions; for they would analyze manna from heaven and distil the tears of Christ; nothing is sacred to them; they put Scripture on the rack, and cavil at the words of the Holy Ghost.

Thus have I set forth idle curiosity in its better stage. Now let us pass on and see how Jesus treated this curiosity, considering it under the head of

IDLE CURIOSITY DISAPPOINTED.

"He questioned with Him in many words, but He answered him nothing!" If Herod had wanted to believe, Jesus would have been ready enough to instruct; if Herod had possessed a broken heart, Jesus would have hastened with tender words to bind it up; if Herod had been a candid inquirer, his doubts had been sincere and true, the faithful and true Witness, the Prince of the kings of the earth, would have been delighted to speak with him. But Jesus knew that Herod would not believe in Him and would not take up his cross and follow Him; and therefore He would not waste words on a heartless, soulless profligate. All the Master did was to maintain an absolute silence in his presence; and, let him question as he might, "He answered him nothing."

Observe, my brethren, that our Lord Jesus Christ came not into this world to be a performer ; He did not leave His glory to earn the wondering approbation of men ; and as Herod regarded Him as a mere wonder-worker, and would have turned his court into a theatre wherein Jesus should be the chief actor, our Lord very wisely held His peace and did nothing at all. And sometimes His ministers might be wise if they were silent too. If they know that men have no desire to learn, no spiritual wish or aspiration, I say they might be wise if they held their tongue altogether.

I have sometimes admired George Fox, who, on one occasion, when the crowd had gathered round him, expecting him to deliver some fiery address, stood still by the space of two hours while they clamored that he would speak. Never a word did they get from him. He said he would famish them of words ; for words were all they wanted, and not the power of the Spirit. Probably they recollected his silence better than they would have remembered his most vehement discoursing. Sometimes silence is all that men deserve, and the only thing which in any probability will impress them. As the Lord Jesus was no performer, He did not gratify Herod, but answered him not a word.

Ah, sirs, you cannot trifle with religious impressions with impunity. God thinks it no trifle. He who has once been moved in his soul and has put away the heavenly word from him, may fear that it will be said of him, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." Ephraim is joined to idols : let him alone." May not some conscience here, if it has but a little life in it, be alarmed at the memory of former rejections of the Gospel, frequent quenchings of the Spirit, repeated trappings upon the blood of Jesus ? If God never speaks to you again in the way of mercy, you have no right to expect that He should do so ; and if from this day to the day of judgment the Lord should never give you another word of mercy, who shall say that you have been treated harshly ? Have you not deserved it at His hands as Herod had done ?

Furthermore, recollect that Herod might have heard Christ hundreds of times before if he had chosen to do so. Dear hearers, beware how you waste your Sabbaths. There may come a day when you would give a thousand worlds for another Sabbath, but it shall be denied you. There may come a day when you would count out all your wealth to have another invitation to Christ, but it will be denied you ; for you must die, and the voice of mercy will never ring in your ears again. They that will not when they may, shall not when they would. Many will knock after the Master of the house has risen up and shut to the door ; but when He shutteth, no man openeth.

THE DOOR WAS SHUT ON HEROD.

Observe, that our Master had good reason for refusing to speak to Herod this time, over and above what I have mentioned ; because He would not have it supposed that He yielded to the pomp and dignity of men. Jesus never refused an answer to the question of a beggar ; but He would not gratify the curiosity of a king. He wants nothing of the murderer of John the Baptist. Had Herod been the poorest and most loathsome leper throughout all Judea, had he been the meanest mendicant in the street, who was lame or blind, his voice would at once have been heard by the Lord of mercy ; but He will not answer the prince who hopes for homage at His hands, nor feed the idle wishes of a crafty reprobate. What favor did He want at Herod's hand ? He had not come to be set free ; He had come to die, and therefore His face is set like a flint, and, with heroic courage, He answers him not a word.

Now, then, you have seen frivolous curiosity at its best, and you have seen it disappointed, as it generally is to this day. If people come to hear the Gospel out of this frivolous curiosity, they usually retire saying, "Really, I do not see anything in it. We have heard nothing eloquent, nothing profound, nothing outrageous. Just so ; there is nothing in the Gospel to please the luxurious, though everything to bless the poor. Jesus answered Herod nothing, and He will answer you nothing if you are of Herod's order. It is the doom of triflers that they should get no answer from the Gospel ; neither the Scriptures, nor the ministry, nor the Spirit of God, nor the Lord Jesus will speak with them.

What was the result of this disappointment upon Herod ? Idle curiosity curdles into derision. He thinks the man is a fool, if not an idiot, and he says so, and begins to deride him. With his men of war he mocks Him, and "set Him at nought," which signifies to make nothing of Him. He calls his soldiers and says, "Look at this creature ; He will not answer a word to what I have to say ; is He bereft of His senses ? Rouse Him up, and see." Then they mock and laugh and jest and jeer. "Here," says Herod, "He calls Himself a king ! Bring out one of my shining white robes, and put it on Him ; we will make a king of Him." So they put it about His blessed person, and again heap contumely upon Him. Was it not strange—this decking Him in a gorgeous robe of dazzling white ?

The mediæval writers delight to dwell on the fact that Herod arrayed our Lord in white and afterwards Pilate clothed Him in red. Is He not the Lily of the valley and the Rose of Sharon ? Is He not matchlessly white for innocence, and then gloriously red in His atoning blood ? Thus, in their very mockery, they are unconsciously setting forth to us both His spotless holiness and His majestic royalty. When they had insulted to their full, they sent Him back to Pilate, kicking Him from foot to foot at their pleasure, as if He were a football for their sport. Then our Lord made His fourth sorrowful march through the streets of the city over which He had wept.

That is what idlers in the long run do with Christ ; in their disappointment they grow weary of Him and His Gospel, and they cry, "Put Him away ; there is nothing in Him, nothing of what we looked for, nothing to satisfy curiosity, nothing sensational ; take Him away." Away goes Jesus, never to return ; and that is the end of Herod, and the end of a great many more.

II. My time is nearly gone ; but bear with me while for a few minutes I try to set forth

JESUS BEFORE HEROD.

Although no blows are recorded, I greatly question whether our divine Master suffered anywhere more than He did in the palace of Herod. You and I, perhaps, apprehend most easily the woe of the coarser sufferings when they scourged Him and when they plaited the crown of thorns and put it upon His head, but the delicate and sensitive mind of our Master was, perhaps, more touched by what He suffered in the palace of Herod than by the rougher torture. For, first, here is a man fully in earnest for the salvation of our souls, and in the midst of his grievous passion He is looked upon as a mountebank and a mere performer, who is expected to work a miracle for the amusement of an impious court.

How it cuts an earnest man to the quick when he finds that, let him do what he may, people do not sympathize with him in earnestness, but are coolly criticizing his style, or imitating his mannerisms, or admiring his expressions as matters of literary taste. It is heart-breaking when your ardor makes you self-forgetful to find others pecking at trifles, or making your efforts into a kind of show. The Christ must have been wounded in His very soul when He was treated as a mere performer, as if He had left the Father's bosom and was about to give Himself to death, and yet was aiming to amuse or to astonish. I know how it saddens my Lord's servants when they preach their very hearts out to bring men to repentance, and the only result is to elicit the remark that "his arguments were very telling, and that pathetic passage was very fine." There is a thorn in such chill words to pierce deeper than the crown of thorns ; horrible indifference smites like the Roman scourge.

Then to think of our Lord's being questioned by such a fop as Herod ! A man of earnest and intense soul, living for one thing only, and that the redemption of mankind, is here worried by the foolish questions of a man of the world. Were you ever in an agony of bodily pain yourself, and did some frivolous person call upon you and begin to torture you with the veriest inanities and absurdities ? Have you not felt that his chatterings were worse than the pain ? It must have been so with Jesus. When the ridiculous must needs question the sublime the result is misery.

Remember, it was no small sorrow to our Lord to be silent. You tell me that He appears majestic in His silence. It is even so ; but the pain of it was acute. Can you speak well ? Do you love to speak for the good of your fellow-men, and do you know that when you speak full often your words are spirit and life to those who hear you ? It will be very hard to feel compelled to refuse them a good word. Do not imagine that the Lord despised Herod as Herod despised the Lord. Ah, no ! The pity of His soul went out to this poor frivolous creature who must needs make sport of the Saviour's sufferings, and treat the Son of the Highest as though he were a court fool, who must play before him.

See, then, your Lord and Master, and let me put two or three QUESTIONS TO YOU.

Do you not think that this peculiar silence of Jesus was a part of His anguish, in which He was bearing the punishment for your sins of the tongue ? Ah me, ah me ! Redeemed of the Lord, how often have you misused your speech by wanton words ! How often have we uttered murmuring words, proud words, false words, words of despite to holy things ; and now our sins of the tongue are all coming upon Him, and He must stand silent there and bear our penalty.

And is it not possible that when they put the gorgeous robe upon Him, He was bearing your sins of vanity, your sins of dress and pride, when you made yourselves glorious to behold, and arrayed yourselves in gorgeous robes and glittering apparel ? Know ye not that these things are your shame ? For had you had no sin, you would have needed none of these poor rags ; and may not the Christ in white and red be bearing your sins of folly ? And do you not think that when they were making Him nothing, and despising Him He was then bearing our sins, when we set Him at nought—our words of despite and derision when, perhaps in our ungodly days we, too, made sport of holy things, and jested at the Word of God ?

Finally, we read that Herod and Pilate were made friends from that day ; and I do hope if there are any here that are true-hearted Christians if they have had any ill-will towards one another they will think it a great shame that Herod and Pilate should be friends, and that any two followers of Jesus should not be friends at the sight of the suffering Master. Our Lord has often been a point of union for wicked men, not by His intent and purpose, but because they have joined together to oppose Him. I have often smiled in my heart to see how superstition and scepticism will march together when they are anxious to oppose the Gospel. Then the Sadducee says, "Give me your hand, dear Pharisee ; we have a common interest here, for this man would overturn us all." The Gospel is the mortal enemy both of the sceptical Sadducee and the superstitious Pharisee, and so they lay aside their differences to assail it.

Now, then, if the wicked unite before our Lord Jesus when He wears the white robe, should not His people much more be united, especially when they remember that He said, "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another." I charge you by your homage to Him you call Master and Lord, if you have any difference of any sort with any Christian brother, let not yon sun go down till you have ended it by hearty love for Jesus' sake. Let it be seen that Christ is the great uniter of all those who are in Him. He would have us love one another even as He has loved us, and His prayer is that we may be one. May the Lord hear that prayer, and make us one in Christ Jesus. Amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it ; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning in behalf of their labors.]

A Slave Girl in Madagascar.

Mr. Parrott and Missionary Helpers at a Chinese Fair.

A Mandarin's Son Visiting the Missionary.

A MALAGASY SLAVE GIRL.

THE existence of slavery in the Island of Madagascar is associated with many mitigating circumstances, and the condition of the slaves is one of comparative comfort. The slave children are brought up with those of their masters, and but little difference made between them; they go together to the same school, and frequently sit side by side in the same class. Princesses of the royal blood have been seen in school with a little slave girl by their side, and strangers taking a casual glance would scarcely know the difference between them; only that the latter are generally darker, have rougher and coarser hair, and are not quite so clean and well-dressed as those of superior rank.

In some cases there are not even these distinctions, and at times it is quite impossible to discover their rank in life from any outward signs. For example, there are two pupils in the Girls' Central School, who for years were not known to be slaves, their dress and appearance giving the idea that they belonged to the upper classes.

Our picture of the Malagasy slave girl is copied from the Rev. Wm. Ellis's "Three Visits to Madagascar," in which the heroic missionary thus describes the state of things as existing twenty-five years ago:

"In one of the houses which I entered one day, a number of female slaves were at work. Some of them were carrying baskets of cotton or other articles from one room to another; and, as they passed along, I saw one young girl who had a couple of boards fixed on her shoulders, each of them rather more than two feet long, and ten inches or a foot wide, fastened together by pieces of wood nailed on the under side. A piece had been cut out of each board in the middle, so that, when fixed together, they fitted close to her neck; and the poor girl, while wearing this instrument of punishment and disgrace, was working with the rest." (See Illustration.)

Happily, however, the benign influence of Christianity has resulted in benefit to the slaves, and the missionaries, who have made many converts among the slave-owners, have used their influence to prevent cruelty and unnecessarily harsh punishment being inflicted.

ADVENTURES AMONG THE CHINESE.

THE work of the missionaries connected with the China Inland Mission has been frequently described in these columns and we gave in our issue of January 26th portraits of Mr. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the mission, and two of his assistants. The following narrative has been sent home by Mr. A. G. Parrott, who is laboring in P'ing-yang Fu, in the province of Shan-si. The events narrated occurred during his fourth journey through the province.

A ROMISH CHAPEL.

On August 9th, Chang Yu-fah (my native helper) and I started on a trip to Hung-tung Hien, and two or three villages in the Hien district. The weather was extremely hot, and we traveled early in the morning and late at night, to avoid the heat as much as possible. Hung-tung Hien is a good city, twenty miles north of P'ing-yang Fu. The Romanists have a chapel and several families of converts there. We reached the city at eight A.M., and it being market-day, a large number of country people had come in from the neighboring villages. During the day, partly by sales on the streets and partly by free distribution to the shops, we had disposed of about 850 portions of Scripture, Christian books, and tracts.

On Tuesday, August 10th, we attended a market at a place called Wan-gan-chen, northwest of Hung-tung Hien. Although it was market-day, not many had ventured out in the great heat. Still, we sold eighty-six Scripture portions on the market-place and in a temple, where, through the

FRIENDLY EFFORTS

of one man, who seemed more interested than the rest, the priest had been persuaded to open the doors and let us in. This afforded us a shelter from the sun, and brought a large number of men round us. The people were kindly disposed, and helped the priest to find us a table and a chair, and soon a pot of tea was brought, and we seemed to be on friendly terms with everybody. We returned to Hung-tung Hien the same day.

On August 13th we visited Hiang-ling Hien, southwest of P'ing-yang Fu, a small but friendly city. We could not sell more than thirty books, and rather than leave the people without the Scriptures, we gave away a single Gospel to most of the shops and returned to P'ing-yang Fu the same day. During the next ten days we visited Tsitsun, Ta-yang, Hien-ti, Tung-ts'un, etc., and sold a few books and tracts at the fairs.

A CHRISTIAN MEDICINE SHOP.

We again visited the town of Tung-ts'un, on the 24th, and sold and gave away altogether eighty-two single Gospels, besides tracts. One of our native Christians has now opened a medicine shop at his own expense, with a view to introduce the Gospel among the inhabitants.

Next day, we started to visit six fairs, at different towns and villages. We hired a cart for 700 cash per day, and reached Shih-ts'un, in time for the fair next day, when we sold forty-seven Gospels and portions of the New Testament, and proceeded on our journey to Kao-hien-chen, forty li further south. Our picture represents Mr. Parrott and his native Chinese helpers selling Gospels and other portions of the New Testament at the fair.

In the Ho-nan province, Mr. H. W. Hunt holds numerous meetings at the "Jesus Hall," Ju-ning Fu, which has been properly fitted up for evangelistic purposes. He says: Upon my arrival here for the third time, when I rented premises for permanent mission work, I was immediately surrounded by people of the higher, middle, and lower classes.

EASTERN PRESENTS.

Some persons, anxious to gain my approval, and perhaps help in some way, were constantly bringing the strangest presents to me, nearly all of which I was obliged to refuse—a young turtle from the neighboring river, a pair of young storks and other water-fowl, a pair of doves, live fish, tame rabbits, chickens, a cat, illuminated scrolls, and presents of eatables without number.

VISITED BY A MANDARIN'S SON.

A very frequent visitor to me indeed is a mandarin's son, who is occasionally accompanied by his elder brother. He insisted upon my dining with him when I arrived this time, and seeing that his invitation was not made merely out of politeness (which is generally the case) I, of course, consented. He told me that my medicine had cured him of opium-smoking, but I have since ascertained that the fact is he has only come down from smoking an ounce to one fifth of the quantity per day. I fear that, like many others, he does not wish to break off the habit altogether, but continues to take a little, in order to make one in a social circle of smokers, who might be displeased if he ceased taking the drug altogether. I trust that my walks and talks with Ch'en Siao-ye, this friend, may be used of God to awaken him to a saving knowledge of God's truth. (Our picture depicts the visit referred to.)

THE WRECK OF THE CYPRIAN.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most appalling of the wrecks during the equinoctial gales was that of the Cyprian, which sailed from Liverpool, England, with twenty-seven hands, under Captain John Alexander Strachan, bound for various Mediterranean ports. The vessel made fair way at first, but was never free from water, which swept every moveable thing from the deck. The steamer labored heavily until three on Friday morning, when the steering gear of the fore wheel-house gave way, leaving the apparatus in the after wheel-house alone available. Subsequently the giving way of the apparatus in the after wheel-house caused the vessel to become unmanageable.

Shortly before five, the tubes of the second boiler burst and put out both fires. Whatever hopes the crew had entertained of their vessel being able to withstand the storm were then dissipated, and the captain told them they must try to save themselves. The steamer ultimately struck violently on a rock two miles off Nevin on the Welsh coast. One after another of those who had life-belts dropped over the vessel's side into the water. Two firemen alone stood paralysed; they looked hopelessly at the sea, and going down below were never seen again. Meanwhile the captain, who was himself prepared with a life-belt, caught sight of a poor little pale-faced stowaway who had hidden himself in the vessel before starting, and, from some cause or another, was attempting to escape from England. Without pausing to consider the worthiness or unworthiness of the lad, Captain Strachan (as represented in our engraving) unbuckled the life-belt from his waist and lashed it ship-shape upon the little stowaway, bidding him save himself if it were the mercy of Providence that this should be so. "I can swim," said the captain; "take the belt." Over the side went the stowaway, lifted upon the surf like a cork; over the side went the captain, trusting, like the good, brave fellow that he was, to his strength, enfeebled with long watching and anxiety.

Capt. Strachan's Heroic Self-Sacrifice.

But swimming was impossible in such a sea. The boatswain, struggling for his own life, caught at the captain, who was still making headway, and both went down, never to be seen again; while the little stowaway, with the good captain's belt about his waist, was flung upon the Welsh coast, battered about, but alive, to tell the story of his strange fate and his kind friend's heroism.

What heart is not moved at such a recital? Yet what was the self-forgetting heroism of Captain Strachan, noble as it was, compared with that of Him who prayed for His murderers and poured out His life's blood for the redemption of guilty man? The universal feeling of admiration for such bravery as Captain Strachan's shows how marvelous is the ingratitude of thousands who refuse to recognize and render thanks to God for the infinitely vaster sacrifice of Christ who "died the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God."

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 174.)

A London Curacy.

THE district on which his vicar directed Felix to concentrate his efforts was by no means a neglected one. It was rather suffering from the multitude of laborers, who had chosen it as their part of the great vineyard. Lying close to a wealthy and fashionable neighborhood, it had long been a kind of pleasure-ground, or park for hunting sinners in, to the charitable and religious inhabitants of the comfortable dwellings standing within a stone's throw of the wretched streets. There was interest and excitement to be found in it for their own unoccupied time, and a pleasant glow of approbation for their consciences.

Every denomination had a mission there; and the mission halls stood thickly on the ground. There were Bible-women, nurses, city missionaries, tract distributors at work; mothers' meetings were held; classes of all sorts were open; infirmaries and medical mission-rooms were established; and coffee-rooms were to be found in nearly every street. Each body of Christians acted as if there were no other workers in the field; each was striving to hunt souls into its own special fold; and each distributed its funds as if no money but theirs was being laid out for the welfare of the poor district. Hence there were greater pauperism and more complete poverty than in many a neglected quarter of the East End of London with all its untold misery.

Spirit-vaults flourished; the low lodging-houses were crowded to excess; rents rose rapidly; and the narrow ill-lighted streets were almost impassable after nightfall, when the greater part of the wealthy district-visitors were spending their evening hours in their comfortable homes, satisfied with their day's work for the Lord.

But Felix began his work in the evenings, when the few decent working men, who still continued to live in the Brickfields, had come home from their day's toil, and the throng of professional beggars and thieves, who found themselves in good quarters there, poured in from their day's prowling. It was well for him that he had an athletic and muscular frame, well-knitted together, and strengthened by exercise, for many a time he had to force his way out of houses, where he found himself surrounded by a crew of half-drunken and dangerous men. Presently they got to know and respect him both for his strength and forbearance, which he exercised with good temper and generosity. For he could give a blow, as well as take one, when it was necessary. At one time his absence from church was compulsory, because he had caught a black eye when defending a querulous old crone from her drunken son; he was seen about the wretched streets of the Brickfields with this too-familiar decoration, but he took care not to go home until it was lost.

With the more decent inhabitants of the district he was soon a great favorite; but he was feared and abhorred by the others. Felix belonged to the new school of philanthropic economy, which discerns, and protests against thoughtless almsgiving; and above all, against doles to street beggars. He would have made giving equally illegal with begging. But he soon began to despair of effecting a reformation in this direction; for even Phebe could not always refrain from finding a the misery, and the ignorance, and the vice of his degraded district. He was not going to spare himself; it should be no sham fight with him. The place was his first battlefield; and it had a strong attraction for him.

So through the pleasant months of spring, which for the last four years had been spent at Oxford, and into the hot weeks of summer, Felix was indefatigably at work, giving himself no rest, and no recreation, except writing long and frequent letters to Mrs. Pascal, or rather to Alice. For would not Alice always read those letters, every word of them? would she not even often be the first to open them? it being the pleasant custom of the Pascal household for most letters to be in common, excepting such as were actually marked "private." And Mrs. Pascal's answers might have been dictated by Alice herself, so exactly did they express her mind. They did not as yet stand on the footing of betrothed lovers; but neither of them doubted but that they soon would do so.

It was not without a sharp pang, however, that Felix learned that the Pascals were going to Switzerland for the summer. He had an intense longing to visit the land, of which his grandmother had so often spoken to him, and where his father's grave lay. But quite apart from his duty to the district placed under his charge, there was an obstacle in the absolute interdiction Felicitia laid upon the country where her husband had met with his terrible death. It was impossible even to hint at going to Switzerland while she was in her present state of health. She had only partially recovered from the low, nervous fever which had attacked her during the winter; and still those about her strove their utmost to save her from all worry and anxiety.

The sultry, fervid days of August came; and if possible the narrow thoroughfares of the Brickfields seemed more wretched than in the winter. The pavements burned like an oven, and the thin walls of the houses did not screen their inmates from the reeking heat. Not a breath of fresh air seemed to wander through the low-lying streets, and a sickly glare and heaviness brooded over them. No wonder there was fever about. The fields were too far away to be reached in this tiring weather; and when the men and women returned home from their day's work, they sank down in silent and languid groups on their door-steps, or on the dirty flagstones of the causeway. Even the professional beggars suffered more than in the winter, for the penny for some poor little shivering urchin, dlogging her steps on a winter's day.

"You do not stop to think how cruel you are," Felix would say indignantly; "if it was not for women giving money to them, these poor little wretches would never be sent out, with their naked feet on the frozen pavement, and scarcely rags enough to hide their bodies, blue with cold. If you could only step inside the ginshops as I do, you would see a drunken sinner of a father or a mother drinking down the pence you drop into the children's hands. Your thoughtless kindness is as cruel as their vice."

But still, with all that fresh ardor and energy which issued at in the familiar proverb, "A new broom sweeps clean," Felix swept away at tide of almsgiving is at its lowest ebb during the summer, when the rich have many other and pleasanter occupations.

Felix walked through his "parish," as he called it, with slow and weary steps. Yet his holiday was come, and this was the last evening he would work thus for the present. The Pascals were in Switzerland; he had had a letter from Mrs. Pascal, with a few lines from Alice herself in a postscript, telling him she and her father were about to start for Engelberg to visit his father's grave for him. It was a loving and gracious thing to do, just suited to Canon Pascal's kindly nature, and Felix felt his whole being lifted up by it to a happier level. Phebe and Hilda were gone to their usual summer haunt, Phebe's quaint little cottage on the solitary mountain-moor; where he was going to join them for a day or two, before they went to visit Mr. Clifford, in the old house at Riversborough. His mother alone, of all the friends he had, was remaining in London; and she had refused to leave until Phebe and Hilda had first paid their yearly visits to the old places.

He reached his mission-room at last, through the close, unwholesome atmosphere, and found it fairly filled, chiefly with working men, some of whom had turned into it as being a trifle less hot and noisy than the sultry streets without crowded with quarrelsome children. It was, moreover, the pay-night for a Providence club which Felix had established for any, either men or women, who chose to contribute to it. There was a short and simple lecture given first; and afterwards the club-books were brought out, and a committee of workmen received the weekly subscriptions, and attended to the affairs of the little association.

The lecture was near its close, when a drunken man, in the quarrelsome stage of intoxication, stumbled in through the open door. Felix knew him well by sight; a confirmed drunkard, a mere miserable sot, who hung about the spirit-vaults, and lived only for the drink he could pour down his throat. There had been a vague instinctive dread and disgust of the man, mingled with a deep interest he could not understand, in Felix's mind. He paused for an instant, looking at the dirty rags, and bleared eyes, and degraded face of the drunkard standing just in the doorway, with the summer's light behind him.

"What's the parson's name?" he called, in a thick, unsteady voice. "Is it Sefton?"

"Hush! hush!" cried two or three voices in answer.

"I'll not hush! If it's Sefton, it were his father as made me what I am. It were his father as stole every blessed penny of my earnings. It were his father as drove me to drink, and ruined me, soul and body. Sefton! I've a right to know the name of Sefton if any man on earth does. Curse it!"

Felix had ceased speaking, and stood facing his little congregation, listening as in a dream. The men caught the drunken accuser by the arms, and were violently expelling him, but his rough voice rose above the noise of the scuffle.

"Ay!" he shouted, "the parson won't hear the truth told. But take care of your money, mates, or it'll go where mine went."

"Don't turn him out," called Felix; "it's a mistake, my men. Let him alone. He never knew my father."

The drunkard turned round and confronted him, and the little assembly was quiet again, with an intense quietness, waiting to hear what would follow.

"Thy father's name was Roland Sefton?" said the drunkard.

"Yes," answered Felix.

And he was banker of the Old Bank at Riversborough?" he asked.

"Yes," said Felix.

"Then what I've got to say is this," went on the rough, thick voice of the half-drunken man; "and the tale's true, mates. Roland Sefton, o' Riversborough, cheated me out o' all my hard earnings—one hundred and nineteen pounds—as I'd trusted him with, and drove me to drink. I were a steady nian till then, as steady as the best of ye; and he were a fine, handsome, fair-spoken gentleman as ever walked; and we poor folks trusted him as if he'd been God Almighty. There was a old deaf and dumb man, called Marlowe, lost six hundred pounds by him, and it broke his heart; he never held his head up after, and he died. Me, it drove to drink. That's the father o' the parson who stands here telling you about Jesus Christ, and maybe trusted with your money, as I trusted mine with him as cheated me. It's a true tale, mates, if God Almighty struck me dead for it this moment."

There was such a tone of truth in the hoarse and passionate tones, which grew steadier as the speaker gained assurance by the silence of the audience, that there was not one there who did not believe the story. Even Felix, listening with white face and flaring eyes, dared not cry out that the accusation was a lie. Horrible as it was, he could not say to himself that it was all untrue. There came flashing across his mind confused reminiscences of the time when his father had disappeared from out of his life. He remembered asking his mother how long he would be away, and did he never write to her? and she had answered him that he was too young to understand the truth about his father. Was it possible that this was the truth?

In after years, he never forgot that sultry evening, with the close, noisome atmosphere of the hot mission-hall, and the confused buzzing of many voices, which after a short silence began to hum in his ears. The drunkard was still standing in the doorway, the very wreck and ruin of a man; and every detail of his loathsome, degraded appearance was burnt in on Felix's brain. He felt stupefied and bewildered—as if he had received almost a death-blow. But in his inmost soul a cry went up to heaven, "Lord, Thou also hast been a man!"

Then he saw that the cross lay before him in his path. "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." It had seemed to Felix at times as if he had never been called upon to bear any cross. But now it lay there close before him. He could not take another step forward unless he lifted it up and laid it on his shoulders, whatever its weight might be. The cross of shame—the bearing of another's sin—his father's sin. His whole soul recoiled from it. Any other cross but this he could have borne after Christ with willing feet and rejoicing heart. But to know that his father was a criminal; and to bear the shame of it openly!

Yet he could not stand there longer, fighting his battle, in the presence of these curious eyes so keenly fastened upon him. The clock over the door showed upon its dial only a minute or two gone; but to Felix the time consumed in this brief foretaste of the cross seemed years. He gathered together so much of his self-possession as could be summoned at a moment's notice, and looked straight into the faces of his audience.

"Friends," he said, "if this is true, it is as new to me as it is to you. My father died when I was a boy of ten; and no one had a heart hard enough to tell me then my father was a rogue. But if I find it is true, I'll not rest day nor night till this man has his money again. What is his name?"

"Nixey," called out three or four voices; "John Nixey."

Again Felix's heart sank, for he knew Simon Nixey, whose farm lay nearest to Phebe's little homestead; and there was a familiar ring in the name.

"Ay, ay!" stammered Nixey; "but old Clifford o' the Bank paid me the money back all right; only I'd sworn a dreadful oath I'd never lay by another farthin', and it soon came to an end. It were me as were lost as well as the money."

"Then what do you come bothering here for," asked one of the men, "if you've had your money back all right? Get out with you."

For a minute or two there was a scuffle, and then the drunkard was hustled outside and the door shut behind him. For another half hour Felix mechanically conducted the business of the club, as if he had been in a dream; and then, bidding the members of the little committee good night, he paced swiftly away from his district in the direction of his home.

(To be continued.)

THE GREAT PYRAMID PROPHECY ABOUT 1882-3.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

Prof. Piazza Smyth's Views—The End of the Grand Gallery—The Symbolical Measurement—Mr. Lane's Calculation—The Passage Floor—The Exit Passage—The Upper Way of Escape—The Converging Lines of Prophecy—The 1260 Years of Mahomedanism—Pasteur M. Rossetlet's Views—Mr. Sydney Hall on the Seven Overappings.

IN a previous number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (Nov. 10, 1881, page 716) was published the principles of the theory on which is founded the prophetic interpretation of the symbolic measurement of the Great Pyramid. By the aid of diagrams of the exterior of the Pyramid and the interior chambers and passages, it was shown how closely the length of the passage-way, the Grand Gallery, and the dimensions of the chambers correspond with the great epochs of the world's history. It was also shown that having thus traced in this marvellous stone symbol our position at the present day, the forward measurements correspond with the periods mentioned in prophecy.

Professor Piazza Smyth, who has devoted many years to the study of pyramidal prophecy, thus writes of the conclusions he has formed.

For all those who have accepted the beginning of the Grand Gallery for the beginning of the Christian dispensation which commenced in the year A.D. 1, and under which we are still living, there is nothing for it but also to accept that a period, distinct and finite, was appointed to that dispensation by God, and that that finite period is close upon us. Not an end of the world, or of nations, or of men, but of the present dispensation. How close then is such an end? The answer to that question must depend on the length of the Grand Gallery by measure in pyramid inches, which symbolically represent years—the 1881.2 inches symbolizing 1881-2 years.

As usual with the accounts of travellers at the Great Pyramid, there are various results in print. According to Mr. Lane's measurement of the Grand Gallery, its length is 1894 pyramid inches. My own measures of the Grand Gallery, however, taken in 1865, amounted to, for the length up to the great step, 1813.0 pyramid inches; and thence up to the end walk, in the line concluded for the slanting floor, 68 inches further = 1881.0 pyramid inches in all; or, as computed more exactly by Mr. H. A. Powers, of Cincinnati, 1881.4 pyramid inches. [Professor Smyth elsewhere computes the length to be 1882 inches.]

Something, then, seems to be appointed to take place at that particular time, and it is much easier to say what it is not than what it is. It is not, for instance, as just stated above, the end of the world, for there is a "passage floor" leading on from the Grand Gallery to the Antechamber; through that also, and onward into the King's Chamber, the granite-lined and most glorious part of the whole interior of the building.

In fact, it is rather like the unexampled days of future trouble which our Saviour Himself announced should immediately precede His second coming, and terminate this dispensation of His first coming.

Of the unutterable anguish of these most exceptional days to come, we read (Matt. 24: 21; Mark 13: 19) that "there shall be affliction, such as there was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this time, neither shall be." But its duration will not be long, "for," continues the Saviour, "He hath shortened the days."

The severities of those times are pyramidally expressed at this place by the exit passage from the south end of the Grand Gallery being lower still than any of the low passages which indicate the troubles of the profane world in early times. Those passages were 47 inches in transverse, and 52 in vertical height: painfully low, therefore, for any full-sized man to creep through; but the exit passage leading from this end of the Grand Gallery is only 44 inches in vertical height, and is the most trying part of the whole passage system. But this excruciating portion is exceedingly short, for after no more than 53 inches in length,* it enters into the freedom of the Ante-chamber, its quiet, peace, and presently granite protection.

THE UPPER WAY OF ESCAPE.

But the final reception into the Ante-chamber is not the only mode of mitigating the threatened horrors of that lower exit passage; for before entering that at all there is a very peculiar mode of possible entire escape, from the summit of the end of the Grand Gallery itself, though only for a few persons, and not by their own power.

This escape is by the doorway of exit into a small passage, at the upper south-east corner of the end (or rather upper southern end) of the Grand Gallery, and is no less than 27 feet above the history-recording floor, only, therefore, accessible to something approaching more to winged and flying, rather than walking, beings, and leading to a sort of retreat, more than apartment for earthly life, immediately over the grand and final granite hall, the so-called King's Chamber. That said retreat is one of the five hollows of construction which Colonel Howard-Vyse found to exist above the King's Chamber, but while the upper four had been absolutely closed in and about with solid masonry, the fifth and lowest was furnished as above described, with the passage-way leading to it from the almost inaccessible top of the southern end of the Grand Gallery, on the east side thereof.

Why it was so furnished there is nothing either in the scientific or Egyptologic theories to show; though in the sacred and historic symbology it immediately reminds us of what the evangelists in the New Testament promise, viz., of the elect being gathered in before the dread period of the wars and tribulations on earth begins; and also of those elect thus saved meeting the Lord in the air (1 Thes. 4: 17; Luke 17: 34-77; Rev. 3: 10; 12: 5), and being retained with Him in heaven for awhile before His Second Coming to the earth itself to establish His visible kingdom—the kingdom of the Stone cut out without hands, ordained to rule over nations in truth, righteousness, and universal extent, by grandly supernatural means, of which the world under the present Christian dispensation knows nothing practically (Daniel 2: 34-44; 7: 13, 14).

The rapture of the saints is necessarily, therefore, one thing perhaps now impending, but the return of Christ the Lord with His glorified saints to commence the millennium is quite another, and perhaps a more certainly fixable time—as indicated in the pyramid by the greater proximity of its markings to the chronicle floor-surface.

But the Second Advent of Christ (some reader may protest) has been continually expected every single year since the Ascension, eighteen centuries ago. Can, therefore, any special reason be now shown from Scripture, as well as from the Great Pyramid, why, at all events, this first of the latter-day miracles should be more likely to occur near the present epoch than to any of the long past years? I reply that those who have studied prophecy earnestly must be aware that a very great number of results have been brought out, all converging toward this epoch.

Diagram showing the End of the 1882 inches of the Grand Gallery of the Pyramid (symbolizing the 1882 Years of this Dispensation), and the subsequent Low Passage-way (the Great Tribulation), and Antechamber and King's Chamber.

THE 1260 YEARS OF MAHOMEDANISM, ENDING IN A.D. 1882 TO 1896.

In Revelation 11: 1-3 we read, "There was given unto me a reed like unto a rod (a measuring rod); and the angel stood, saying, Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein. But the court which is without the temple leave out, and measure it not; for it is given unto the Gentiles: and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months."

That is to say, apparently this injunction implies "The country outside, even Egypt and Palestine and all the land of Arabia, measure them not; no metrical consequence of any spiritual significance shall be found there by so doing: and they are further given over by God to the Mahometans to have, to possess, and to tread under foot for forty and two months of the years (1260 days), i.e. 1260 years." Which period, dating from the Hegira, or the universally acknowledged effective beginning of Mahomedanism, in the year A.D. 622, will close of itself, without the efforts of man, in A.D. 1882, or simultaneously with the closing of the symbolic passage of the Grand Gallery.

Pasteur M. Rossetlet prefers to date the 1260 years from the taking of Jerusalem by the Saracens in A.D. 636, which would give A.D. 1896 for the close of Mahomedanism.

"And I will give power," saith the Spirit of God in Revelation, "unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophecy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth. These are the two olive-trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth" (Revelation 11: 3).

These two witnesses to God are supposed to be (at least in one fulfilment) the two houses of Israel—Judah and Joseph; and their testimony in sackcloth is the melancholy, though diverse, history of those branches of them in the eastern lands which have been, and are, under the iron-heeled domination of the Mussulman power for the appointed 1260 years. But when that power shall fall, in (or soon after) A.D. 1882—the "drying up" of it, as the mystic Euphrates, by the action of the sixth vial being already begun—shall they, those witnesses, then reign on the earth? Far from it; the

LOW PASSAGE-WAY

from the Grand Gallery to the Antechamber, as already mentioned, conveys the idea of a depressed, depopulated condition of the Christian Church, to follow the 1882 years of this dispensation; and besides that, the Revelation of St. John says that it is at that moment, "when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and shall kill them. And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the city for three days and a half" (denoting in the year-day fulfilment three years and a half). Though the next following verses declare, most emphatically, that God will interfere supernaturally for them.

COMING RAPTURE OR TRANSLATION OF CHRISTIANS.

But that final salvation is to be in Antechamber days, and the troubles, as the Pyramid's very low passage before that apartment indicates, are to commence previously on all who are left on the earth after the Saviour shall have secretly and supernaturally removed His elect; and after, too, that the Seventh Vial shall have been poured out into the air; for it is after that dread action, in accordance with the words of St. John (Rev. 16: 18), there shall be "voices and thunders and lightnings; and a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great: and also the great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent, to fall upon men."

These terms, as Pasteur G. A. Rossetlet well remarks in his admirable work entitled "L'Apocalypse et l'Histoire," are symbols of prophecy. Not vague, mystical or fanciful, but most exact and truly descriptive to the very letter, when the meaning of the symbols is understood; just as the signs of operation of algebra in a mathematical work are anything or nothing to an ignorant person, but the most perfect expression for the things referred to that can be conceived when read forth by an educated analyst. Wherefore, by a wide inductive process, which in the end cannot fail to arrive exceedingly close to the truth, he proceeds to compare the words of St. John with accomplished history from the Apostle's days to our own; and finds every jot and tittle to be capable of full explanation on one uniform system.

But what does the Pasteur say of the days which are still to come? His first note is, that "the Rapture of the Church to the Lord in the air will take place at or just before the sound of the seventh trumpet. 'Let us hold ourselves ready,' says he; 'the time is very near.'"

Mr. Sydney Hall, a Pyramidal author, who is inclined to look upon the seven over-lappings of the Grand Gallery as the seven times of each species of warning in the Revelation, after expounding the last of them as being largely the Russian, in the seventh vial, feelingly asks:

"Is this fearful description of coming events to have no more weight with the mass of men than the warnings given to the old world by Noah? Surely the indifference which is shown to the signs of the times by mankind in general has been put on record by our Blessed Saviour Himself: 'As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the days of the Son of man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed.'" "That day," which was then a long future one, is for us so no longer.

(To be continued.)

* Piazzi Smyth does not specify fully what he expects to take place during the fifty-three years symbolised by these fifty-three inches; but if we assume the first ten years of these fifty-three years to be occupied by the time of trouble and distress of nations, he remaining forty-three years would be a commencing portion of the millennium, and it would take all that time to repair the lesions of tribulation, and to increase the population of the earth; because at the beginning of the millennium, the condition of things is that "the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men are left: and the earth is empty and waste, and the cities lie shaken down by earthquakes" (see Isaiah 24 and Rev. 14: 18, 9, etc.).—E.D.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Queen Victoria has Written to Sir William Harcourt, Secretary of the Home Department, that she wishes to express "from her heart how very deeply she is touched by the outburst of enthusiastic loyalty, affection, and devotion which the painful event of the 2d inst. called forth from all classes and from all parts of her vast empire, as well as by the universal sympathy evinced by the sovereigns and people of other nations. The Queen cannot sufficiently express how deeply she is gratified by these demonstrations. She wishes to convey to all, from the highest to the humblest, her warmest and most heartfelt thanks. The Queen says it has ever been her greatest object to do all she can for her subjects, to uphold the honor and glory of her dear country, as well as to promote the prosperity and happiness of those over whom she has reigned so long. These efforts will be continued unceasingly to the last hour of her life. The Queen thanks God that He spared her beloved child, who is her constant and devoted companion, and those who were with her in the moment of danger, as well as herself. She prays that He will continue to protect her for her people's sake, as He has hitherto so visibly protected her."

Another Foul Murder has been Committed in Ireland. The victim was found dead in an alley in Dublin shot through the neck. He was the man who gave the information to the authorities which led to the seizure in December of the rifles, revolvers, and ammunition at the residence of the brothers Whelan, in Cross Kevin Street, and of a further hoard of arms, powder, Orsini bombs and dynamite at their store. After giving the information his life was repeatedly threatened, and he was conscious of his imminent danger. He made most piteous appeals to the government to keep their promise to him of giving him the means to leave the country, but the authorities having obtained all the information they could get from him left him to his fate. They now offer $2500 reward for the conviction of his murderer, when if they had given him a tenth of that sum he might not have been murdered. The Dublin Express commenting on the crime, says that the evidence is of a character deserving of serious attention, as it puts beyond any possible doubt the existence of a conspiracy which for some years was supposed to be suppressed, but only slumbered, and, under the fostering care of a government which encouraged a revolutionary agitation, it has been aroused into new activity and inspired with more confident expectations of success. Bailey fell a victim to its secret vengeance. He had committed a crime against the Fenian code, and a court of assassins decreed his "execution."

The Trial of Dr. Lamson, the American physician charged with murdering his brother-in-law, in England, has ended in a verdict of guilty, and he has been sentenced to be hanged on April 4th. Although the evidence went to prove that the prisoner was guilty of a peculiarly cruel and deliberate murder, the jurymen rendered their verdict under manifest emotion. Several of them were in tears when they re-entered the court room, and others of them were ghastly pale. The London Times, in an editorial on the verdict, says: "It would be difficult to find an example in which the proof of criminality was more complete. The conviction of Dr. Lamson may contribute to the safety of many lives which his acquittal would have placed in peril."

Mr. Bradlaugh has again been Refused Permission to take his seat in the British House of Commons. On Monday, March 6th, Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Conservative Party, moved that the House reaffirm its resolution of February 7th, that Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to go through the form of repeating the words of the oath. Mr. Majoribanks, a Liberal member, moved an amendment in favor of legislation permitting affirmation. Mr. Labouchère, who represents in Parliament the borough of Northampton, which has three times in succession elected Mr. Bradlaugh, promised, on behalf of Mr. Bradlaugh, that if the amendment should be carried Mr. Bradlaugh would not attempt to enter the House until legislation was effected, provided the delay was only for a reasonable time. Mr. Gladstone supported the amendment, but it was rejected by a vote of 257 against 242. Sir Stafford Northcote's motion was carried without division. On March 7th a bill was introduced in the House of Lords by the Earl of Redesdale, excluding atheists from both houses of Parliament.

The Description of the Manner in which Mr. Bradlaugh took the oath on February 21st, is published in the English journals. It shows conclusively that the atheist regards it as a mere empty form. A reporter who witnessed the scene says, "Mr. Bradlaugh rose from the seat which he occupied on the cross bench below the bar and advanced rapidly to the table. In a moment all eyes were turned upon him. The House, taken completely by surprise, expected that he would address them. Instead he dipped his right hand suddenly into the left breast pocket of his frock coat, pulled out a small dark, shiny octavo volume, with red edges, which he transferred to his disengaged hand, made a second dive and brought forth a piece of paper, made a third dive and drew from his waistcoat pocket a stump of pencil, and amid exclamations of astonishment, not unmingled with groans of derision, 'gabbled' through a form of words, inaudible above the din of dissent, kissed the little book, tossed it behind the crown of the mace and held up the piece of paper in the direction of the chair, at the same time calling out in an excited though triumphant voice, 'I tender that as the oath, which I have taken according to law,' and just as the clerk reached the corner where he stood, deposited it beside the book." It is not surprising after that exhibition that the House was disgusted and declared Mr. Bradlaugh's seat vacant.

Lieutenant Danenhower, Writing to his mother from Yakutsk, in Siberia, gives the following description of the city: "Yakutsk is a city of 5000 inhabitants, and is situated on the west bank of the Lena River. It is the chief city in this part of Siberia, and is the residence of the Governor General Tcherniaieff. The houses are built of wood and are not painted. The streets are very wide, and each house has a large yard or court. The principal trade is in furs, and in summer a great deal of fresh meat is sent up the river. This is a very cold place. During nine months of the year snow and ice abound. In the winter the thermometer falls to 70 degrees below zero. Since our arrival it has been 68 degrees below, and to-day it is only 35 or thereabouts. In the summer the temperature rises as high as 95 degrees." Lieutenant Danenhower writes gratefully of the kindness shown to the party by the Governor and the Russian authorities.

The Visit of Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey to Edinburgh is to be commemorated by the erection of an evangelistic hall for the city. A suitable site, within a little distance of the house of John Knox, has been secured. The evangelists are continuing their labors in Glasgow with increasing success. The meetings were again held in the southern districts of the city, Mr. Moody addressing two immense audiences nightly, the churches being crowded. Mr. Sankey, who had been compelled to keep the house through a severe cold, was able to return to his work on February 21st, and his re-appearance was hailed with gratification and gratitude. A large circus has been taken for the purpose of a series of revival services, which commence in the beginning of March. Already the Rev. James Scott expresses his confident belief that the movement is in advance of the work done in the city at the close of the lengthened visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey eight years ago.

The Apprehended Conflict between Russia and Austria has, it is hoped, been averted. The London Times in an editorial article says: "War between Austria and Russia is always a possibility, but at present there is not, we trust, serious peril. The establishment of the Servian kingdom under Austrian auspices is an important guarantee of peace. Nor is the Slavonic storm likely yet to break upon Germany. We have reason to believe that Prince Bismarck has no fears in that direction, and that he neither expects an attack nor intends to strike." The Vienna correspondent of the St. James Gazette says that the general understanding between Germany and Austria to jointly resist a Russian attack upon either power has lately resulted in an arrangement of details for immediate action if necessary.

An Earthquake of a Very Disastrous Character is reported from Costa Rica, one of the Central American Republics. Four towns have been destroyed, and many lives lost. It was at first stated that there were several thousand victims, but later intelligence was to the effect that the number had been exaggerated. The towns which suffered most were Alajuela, San Ramon, Grecia, and Heredia. The last two are small towns, but Alajuela and San Ramon are among the chief cities of the Republic. The district is the most mountainous in all the American Continent, and there are several volcanoes in the range. It has frequently been visited by earthquakes, and the houses are constructed with the view of resisting those shocks.

A Report of a Revival at Orebro, Stockholm, and other places in Sweden has been sent by Pastor Truve, who says: "The earnestness of the people is so great that they will not leave the chapel in the evening. We must drive them out about 11 P.M. by turning down the gas."

Vol. IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1881, with complete index. Price, $3 including postage: ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

"Coming Wars," by the Rev. M. Baxter Two Pamphlets; price five cents each by mail. First Pamphlet contains "Ten Signs of the End, and Description of Approaching Events;" with two maps of the territory to be under Antichrist's rule, and four large diagrams. Second Pamphlet contains valuable quotations from twenty-six Expositors on the same subject. Address, with price inclosed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

PRICE, ONE DOLLAR. POST FREE.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, etc.

By THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

OBTAINABLE THROUGH THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, ALL BOOKSELLERS, AND AT THE OFFICE OF "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1882.

16th Year. No. 13.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT OF THOMAS COOPER, THE CONVERTED SCEPTIC, and Sketch of his Life.
THE OLD HOMESTEAD. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.
SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Ouffe" (Continued).
CURRENT EVENTS: The Death of the Poet Longfellow—The Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill—The Tariff in Congress—The Southern Deluge—Causes of Youthful Depravity—A Mule-Driver Puzzled—Longevity in a Massachusetts Town—A Litigation about a False-Face—A Grievous Disappointment, etc.
THE GREAT PYRAMID PROPHECY ABOUT 1882-3 (Continued).

THE DREAM OF PILATE'S WIFE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
Death of John the Baptist. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
PORTRAIT OF MRS. M. L. WHATELY, and Picture of her Mission-School in Cairo, Egypt.
COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).
"How are your Wife and Children?" A Temperance Appeal—The Prophecy of our Lord. By P. W. E.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Jeannette Search—Emperor William's Eighty-fifth Birthday Celebrated—The Sultan of Turkey Interested in America—The Irish-American Suspects—The Czar and the Nihilists—English Aid in the Restoration of the Jews, etc.

MR. THOMAS COOPER, the Converted Sceptic, and Scenes in his Life.

THOMAS COOPER,

The Converted Sceptic.

Early Poverty—A Disappointed Chimney Sweep—Conviction of Sin—Becomes a Shoemaker—Illness—Teaches a School—Religious Activity—Becomes the Victim of Religious Doubt—Literary Work—Joins the Chartists—Imprisoned for Sedition—The Purgatory of Suicides—Interview with Disraeli—The Changes of Fourteen Years—A Crusade Against Infidelity—Remarkable Escape from Death.

A STRANGELY chequered life is now drawing toward its close. Mr. Thomas Cooper, the hard thinker and public lecturer, has passed the period assigned by the Psalmist as the limit of active useful human life, and nears the inevitable termination of his peculiar career. Its incidents deserve study because they throw a light on the social history of the first half of the century, and they show how an active and penetrating mind without the advantage of education and full of conceited egotism falls into innumerable disastrous blunders until the Holy Spirit turns all the powers of the man into the channel of Christian service. The life of Thomas Cooper may be read as a warning and as an example. In both ways we trust it may be found useful by our readers.

Thomas Cooper is now seventy-seven years of age, having been born at Leicester, England, in 1805. His father was an itinerant dyer, who obtained a precarious subsistence by travelling about the country and practising his trade wherever he could find opportunity. He died when Thomas was four years old, and his widow returned to Lincolnshire, the locality in which she was born, and there struggled for a living for herself and her boy. It was a hard struggle and at best was far from a success.

For a long time her principal reliance was on the sale of cardboard boxes, which she made at home and then carried on her head through the public streets and the lanes of the country, peddling them to the farmers. One of Thomas's is of one of these expeditions, on which he, when a boy of six years old, accompanied her. It was a special journey, and the proceeds were sorely needed to make up the money for rent. Thomas recollects how they met on the road a chimney sweep and his two helpers, and how the man tried to induce his mother by the offer of two gold pieces worth ten dollars to put the child in his service. At that time machines for sweeping chimneys were not in use, and small, slight boys were in demand, who were compelled to climb the chimneys and sweep them by hand. If the widow was tempted by the sight of the gold, her child's terror and entreaties soon enabled her to overcome the temptation and refuse the offer. (This scene is depicted in one of the panels of our frontispiece.)

EARLIEST RECOLLECTIONS

The widow's difficulties were increased by an attack of illness under which her boy suffered and which came near ending his life. He first of all took the small-pox, which he had so severely that he was blind for nineteen days, was worn till the bones came through the skin in several parts of his body, and he was thrice believed, for some moments, to be dead. He was scarcely convalescent when measles and scarlet fever followed the more dreaded disease. A whole year was thus made memorable by affliction, and when, at five years of age, he again went out of doors, he himself says "I felt—child though I was—the humbling change that had come over me. I was no longer saluted cheerfully and with a smile, no longer flattered, and called a 'pretty boy.' Some frowned, with sour-natured dislike, at my marred visage; while others looked pitiful, and said, 'Poor thing!'"

Soon afterward an opportunity for acquiring a little learning was placed in the boy's way. A free school was established in the village. It was founded by some benevolent man who endowed it as a permanent means of usefulness. He stipulated, according to the custom of the day, that the boys who accepted the advantage offered of a free education, should, during the process of acquiring it wear a peculiar cap and coat, also provided gratuitously. It was a conspicuous costume of blue with bright yellow trimmings. The villagers would thus be able to mark the boys who were so poor as to be glad of a free education, and they would be continually reminded of the liberality and generosity of the founder who was not anxious that his good deeds should be in secret.

It was during this period of his life that he read the immortal "Pilgrim's Progress," which became his book of books, and hours of wonder and rapture he passed with John Bunyan, as he told his story of the difficulties and conquests of Christian and Faithful, or the fierce encounters between Great Heart and Giant Despair.

EARLY CONVICTIONS OF SIN.

In his fourteenth year Thomas was strongly impressed with the necessity of repentance and forgiveness of sin. One Sunday morning he ran out, with a crowd of the neighbors, to hear two men who were singing aloud as they went along on their way to the market-place, "Turn to the Lord and seek Salvation." These men were members of the Primitive Methodist Church, and remained in the town for some weeks, preaching in the open air, and holding meetings in houses; and the crowds that gathered were always greatly affected. Soon a society was formed, and regular preaching began in the very small chapel which John Wesley himself caused to be built, and which still stands, though it is now used as a warehouse.

The lad became a member of this society, in company with about a dozen other lads, some of whom were older and some younger than himself. His anguish and sorrow for sin were indescribable. His grief continued for weeks, he could read nothing but the Bible, and went away in some secret place twenty times a day to pray for the pardon of his sins. At length he believed that he had been converted, but, as is generally the case with boys of his emotional temperament when brought in contact with such excitement, he mistook the wild fervor of his spirit for the new birth.

The time soon came when it was necessary that he should do something to earn a livelihood. He was attracted by the sea and engaged himself as a sailor, but after nine days spent in helping to load the ship with her cargo, he became wearied and returned to his mother without going to sea. His next essay in the direction of self-support was as a shoemaker. He entered the service of a man of that trade, with whom he remained a year, and with another employer a year and a half, and from the two men learned sufficient of the trade to be able to make rough clumsy shoes, which the poorer storekeepers would buy of him. In this way working in a corner of his mother's dwelling he was able to earn a little money, never more than two dollars and a half a week.

At this time his mind took the not uncommon turn of swinging from the ecstatic religious state, to which it had attained in the little Methodist chapel, into doubt and scepticism. He, however, providentially became acquainted with a young man named Macdonald, to whom he imparted his doubts. Macdonald was a Christian, and while not negligent of his religious associations, was a great reader and thinker. Commending his young friend for asserting his mental freedom, he directed him to a course of solid reading, and lent him Robertson's histories of Scotland and America, and Neale's "History of the Puritans," and urged him to get a better acquaintance with theology.

Another acquaintance Cooper formed was that of John Hough, who was a broad general reader, had an excellent library, and made his friend Thomas welcome to the loan of every book in it that he desired to read. He frequently spoke with much earnestness to him of his spiritual condition, reminding him of the true wisdom there is in being prepared to die.

GROWTH OF SCEPTICAL DOUBTS.

To him, therefore, Cooper confided, without any concealment, the doubts he had already gathered from reading certain sceptical books, and he was solemnly advised to enter on a course of reading of the "Evidences of Christianity." He promised to do so, and that he would inquire into the truth of both natural and revealed religion.

The zest with which the young man pursued knowledge under many difficulties was attended with the customary penalties which are inexorably demanding for over-work. But it was not till the summer of 1827, when he was a little more than two-and-twenty, that the eager student felt his bodily strength, and with it his power of mind, were really giving way. In the month of November the complete failure came. He fainted in his chair, and had to be carried to bed, where in a condition of prostration he remained for nine weeks.

BECOMES A SCHOOLMASTER.

A good constitution, and the blessing of the Almighty resting upon a physician's skill, enabled Mr. Cooper at last to leave the sick bed. It soon became evident, however, that he would never again be equal to hard manual labor. His friends, therefore, proposed to him that he should try the profession of a schoolmaster. The suggestion was accepted; a large club-room, which was already furnished with forms and boards, that would serve for desks, was secured; and on March 10th, 1828, he somewhat timorously opened school.

In the course of a year the young schoolmaster had a hundred scholars on his list, and he characteristically threw his whole nature into the undertaking while it was new. His school was a perfect passion with him for a time, but after the boys had passed away who had been his first scholars, and he had to begin anew with dull intellects amid discouragements, the keen delight which he at first realized became blunted; and he began to feel the work to be laborious, unwelcome drudgery.

The anxieties and resolutions of a bed of sickness brought their fruit, and while working as a schoolmaster he regularly attended the Methodist chapel and took an active part in class-meetings and local preaching, and appears to have become popular.

MARRIAGE.

At Christmas, 1829, Mr. Cooper visited Lincoln to see and hear a revivalist preacher. It was at this time he saw in the house of her brother, the lady who afterward became his wife. The first glimpse of her won him to her; and after conversation with her, his heart said, "This is the woman I should like for a wife," though he said not one word about it; and it was not until July 1st, 1831, that he ventured to offer his hand and heart, and was accepted. In November, 1833, the school at Gainsborough was given up, and another entered upon, at Lincoln; and on February 18th, 1834, Mr. Cooper was married, and after a time his mother gave up work, and joined her son and his bride in their humble though happy home.

Having experienced some slight at the hands of the officials of Methodism in the locality, Mr. Cooper cut himself off from their society. The occasion for doing so constituted, for years afterward, a source of regret to him, soured his mind against all religious professors, and raised within him a rebellious spirit. Soon he left off the habit of attending public worship, relinquished private devotion and even scoffed at religion and its preachers and professors.

It was at Lincoln that Mr. Cooper first mingled with the real world, and began to understand that he belonged to it. He became a member of the Mechanics' Institute, and was elected on its first committee. But his first, most earnest business, when he settled at Lincoln, was to set about the renewal of his studies. As usual with him he commenced his work with more impetuosity than discretion. He attempted the acquisition of Greek, Hebrew, and French, to which he added Italian and German. He also attended a series of lectures on chemistry, by Mr. Murray—a well-known lecturer of the time—at the Institute, and his acquaintance with this gentleman opened his way, most unexpectedly, to a new kind of life.

HIS INTRODUCTION TO THE PRESS.

He wrote a paragraph descriptive of the chemistry lectures, and sent it to the Mercury, the local journal, and about a month afterward, Richard Newcomb, the proprietor of the paper, called upon him, thanked him for the paragraph, and offered him $100 a year "to collect a few items of market and other news, and send them to him weekly," but, before long, Mr. Newcomb made much larger demands upon his time and attention.

In 1836 Thomas Cooper ceased to be a schoolmaster, and became the correspondent of the Mercury. He wrote trenchant paragraphs on cur-local abuses, which raised up an army of enemies against him; but many of these soon became friends. The paper rose in circulation; its stirring criticisms were eagerly anticipated and avidly read; and a series of short articles, entitled "Lincoln Preachers," in which the Dean, Precentor, the Chancellor, etc., all had their weaknesses drawn as preachers and men, made the item yet more intense. The Nonconformist Wesleyan ministers also were presented with their portraits, very much to their chagrin, vexation, and mortification.

Mr. Cooper was nursing in his heart the resolve, one day, he would write a book that, by reason of its merits, should command success, though he had no idea of what the subject should be, and found himself quite unable to determine. The war came suddenly to his mind one day as he was in one of the recesses of the windows of the old hall, attending a meeting of the Town Council in his capacity of reporter to the Mercury. He perceived, as in a moment, the production of either a drama, or an epic, wherein the spirits of suicidal passions, and other remarkable personages, should be eloquutors on some high theme, and resolved to do it.

"THE PURGATORY OF SUICIDES."

He wrote down, on one of the leaves of his retting book, the names of Demosthenes, and Hannibal, and Brutus, and Cassius, and Cato, and Nero, and Ahiathophel, and Judas Iscariot, and others, and others at the time, and preserved the leaf. He kept the title before him, and never thought of changing it.

He had now permanently adopted the press as a profession, and after removing from one journal to another, for some time, he finally drifted to Leicester, where he became reporter for the Leicestershire Mercury.

THOMAS COOPER'S LIFE AT LEICESTER

He came in every way memorable, but chiefly owing to the fact that it was in his capacity as reporter to the Leicestershire Mercury, that he heard the first lecture by a Chartist lecturer, to which he ever listened. The theories of the Chartists were just of a character most likely to act on such a mind as Cooper's. The Chartists were radical politicians who were pledged to work together for the redress of the grievances of the people. Their name was derived from the document in which they stated their platform. O'Connell was at the meeting at which the platform was adopted, and as he handed the paper to the secretary he said, "There's your charter; agitate for it and take nothing less." It was considered by the aristocrats a revolutionary programme, but of the six aims or "points" it detailed, four are now incorporated in the British Constitution.

In 1841, Cooper fully identified himself with the artist movement, both on the press and upon the platform. The power of argument and declamation, which characterized his speeches, very speedily made him one of the foremost men in the agitation. The poverty which he beheld among the working-men of the town, his own past and present hardships, filled him with frenzy, and his weekly discourses on Sabbath evenings in the market-place became fierce and indignant.

In 1842 riots broke out in several towns, and one occurred at Leicester, in which the windows of the Poor House were broken, and a troop of soldiers was sent for to overawe the rioters. Matters went from bad to worse; and so marked a man did Cooper become, that he was regarded by the authorities as a most dangerous agitator. In this year he was arrested by the Leicester police, and committed to Stafford Jail, on the charge of being in a riot.

A PRISONER IN STAFFORD JAIL.

In 1843 Thomas Cooper was still an inmate of Stafford Jail, and bitterly complaining of the severe treatment which he experienced. During his incarceration he had been revolving in his mind the possibilities of bringing about a reformation in the prison discipline. He refused to go to the chapel, because he and other Chartist prisoners were crowded up in a close box during service, and had to look at the officiating chaplain through iron bars. One day, however, he consented to attend service, not from religious motives but to annoy the preacher and jailers. So, taking a prayer-book in his hand, he accompanied his fellow prisoners, and occupied his seat immediately facing the pulpit. Presently, the chaplain in his white surplice entered; and no sooner did Thomas Cooper see him than he bounded forward, and seizing him by the arm, just as he was stepping upon the pulpit stairs he cried, "Are you a minister of Christ? If you be, see me righted. They are starving me on 'skilly' and bad potatoes; and they neither let me write to my wife, nor receive a letter from her."

The affrighted chaplain shook like an aspen leaf, and could not speak. "D'ye hear, man?" Cooper cried, shaking him by the arm, "Will you see me righted, I say?" "He's mad!—he's mad!" gasped the chaplain; "take him off! take him away!" Four of the turnkeys seized the sturdy prisoner by the legs, and bore him away, while he made the chapel and vaulted passages ring with the shouts of "Murder! murder!" (A picture on our front page represents this incident.)

His pertinacity, combined with the aid of powerful friends outside, in course of time procured the irrepressible Chartist the privileges he desired, and for some months he wrote poetry and studied Hebrew, until on May 4th, 1845, he was liberated from prison, and once more went to London.

During his journalistic work and his political agitation he drifted farther and farther from religious truth, and was especially bitter against Methodism and the Methodists. Clouds of doubt began to roll across his reason of a darker and more horrible shade than a mere disbelief of the Gospel records; and the coarse atheism expressed by some of the more reckless among the workmen often found a startling echo in his mind. His angered and distempered mind set itself defiantly to resist the thought of a God, in which, for a time, he but too well succeeded.

Arrived in London, he waited on Mr. Duncombe, an influential member of Parliament, and obtained from him a letter of introduction to Mr. Disraeli, afterward Earl of Beaconsfield. Duncombe wrote:

"My dear Disraeli—I send you Mr. Cooper, a Chartist, red-hot from Stafford Jail. But don't be frightened. He won't bite you. He has written a poem and a romance, and thinks he can cut out 'Coningsby' and 'Sybil'. Help him, if you can, and oblige, yours, F. S. DUNCOMBE."

It was on Sunday afternoon that, authorized by this note, Mr. Cooper proceeded to the house of Mr. Disraeli, afterward Lord Beaconsfield, at Grosvenor Gate, Hyde Park. Of the visit and interview Mr. Cooper himself has said: "A tall footman in livery led me into what was evidently the literary man's 'study'—a small room at the top of the house. 'I wish I had seen you before I finished my last book,' said Mr. Disraeli to me, 'my heroine, Sybil, is a Chartist.' I gave into his hand the MS. of the First Book of my 'Purgatory of Suicides.' 'I shall be happy to read it,' he said; 'but what do you wish me to do?' 'To write to Mr. Moxon,' said I, 'and recommend him to publish it—if you think it right to do so, when you have looked it over.' He then directed me to call on a certain day in the week following, when he promised a note should be ready for Mr. Moxon." (A panel in the frontispiece depicts this event.)

LITERARY AND LECTURING CAREER.

From this period onwards, till 1856, Mr. Cooper devoted himself to literary work, and lecturing in London and the provinces. For twelve years of that time he was a sceptic, and for two years he devoted himself to hard reading and thinking upon the great truths of Christianity. His conviction of personal sin, meanwhile, deepened to such a degree as to threaten the overturn of his reason. He received much assistance, at this period, from Dr. Jobson, the well-known Methodist minister, and the Rev. Charles Kingsley. His bondage was suddenly broken, and as the words were running through his mind that had been familiar to him when he was a Bluecoat boy in Lincolnshire he repeated the expressive and touching confession of the Church of England Prayer-Book: "Almighty and most merciful Father, I have erred and strayed from Thy ways like a lost sheep," etc.

Mr. Cooper now commenced to lecture on Theism, the Moral Government of God, and the Christian Evidences, and advanced to the doctrines of the Atonement, Faith, and Repentance, in which work he encountered considerable opposition from his old atheistic friends. With the beginning of 1858 he began to receive very urgent requests from different parts of the country to lecture on his new subjects. So he went on a lecturing tour, which was a success. From that time to the present he has been in the lecture field, and his one subject has been to defend the truths and the doctrines of the Bible against the attacks of atheism, and to impress on young men the arguments in favor of revealed religion. In this he has been very successful, his own experience being an unerring guide to the strength and the weakness of scepticism.

"DON'T GO IN THERE, SIR."

One other incident in Mr. Cooper's life must close our sketch of this remarkable man. He had arranged with his friend, Dr. Jobson, to go to Yorkshire to lecture. They were to meet at the depot, and Mr. Cooper having arrived first was about to enter a car when a porter touched him on the shoulder (see illustration page 205), and said: "Don't go in there, sir; go a little lower down."

The English railroad cars are not entered as ours are from the end, but are divided into compartments capable of accommodating ten or twelve persons, and each compartment has its separate door in the side of the car. It is not an uncommon practice for a party wishing to have exclusive use of a compartment, to give a gratuity to a porter to induce him to keep other people out. This was probably the cause of the porter's request to Mr. Cooper, but it was providentially the means of saving his life.

Mr. Cooper yielded to the man, but felt a little surprised at his request. He had just put his satchel under the seat of the car to which the porter had conducted him, and was looking out for his friend, the Rev. Dr. Jobson, when he saw him about to enter the very carriage he had left. He beckoned him, and he came and entered the same car with Mr. Cooper, but expressed his surprise when he was told how the porter had particularly led him to it. The friends conversed for about an hour when they experienced a sudden shock, a wrench, and then the car glided on a few yards and stopped. On alighting the passengers saw from what a fate they had been preserved. The engine and first three cars, one of which was that Mr. Cooper had been prevented entering, had left the rails and rolled down an embankment. The passengers were all seriously hurt and many of them were killed. As he looked on the dead and dying, the converted sceptic offered sincere thanks to God for the exercise of a Providential care of which he humbly acknowledged himself unworthy.

An Escape from a Burning Coal Pit.—A scene of extraordinary excitement was witnessed on September 14th, at the Pentre Colliery, Glamorganshire, Wales, on it becoming known that a fire had broken out in the pit, in which upwards of four hundred men were employed. Immediately on the alarm being given, there was a rush of terrified women and children to the mouth of the pit to learn the truth. Happily, the mine had three shafts, and to this circumstance it was probably owing that no life was lost. John Thomas, who was in the pit, says: "We gave up labor when the smoke became suffocating. When we started for the pit we were in total darkness, and well-nigh choked. Our lamps, too, went out. I was too exhausted even to carry my little boy, and some one else did this instead. I fell several times on the way. I thought the pit had taken fire, because there was such a sulphurous smell, and everything seemed to be over. A man behind us called out for help, but we could give him none. My little boy could not stand. I put the boy upon my back. I could not do this long, however, and I had to drop him, and leave him on the roadway. I don't know how I managed to get along, but I was half dead. I found myself at last at the bottom, and I was taken up. After Dr. J. R. James had seen to me, I was at the lamp station, at the pit top, when my little boy was carried in."

THE OLD HOMESTEAD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
March 26, 1882.

"As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."
—JOSHUA 24 : 15.

What Kind of Guest Religion is, in a House—Isaac Watts' Thirty-five Year Visit—What Religion Did in Your Father's Home—The Scene at Family Prayer—Its After-Influence—A Little Child's Question—A Family well Launched—Mother's Prayers—Visit your Father's Grave—Let Religion in at the Front Door—Prayer in the Trapper's Cabin—A Family Incident—A Grandfather's Prayers Spoil an Entertainment—A Whole Family Enter the Kingdom of God—A Covenant with Three Neighbors—A Family Bible—Illustrations Superior to Doré's—A Subject with Two Arms—A Place Kept for the Children.

ABSURD Joshua! You have no time for family religion. You are a military man and your entire time will be taken with affairs connected with the army. You are a statesman. You are the Washington, the Wellington, the MacMahon of the Israelitish army, and you will have no time for religion. But Joshua in the same voice with which he commanded the sun and the moon to halt and stack arms of light on the parade ground of the Heavens, cried out: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Before we make the same resolution it is best for us to see whether it is a wise and sensible resolution. If religion is going to put my piano out of tune, and clog the feet of my children racing through the hall, and sour the bread, and put crape on the door bell, I do not want it to come into my house. I paid six dollars to hear Jenny Lind warble. I never paid a cent to hear anybody groan. I want to know what religion is going to do if it gets into my house; what it is going to do in the dining hall, in the nursery, in the parlor, in the sleeping apartment, in every room from cellar to attic.

It is very easy to invite a guest to come to your house, but if he turn out to be a disagreeable guest, it is not so easy to get rid of him. You had better find out the character of the guest before you invite him to come in. Isaac Watts went to visit Sir Thomas and Lady Abney at their place at Theobalds, expecting to stay a week, and he stayed thirty-five years. And if you get religion into your house, the probability is it will not stay a week, or a month, or a year, but forever. Do not, therefore, invite religion into your homestead until you know what religion is, until you know some of its characteristics, whether it is going to cast a joy or a gloom on your household, whether it is going to be an exhilaration or it is going to be a depletion.

The practical question that I want to discuss with you, my friends—not professionally, but as a friend talks with a friend, or a brother talks with a brother—the practical question I want to discuss with you this morning, is, if it gets there?
WHAT WILL RELIGION DO FOR OUR HOUSEHOLD

Question the first: What did religion do in your father's household, if you were brought up in a Christian home? This morning the scene all flashes back upon you. It is time for morning prayers in the old homestead. You are called in. You sit down. You are somewhat fidgetty while you listen to the reading. Your father makes no pretence to rhetorical reading of the Scripture, but just goes right on and reads in a plain way. Then you all kneel. You remember it now just as well as though it were yesterday. If you were an artist you could photograph the scene. You were not as devotional perhaps as your older brothers or sisters, and while they had their heads bowed solemnly down, you were thoughtless and looking around, and you know just the posture of your father and mother, and brothers and sisters.

The prayer was longer than you would like to have had it. It was about the same prayer morning by morning and night by night, for your father had the same sins to deplore and the same blessings to thank God for. You were somewhat impatient to have the prayers over. Perhaps the game of ball was waiting, or the skates were lying under the shed, or you wanted to look two or three times over your lesson before you started for school, and you were somewhat impatient. After a while, the prayers were over. Your parents did not rise from the floor as easily as you, for their limbs were rheumatic and stiffened with age.

Prayers were over. You recall it all this morning. A tear trickles down your cheek and it seems to melt all that scene, but it comes back again. There is father, there is mother, there are your brothers and your sisters. Was that morning exercise in your father's house degrading or elevating? As you look back now thirty, forty, fifty years, you hear the same prayers—the prayers of 1830, 1840, 1850, just as familiar to your mind now as though you had heard them yesterday, although the lips that uttered them long ago turned to dust. But all that scene comes back. Was it elevating or degrading?

Do you not realize that there has been many a battle in life when that scene upheld you? Do you not remember, O man, when once you proposed to go to some place where you ought not to go, and that prayer jerked you back? Do you now, my brother, my sister, reviewing that scene, bringing it to your mind—do you really think it was good economy, or a waste of time that your father and mother spent those moments in prayer for themselves and prayer for their families?

Ah! my friends, we begin to think of it this morning, and we come almost to the conclusion that if those scenes were improving to our father's household, they would be improving to our own household. They did no damage there; they do no damage now. "Is God dead?" said a little child to her father. "Is God dead?" "O, no," he said, "my child; what do you ask that question for?" "O," she said, "when mother was living we used to have prayers, but since mother has been dead we have not had prayers. I thought perhaps God was dead too."

A FAMILY WELL LAUNCHED

In the morning with prayer goes with a blessing all day. The breakfast hour over, the family scatter—some to household cares, some to school, some to business life in New York or Brooklyn. Before night comes there will be many temptations, many perils, perils of mis-step, perils of street car, perils of the ferryboat, perils of quick temper; many temptations threatening to do you harm. Somewhere between seven o'clock A.M. and ten o'clock P.M., there may be a moment when you will want God. O! you had better launch the day right. It will not hinder you, my brother, in business life. It will be a secular advantage.

A man went off to the war and fought for his country, and the children stayed and cultivated the farm, and the mother prayed. One young man was telling the story afterward and some one hearing the story said: "Well, well, your father fighting, children digging on the farm, and mother praying at home; it seem to me all these agencies ought to bring us out of our national troubles." I tell you, my friends, pray, and be industrious, and you will get a livelihood. You might say, "Give us this day our daily bread," and then fold your arms and starve to death; but industry and prayer will give you temporal prosperity.

O! my friends, what has been your memory, what is your memory this morning, of those early scenes? Do you think we had better have God in our own household? "O," says some one, "I can't formulate a prayer; I never prayed in my life." Well then, my brother, there are Philip Henry's prayers, and McDuff's prayers, and Doddridge's prayers, and Episcopal Church prayers and a score of good books with supplications appropriate to your family. If you do not feel yourself competent to formulate a prayer, just take one of those prayer books, put it down on the bottom of the chair, kneel by it and then commend to a merciful God your own soul and the souls of your family.

"O!" says a father, "I couldn't do that at all; I am naturally so retiring and reticent it is impossible." Well, I think sometimes it is the mother's duty to lead in the prayer. I say, sometimes. She knows more of God, she knows more about the family wants, she can read the Scriptures with more tender enunciation. To put it in plain words, she prays better. I remember my father praying morning by morning and night by night but when he was absent from home and mother prayed it was very different. Thou sometimes when father prayed we were listless indifferent we were none of us listless or indifferent when mother prayed, for we remember just how she looked on the floor, with her hand to her brow as she said: "I ask not for my children riches honor, or fame, but I ask that they all may become subjects of Thy converting grace." "Why," you say, "I never could forget that;" neither could you.

O! these mothers, they seem to decide everything. Nero's mother was a murderess. Lord Byron's mother was haughty and impious. So you might have judged from their children. Walter Scott's mother was fond of poetry. Washington's mother was patriotic. St. Bernard's mother was a noble-minded woman. So you might have judged from their children.

Good men have good mothers. There are exceptions to the rule, but they are only exceptions. The father and the mother loving God, their children are almost certain to love God. The son may make a wide curve from the straight path, but will almost be sure to curve back again after awhile. God remembers the prayers and brings the son back on the right road after a while again sometimes after the parents are gone. How often we hear it said: "O! he was a wild young man until his father's death; since that he has been very different; he has been very steady since his father's death, he has become a Christian." The fact is that the lid of the father's casket is often the altar of repentance for a wandering boy. The marble pillar of the tomb is the point at which many a young man has been revolutionized.

O! young man, how long is it since you went out to your father's grave? Perhaps you had better go this week. Perhaps the storms of last winter may have bent the headstone toward the earth and it may need straightening. Perhaps the letter may be somewhat defaced by the elements. Perhaps the gate of the lot may be open. Perhaps you might find a sermon in the faded grass. Better go out and look. O! prodigal, do you remember your father's house? Do you think that religion which did for the old people would do well for you?

It seems to me we are all resolved to have religion in our houses, but

LET IT COME IN AT THE FRONT DOOR

and not at the back door. In other words do not let us try to smuggle religion into the household. Do not let us be like those families that feel very much mortified when they are caught at family prayers. They do not dare to sing at family prayers lest the neighbors should hear them, and they never have prayers when they have company. (If we are going to have religion in our house let it come in at the front door.)

Some of our beautiful homes here in Brooklyn have not the courage of

THE WESTERN TRAPPER.

A traveller passing along far away from home was overtaken by night and by a storm, and he put up in a cabin. He saw firearms there. It was a rough-looking place, but he did not dare to go in the darkness and storm. He had a large amount of money with him and he felt very much excited and disturbed. After a while the trapper came home. He had a gun on his shoulder. He put the gun roughly down in the cabin, and then the traveller was more disturbed. He was sure he was not safe in that place. After a while he heard the family talking together, and he said, "No, they are plotting for my ruin; I wish I was out the night and storm instead of being here; I would be safe there."

After a while, the old trapper came up to the traveller and said: "Stranger, we are a rough people; we get our living by hunting, and when we come in at night we are quite tired and we go to bed early, but before we go to bed, we are in the habit of reading a few verses from the Scripture and say a short prayer; if you don't believe in such things, if you would just please to step outside the or for a little while, I'll be obliged to you." There was the courage to do one's whole duty under all circumstances, and a house that has prayers in it is a safe house, it is a holy house, it is a finely guarded house. So the traveller found out he tarried in the cabin of that western trapper. But there are families that want religion a good way off, but within calling distance for a funeral; not to have religion dominant in the household from the first day of January, seven o'clock A.M. to the forty-first day of December, ten o'clock P.M., they do not want it.

I had in
MY ANCESTRAL HOME
An incident of which I have told you once, but I must tell it again for the encouragement of all Christian parents, and as it was blessed of God when I recited it before, so may it be blessed in hundreds of households here represented to-day. My grandfather and grandmother went from Somerville to Baskenridge to attend revival meetings under the ministry of Dr. Finley. They were so impressed with the meetings that when they came back to Somerville, they were seized upon by a great desire for the salvation of their children. That evening the children were going off to a gay party, and my grandmother said to the children, "When you get all ready for the entertainment come into my room; I have something very important to tell you." After they were all ready for the gay entertainment, they came into my grandmother's room and she said to them, "Go and have a good time; but while you are gone I want you to know I am praying for you and will do nothing but pray for you until you get back." They went off to the gay entertainment. They did not enjoy it much because they thought all the time of the fact that mother was praying for them. The evening passed. The children returned. The next day my grandparents heard sobbing and crying in the daughter's room, and they went in and heard her praying for the salvation of God, and she said—her daughter Phebe said: "I wish you would go to the barn and to the wagon house for Jehiel and David (the brothers), are under powerful conviction of sin." My grandparent went to the barn, and Jehiel, who afterward became an eminent minister of the Gospel, was imploring the salvation of God, and then having first knelt with him and commended his soul to Christ, they went to the wagon house, and there was David crying for the salvation of God—David, who afterward became my father.

The whole family was swept into the kingdom of Jesus Christ. David could not keep the story to himself, and he crossed the fields to a farmhouse and told one to whom he had been affianced the story of his own salvation, and she yielded her heart to God. It was David and Catherine, and they stood up in the village church together a few weeks after—for the story of the converted household went all through the neighborhood—in a few weeks two hundred souls stood up in the plain meeting house at Somerville to profess faith in Christ, among them David and Catherine, afterward my parents.

My mother, impressed with that, in after life, when she had a large family of children gathered around her, made A COVENANT WITH THREE NEIGHBORS,
Three mothers. They would meet once a week to pray for the salvation of their children until all their children were converted—this incident not known until after my mother's death, the covenant then revealed by one of the survivors. We used to say: "Mother, where are you going," and she would say, "I am just going out a little while; going over to the neighbors." They kept on in that covenant until all their families were brought into the kingdom of God, myself the last, and I trace the line of results back to that evening when my grandmother commended our family to Christ, the tide of influence going on until this hour, and will never cease.

O! I tell this for the encouragement of fathers and mothers who are praying for their children. Take courage. God will answer prayer. He will keep His bargain. He will remember His covenant. O! my friends, take your family Bible and read out of it this afternoon. Some of you have such a Bible in the household. I have one in my home. It is a perfect fascination to me. If you looked at it, you would not find a page that was not discolored either with time or tears. My parents read out of it as long as I can remember; morning and evening they read out of it.

When my brother Van Nest died in a foreign land, and the news came to our country home, that night they read the eternal consolations out of the old book. When my brother David died in this city, then that book comforted the old people in their trouble. My father in mid-life, fifteen years an invalid, out of that book read of the ravens that fed Elijah all through the hard struggle for bread. When my mother died that book illumined the dark valley. In the years that followed of loneliness, it comforted my father with the thought of reunion which took place afterward in Heaven.

Doré never illustrated a Bible as that Bible is illustrated to me, or your family Bible is illustrated to you. Only three or four pictures in it, but we look right through and we see the marriages and the burials, the joys and the sorrows, the thanksgiving days and the Christmas festivals, the cradles and the death-beds.

OLD, OLD BOOK.
The hand that leafed you has gone to ashes; the eyes that perused you are closed. Old, old book! What a pillow thou wouldst make for a dying head!

O! I believe this morning, that, under the power of the Holy Ghost, there are hundreds of people here who are going to invite religion into their household. Let religion come into the dining-room to break the bread, into the parlor to purify the socialities, into the library to select the reading, into the bed-room to hallow the slumber, into the hallway to watch us when we go out and when we come in. There are hundreds of people here this morning, I believe, who are ready to say from their heart with the old soldier of the text, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

My subject has
TWO ARMS.
One arm of this subject puts its hand on the head of parents and says: "Do not interfere with your children's happiness, do not intercept their eternal welfare, do not put out your foot and trip any of them into a ruin. Start them under the shelter and benediction of the Christian religion. Catechisms will not save them, though catechisms are good; the rod will not save them, though the rod may be necessary; lessons of virtue will not save them, though such lessons are very important. Your becoming a Christian through and through, up and down, out and out, will make your children Christians."

The other arm of this subject puts its hand on all those who had good bringing up, but as yet have not yielded to the anticipations in regard to them. I said that the path of the son or the daughter might widely diverge, and yet it is almost certain that the wandering one would come around again on the straight path. There are exceptions, and you, my brother, might be the exception. You have curved out long enough; it is time to curve in. Would it not be awful after all the prayers offered for your salvation, if you missed Heaven? If your parents prayed for you twenty years and they offered two prayers a day for twenty years, that would make 29,200 prayers for you. Those 29,200 prayers are either the mountain over which you will climb into Heaven, or they will be an avalanche coming down upon your soul.

O! by the cradle that rocked your childhood with the foot that long ceased to move; by the crib in which your children sleep might by night under God's protecting care; by the two graves in which the two old hearts are resting, the two hearts that beat with love toward you since before you were born; by the two graves in which you, the now living father and mother, will soon repose, I urge you to faithfulness.

"Though parents may in covenant be
And have their Heaven in view,
They are not happy till they see
Their children happy too."

O! thou glorified Christian ancestry. Bend from the skies to-day and give new emphasis to what you told us once with tears and many anxieties. Keep a place for us by your blissful side, for to-day in the presence of earth and Heaven and hell, and by the help of the cross, and amid these overwhelming and gracious memories we all resolve, each one for himself and for his loved ones: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." May the Lord God of Joshua have mercy on us!

INCIDENTS AT THE MOODY AND SANKEY SERVICES IN SCOTLAND.

Remarkable After-meetings.—The After-meetings on Sunday, January 15th, were among the most remarkable ever held by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. At the close of the women's meeting in the Free Church Assembly Hall, those who had received blessing during the time of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's visit to Edinburgh, and those who were anxious about their souls' welfare, were invited to go to St. John's Free Church in High Street. The ground floor of the sanctuary was wholly occupied by these two classes. At the conclusion of the men's meeting a similar request was made by Mr. Moody, and again the building, with the exception of the galleries, was crowded. The converts were asked to stand up and testify when they had yielded themselves to their Saviour; and one by one at least one hundred persons rose—gray-haired men, young men, and boys—and told when they had received salvation. Some of them just mentioned the date, others merely the place—as January 12th, or "the Corn Exchange." Some of the conversions dated nearly from the commencement of the Evangelists' visit, others were more recent and in one or two instances "this night" expressed the time of change. Afterwards, those who were anxious and desired prayer were asked to come to the front. Many persons did so, and earnest prayer was offered. The meetings were impressively solemn.

Other Trophies of Conquest.—Mr. J. Wilson said: "On Sunday week, at the men's inquiry meeting, Mr. Moody brought a man to me, and asked me to take him up into the gallery and talk with him. I did so, and after about half an hour's conversation he grasped me by the hand, and told me that the light had at last come into his heart. He said that Jesus was his Saviour, and I knew by the way in which he grasped my hand that he was speaking from the heart, and that he had entered into the peace which passeth all understanding. Last Monday night, in Mr. Kelman's church, among the people who first came to the front were this man and his wife. I said to the latter, 'Well, have you decided for Christ?' She answered, 'Yes; while Mr. Moody was speaking, I took Christ to be my Saviour. My husband came home last night and told me about his conversation, and from 10 o'clock until 1 o'clock in the morning he was trying to point me to Jesus, but I could not see the way. I could not sleep all night. I came down with my husband to the meeting, and now I have taken Jesus, and I am going home rejoicing.' Among the men who last night testified what great things the Lord had done for them was that woman's husband. As I was afterwards speaking to him he said, looking up at the gallery, 'There is the pew where I found the Lord last Sunday night; I will never forget it.'"

The Last Meeting Possible.—The Rev. Mr. Jolly said: "A lady told me that a fortnight ago, on the occasion of the meeting when prayer was made for the afflicted, she was sitting behind a young lady who was from the country, as she afterwards discovered, and noticing that she was weeping, and that she seemed in very great distress, she determined to speak to her, fearing that she had lost some relative, or had some one belonging to her in deep affliction. At the close of the meeting, therefore, the lady asked her, 'What is the cause of your trouble?' and the young lady replied, 'I am weeping because this is the last day that I remain here, and am able to attend the meetings.'"

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 187.)

Miles Rossiter's Visit to Sylph—Tells her News of the Old House—Declares his Love and Proposes Marriage—Sylph's Refusal—Miles Explains his Plans—Is informed of the Engagement with Capt. Vaughan—His Chagrin at Finding whose Life he had Saved—Sylph's Earnest Appeal.

GLOOM was gathering, frowning and dark, around Miles; his path was becoming most difficult and dangerous. His meeting with Sylph had rekindled within him a love of consuming power; and, yet, at the same hour, circumstances around him seemed to render the attainment of his burning wishes to the last degree hopeless.

It would have been prudent of Miles to shut out from his mind all thoughts of Sylph, and resolve never more to come within the charm of her presence. The young Irishman, however, had not sufficient strength of will for this self-denial. He had told her he would see her again in the evening if he could. To see her was possible, and he would at least once more—only once more, however, he said, come near to listen to the sweet and thrilling music of her voice, to gladden in her sunlit smile, and to feel the exquisite fascination of her beauty. "One quaff more from the enchanted cup," said Miles, "and then I surrender it forever."

Sylph was glad to hear the footsteps of Miles approaching the farmer's dwelling in the evening, and yet there was, also, a strange apprehension and uneasiness in her gladness. There had been a fervor in Miles's manner in their last interview, which caused her instinctively to suspect that there was more than friendship in his heart towards her. And, yet, might she not, after all, be mistaken? There was surely enough of the unexpected and marvellous in their meeting to fully account for anything peculiar in the young man's language and conduct. And, then, Miles too, she reflected, was no doubt, an excitable and emotional Irishman, so that his ardor of soul in her presence, which in an Englishman would, perhaps, mean a great deal, might, after all, have but very little significance in the case of Miles Rossiter.

Miles came unattended, to enjoy this interview with Sylph alone; the last, he said within himself, that he was to indulge himself with. The future beyond was as a starless night to him; but, no matter, he would give himself up to the happy noonday brightness of the present. He involuntarily lifted up his thoughts in prayer to heaven, for the wise direction of his future, whatever it might be. And more than once he yearned for such a fellowship with Christ, such as on one occasion he had heard Sylph speak of at Chester, so that, like herself, in every emergency of life he might enjoy His blessed companionship and the light of His inspiring smile.

He found Sylph by herself in a little parlor, which was entered by a door from the large kitchen of the farmhouse. The window of the room looked out upon a small flower garden, and there was just light enough in the gloaming of the early summer evening to enable Miles to see the graceful forms of the tall lilies and their floral companions in the garden.

Sylph was sitting at the window when Miles came into the room, and her position, and what she seemed to have been dreamily looking out upon, suggested at once to him the circumstances under which he had first seen the fair woman who had thrown the spell of her blissful and yet painful enchantment around him.

"Ah! Sylph," he said, "how you remind me of the happy moments that I knew long ago in that old, quaint house in the Rows."

"How so, Mr. Rossiter?" asked Sylph. "What can there be about me here, and in such circumstances, to put you in mind of dear old Chester?"

"You must not be angry with me if I tell you," said Miles, looking entreatingly and tenderly at her. "But, Sylph—Sylph—it was looking down upon a flower garden from out the window of that nice little chamber which you lodged me in, that I first caught sight of that face, the remembrance of which has never since left me. Will you not be surprised, Sylph, to learn," he asked, "that I have seen the house in the Rows since you have?"

Relieved by his change of subject from an anticipated and much dreaded embarrassment, and really eager to get tidings of a place dear to her from a thousand tender associations, she replied, "Your question does indeed surprise me, Mr. Rossiter, and I envy you the privilege it implies. Not a spot in this world is dearer to my thoughts than the oak-frame house in the Rows. It was there that I found my best earthly friends after my darling mother was called home by her heavenly Father, and it was there, too, that I first experienced the unspeakable joy of forgiven sin through the precious blood of Christ, and found the Divine Friend."

"Let it only be an ideal object in your thoughts then," he replied, "and never seek again to actually behold it; for it is a changed place since you left it." Miles then gave her a full account of his flying visit to Chester, of the present ill-cared-for and even disreputable look of the once admirably kept premises; and of his interview with the coarse-featured and vulgar-souled Dr. Bolus.

The narrative of Miles brought pain and grief to the heart of his listener. Sylph, strangely oblivious of the passing character of all things here below, got to suppose, in her imaginative way, that her dear old home would, somehow, continue as when she parted from it; and now, to hear that not only was the whole place changed, but disreputably changed, produced a keen regret in her bosom. The evident pain she felt made Miles repent the fulness of his unpleasant communication, and he told her so.

"No, Mr. Rossiter," she said, "no, excuse nothing. I thank you much for telling me the whole truth in this matter. It would not have been either faithful or kind of you to have hidden anything from me; and your tidings will fix my determination never to rest until I get back Dr. Gilbert's old dwelling into my own hands."

Miles had come to Sylph with a pronounced resolve in his mind, that this should be his last interview with her, and that after this one hour of happiness he would give her up for ever. But he found that purposes formed in the mind are but as threads of tow before the fire of passion, and especially when in the immediate presence of the object that enkindled it. Every look, every gesture, every word, every play of feature of Sylph served but to add fuel to his love and to give force to the thrall that bound him.

He had abandoned all thought of making her his wife; but Sylph's closing words flashed upon his mind the scheme formed soon after his reaching France. Oh! might he dare to hope that Sylph's declared attachment to her early abode would now make his abandoned scheme feasible.

"Listen to me, Sylph," he said. "Listen to me, for in your hands is my destiny!"

His vehemence startled her, and she rose from her seat as meditating a retreat from the room.

"No, Sylph," he cried; "sit down and hear me," and he held her gently yet firmly.

"I have told you, Sylph," he went on, "that soon after reaching France, my eyes, opened by Dr. Gilbert's instruction, and after what I beheld for myself in Paris, I gave up forever all thoughts of the Roman Catholic priesthood. But I did not tell you, Sylph, of another motive for this, nor of a project fondly contemplated in consequence of it, but which the force of events compelled me to abandon. Do hear me," he entreated, as he observed her strong wish to avoid a declaration from him. "My fond idea was to get back to England; to offer myself as a pupil and medical student to dear Doctor Gilbert, in order to become in time his partner, and, if Providence should so order it, his successor; and Doctor Gilbert's declared good will towards me encouraged me in this programme. But, the one thing that lay at the very root of all this was yourself, for from the first hour of seeing you I have been your helpless captive."

"I came to Ireland in obedience to my general, and to promote what I believed would be a patriotic and noble struggle; but I have been miserably disappointed—what should he a holy war for native land has been degraded into a combat the supremacy of a superstition, and has become fanatical massacre. I am sick at heart, and loathe the whole business. The French, I know, are to land to retrieve matters; and, repudiated by rebel chiefs, priests and laymen, I have made my mind to leave them. Only to leave them, however; for, Sylph, bad as they are, I will not be them.

"Sylph, I have means at my command," means honorably gained," he repeated. "My intention is to resign my French captaincy and take up (for it is not too late), my scheme of coming a medical man. Then, you see the issue. It is I that will regain possession of the house in the Rows—yes, I, Miles Rossiter, Sylph; and is I that will make it a centre again of healing and of generous benevolence. I feel in myself force to accomplish all this—but it can be only under one condition; that you, Sylph, promise me—to become the mistress, the presiding genius, and the charm of your old abode—home, sweet home, in the Chester Rows."

During Rossiter's hasty and impassioned speech in which he laid bare his heart, confessing love for Sylph, she several times endeavored to escape from him. Failing that, she tried to interrupt the young man, and explain her position; Miles raising his voice and pouring out his words without break, prevented her. At length the opportunity she longed for was given, and at once she embraced it.

"Mr. Rossiter," she said, I beseech you calm yourself, and to listen patiently to what I have to tell you." She trembled while she spoke, but, keeping down her agitation by a strong effort of will, her voice was clear and distinct.

"Your offer and proposals, Mr. Rossiter, do me honor, and I sincerely thank you; but what I have to say will show you that it is impossible that I give you the answer you desire. You will hear, I think, that I never in any way sought to influence your mind; and I assure you that I was more to you than a friend never entered my imagination. It could not, from your declaration as a candidate for the Catholic priesthood."

"Quite true," interrupted Miles, "you never did consciously enthrall me—no, a true and good woman never does of intent enthrall—I acquit you fully, Sylph; but still you did it, and by virtue of that mystic power which nature has given you, the result of which it is your part to respect and honor."

"I could, perhaps, argue that matter with you, Mr. Rossiter," she replied, "but I will not, for it has nothing to do with the present question. Rossiter, hear me," and she threw a deeper, fuller tone into her voice; "it is impossible that I should entertain your offer; you yourself admit it, when I tell you that I am the betrothed of another."

"What—who—of him whose life I saved this morning?" exclaimed Miles, confused and utterly confounded by this, terrible announcement. "How disastrous! how fatal! Surely a dark destiny, all my life through, pursues me! Every step I take, every act I do, brings upon me disappointment and calamity!"

"When you take time to think you will not believe, speak in this way," said Sylph, "I know you will not; your nature, Mr. Rossiter, is noble, I am certain, to cherish regret at a brave and generous deed which saved the life of your low man because you discovered afterwards that he was a rival. No; if you had not rescued the life when you could, even though you found it thereby you compassed the private end which I say is the nearest to your heart, believe me, it would have been a curse to you, and have shadowed with remorse your whole following existence. No, not only for my own sake, but also for you, Mr. Rossiter, I rejoice, that you did the brave and noble act of rescuing Captain Vaughan," the perceiving a look of inquiry still upon the face of Miles, she added—

"It has preserved a life, which, if taken, seemed imminent, would have been death to me. It has given you a place of honor and gratitude my thoughts that will never be forgotten. And it will be a satisfying gladness, in all the future, Mr. Rossiter, to your own conscience."

"For a future, however, that will not be for long in this world," replied Miles, "I do not care for a life, Sylph, that must be passed in hopeless exile from you, and I shall seek death. Oh, why did we ever meet? or, why, having been separated, did I ever come to see you again? A love that had been but smouldering in my heart has been rekindled into a living flame, which, robbed, of its object will be now but a consuming fire within me." And the young man, his eyes glassy and wild in their despair, looked into the beautiful face of Sylph, as she stood before him.

"Is it nothing," she asked, "that your seeing me again this morning led to the preservation of my life, and of the life of one as dear to me as you say I am to you? I know you do not think this and will not say it. Providence often makes us the instruments of a good deed, that it may be a life-long happiness to us, and do not, Mr. Rossiter, deprive yourself of this blessedness, by the madness and blindness of mere passion—for blind it is—since, if even no one stood in the way, I could never have returned your love. A thousand things, which I will not speak of, would have hindered it. The only one I will mention is religion. I could never unite myself to one not a Christian; and, do not be angry with me when I say, Mr. Rossiter, that although possessing many good and noble qualities, I fear you are not this, and the very idolatry of your worship of me is a proof of it."

"Do you mean that I am a Catholic, and you are a Protestant?" inquired Miles.

"No," said Sylph, "for either may, and neither may be, what I mean by the word Christian. By a Christian, I mean a real lover of Christ; one in whose heart Christ is uppermost; who rests for salvation upon the finished work of Christ, and upon nought beside. And I appeal to you, Mr. Rossiter," she added, looking him straight in the face, "or, rather, I ask you to make the appeal to your own conscience. Ask yourself in God's sight, have you ever made a conscious surrender of yourself to the Saviour?"

(To be continued.)

DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

S.S. Lesson for April 9, Mark 6: 19-29. Golden Text, Rev. 2: 10; Ps. 37: 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"AT that time," while the apostles were going forth preaching, healing, and casting out devils, "Herod the tetrarch heard of the fame of Jesus" (Matt. 14: 1). It became the talk of the palace, and the uneasy conscience of the wicked king left him no rest. He had taken upon himself the awful responsibility of putting to silence one whom he knew to be "a man sent from God." "The devils . . . believe, and tremble" (James 2: 19), and the devil's willing dupe and instrument must also believe and tremble. Day and night horror took hold of him, no peace by day, no sleep by night; and now, when he heard of another prophet, who not only preached with power, but also healed in a marvellous manner, and whose very disciples did the same, the wretched man knew he was checkmated. He felt he had rebelled against the sovereign power of God, and in his remorse, not for the sin but for its consequences, he went and said to his servants, "This is John the Baptist, he is risen from the dead; and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him" (Matt. 14: 2). Herod saw, understood, and felt the reality of God's power, while he made no claim upon His mercy. He saw that GOD WAS NOT TO BE TRIFLED WITH, and gave Him credit for being able to have His way in spite of all the evil which he, or other wicked men could do. His faith in God's Almightiness was so great that he fully believed He would never suffer a defeat, but that the very same John whom he had slain was risen from the dead with new and supernatural powers. What an unspeakably awful position for a soul to be in; fully alive to a mysterious, unseen, irresistible Power, and yet standing in the position of a hopelessly condemned enemy!

He might drown his misery in drink and debauch, but the bitter, terrible truth must meet him again in every moment of consciousness; death could give no peace, for that dreaded Power could bring back from death. Such a consciousness would be enough to lay reason low, but even then eternity must be entered upon, and who could tell when or whether the irresponsibility would cease?

But what brought about such a state of things? Simply a definite, personal resistance of the Gospel; a deliberate choice of evil rather than good, of sin and the world rather than God. John had made a great impression on Herod, there was a strange and marked unlikeness between this man of the desert, full of the Holy Ghost, and the learned, courteous scribes, whose object was not to bring their hearers into the presence of God, that heart and conscience might bow before Him, but rather to display their own knowledge, eloquence, erudition or logic. They always sought to impress their hearers with themselves, and therefore sought by all means to please and gratify. John, on the contrary, knew himself not, his eyes were open to only two things, God and immortal souls, and thus his words were such as must be felt; and went right in to the hearts and consciences. They made men feel that their most hidden motives were being brought to light, and there was nothing for it but to make a clean breast of it, and out with all the hidden sin; and thus the Jordan banks were one scene of weeping, broken-heartedness, confession of sin; and then, when they beheld the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, of joy, of freedom and deliverance.

THEY HAD EDGES,

So "Herod feared John"—how far he loved him we are not told—he feared him, he knew that John was "a just man and an holy." Wicked men know the real thing, counterfeit holiness will not pass with them. John's life bore out all he said; earthly considerations, personal considerations, had with him no existence, he lived only for one thing, that men should repent. Herod "kept him safe. And when he heard him he was much perplexed (or did many things) and he heard him gladly." (Rev. Ver.)

There was room for the king to be perplexed, he was living in open sin, and no possible shadow of excuse for sin, no possible admission of extenuating circumstances came within the limits of John's teaching;

SIN WAS SIN,

and sin must be removed now and forever. There was no respect of persons with John. It may be that it was on a day when he was saying to some embezzler of property, "Restore that which thou hast unjustly taken and pay back fourfold, make haste to do it, for 'the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'" Perhaps he turned to some wine-bibber, and said, "Give up thy cups, the Lord is coming," and then facing round upon the king, "And thou, King Herod, give up thy brother's wife, it is not lawful for thee to have her." Herod was perplexed, he knew that John was right, but the influence of this wicked woman was great upon him, and he was not man enough to resist it. She was stung to madness by the boldness of the preacher; his influence was already great with Herod, for he had induced him to do "many things;" there was a change in him, he feared God more; in his language, in his court, in everything there, was a change for the better, many things were changed, but not the thing, the crowning sin, which was a justification of adultery in the land. Herodias saw that if John won the day she would be disgraced from the throne, and the whole country would regard her as the abandoned woman she was; and to save herself this deserved shame she persuaded Herod to imprison John. And then it came to pass that Herod, being reproved by John "for Herodias his brother Philip's wife, and for all the evils which Herod had done, added yet this above all, that he shut up John in prison."

HE DID IT WITH HIS EYES OPEN, he knew what he was doing, playing into the hands of the devil; and having gone thus far he could not stop, he had made his choice, had chosen for himself and for his people evil rather than good, impurity instead of holiness, and now he must abide by it.

Thoughts of murder were in the heart of Herodias, she would never rest until the blood of John the Baptist was spilt; and for this unnatural, unwomanly woman, Herod had sold his soul! A convenient day arrived, the great enemy of souls had planned it, and Herodias was his ready ally; her daughter went in and danced before Herod, the unhappy king was so pleased with this little distraction to his self-condemning thoughts that he promised with an oath to give the damsel whatsoever she would ask, even to the half of his kingdom. The plan was successful, it was just as Herodias had desired; she had her request ready, and sent the young girl with a petition ill-suited to her years or her sex, "I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist." "The king was exceedingly sorry,"

HE FOUND HIMSELF IN A DILEMMA;

he had never meant to go so far as this, but the reins once given to an unprincipled woman like Herodias, there was no stopping. He might have made a stand even now, he might have repudiated his oath, and saved John the Baptist; but then he must go the whole length, confess and abandon his sins, give up Herodias, and become a true disciple. But such a length he was not prepared to go. His oath, what those would say who sat with him at table, these present things, shadows as they were without substance, weighed with him more than the salvation of his immortal soul, the honor of God, or the good of the people.

And so the deed was done, an executioner was sent to do all he could to the poor body of God's witness, but after that he had no more that he could do (Luke 12: 4), his ransomed spirit found its way where poor lost Herod would fain be at this moment. The coveted gift was given to the damsel, and she conveyed it to her mother. One can imagine with what diabolical hatred Herodias looked upon those closed lips, which she thought could no more tell her of her sin, and those closed eyes which could no longer bring the blush of shame once more to her cheeks. But she had miscalculated, for surely at that day "when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed" those eyes shall look upon Herodias again, when she is dragged forth from her prison to be judged those lips shall testify against the guilty pair who murdered him. No wonder then that Herod, who had thus given himself over as a tool of the wicked one, when he heard of Jesus said, "It is John whom I beheaded." It was the general opinion that Jesus was some resurrection man. "Some said, That it is Elias," referring to the prophecy of Malachi 4: 5. Also the Lord had said of John, "If ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come" (Matt. 11: 14). "Others said, That it is a prophet, or as one of the prophets." But Herod could not be moved from the one idea which haunted him, "It is John whom I beheaded; he is risen from the dead." Herod had lost his soul, and soon after he lost his kingdom, for which with his sin he had paid so dear, and died with the wicked Herodias in a prison at Lyons, in France.

Who was the conqueror, John or Herod? With which would we now change places? "Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer;" said our Lord to the church of Smyrna, "behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried." Yes, blessed prison when the Lord is there! It has been proved more than once that neither bolts, bars, chains, nor soldiers can prevent the exit of one of Christ's disciples from prison, when God sends one of His angels to bring him out; and while it pleases God that His faithful witnesses shall remain there, neither bleeding backs nor feet fast in the stocks can hinder them from praising God. O how infinitely better than a throne where an uneasy, hopeless conscience conjures up real and imaginary horrors, where the past, the present, and the future are all too dreadful to think of! God has never promised us exemption from trial; it is true to this day, as our golden text says, "The wicked plotteth against the just and gnasheth upon him with his teeth;" it is as true now as it ever was that "all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (2 Tim. 3: 12). Jesus says, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

Newsdealers are supplied with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

ON SALE

in every part of the United States and Canada, and casual copies ought invariably to be ordered through them, and not from the office of the paper.

Our correspondents will facilitate the business of the Christian Herald Office and ensure prompt attention to their communications, if they exercise discrimination in addressing them. Letters relating to business, and all letters containing remittances should be addressed to THE MANAGER. Letters containing matter for publication or relating to the contents of the paper should be addressed to THE EDITOR.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Death of the Poet, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow on Friday, March 24th, is an event that dwarfs and overshadows all others of the week's history. In all the cities of this wide land, in scattered hamlets and in solitary forest homes, there are men, women, and children on whom the news of the great poet's death will fall as a deep sorrow. Nor to America alone is this mourning confined. Wherever our language is spoken, there Longfellow's works are found and loved. Even when the name of an American was not a passport to European favor, Longfellow was popular beyond the Atlantic, and his words, stirring and inspiring, sweet and tender, always pure and elevating, were on the lips of men who seldom spoke kindly of the country which gave the poet birth. The world is poorer now that he is dead; and while his poems will hold their place of honor on our shelves and in our hearts to the end of time, we realize with sorrow that his last word has been spoken, and that the pen which has written so much and so well, is laid aside for ever.

The Leading Facts in the Poet's History, though well known, may be briefly recapitulated. He was descended from the grand old Puritan stock. The first of his father's ancestors to come to America was William Longfellow, who was born in Hampshire, England, in 1651, and settled at Newbury, Mass., in 1676. The poet's mother had a still more distinguished lineage, for she was a descendant of John Alden, whose name is among those of the Mayflower pilgrims and who was the first to land on Plymouth Rock. The poet's father was the Hon. Stephen Longfellow, a member of the Portland Bar and once a member of Congress. Henry was the second son and was born at Portland, Me., February 27, 1807. He studied at Bowdoin College, taking his bachelor's degree in 1825. He was offered a professorship in the same college in 1826, which he accepted, but he subsequently removed to Harvard, where he succeeded George Ticknor as Professor of Modern Languages, a position he occupied until his resignation in 1854, since which date he has lived in retirement. He had a severe attack of vertigo last winter which seriously reduced his vital strength, but on Saturday, March 18th, he was so well as to take a walk around the grounds. But the exposure had a fatal result; he caught cold, peritonitis set in and he suffered severely. He lingered until Friday, when he peacefully passed away surrounded by his children and most intimate friends. Mr. Longfellow was twice married, and it was the tragic death of his second wife, who was burned to death in July, 1861, that caused him the most poignant grief of his life. Three daughters and two sons survive him. Mr. Longfellow's first collection of poems appeared under the title of "Voices of the Night," in 1839, and included the poems which had originally been published in The New York Knickerbocker. Among these were the two pieces which are best known, "The Psalm of Life," and "The Reaper and the Flowers." From that time Mr. Longfellow took the high place in popular favor which he occupied without question to the day of his death.

The Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill Passed the House on March 23d, by a vote of 167 to 65. Four Democrats voted in the minority. The bill is substantially in the same condition as when passed by the Senate. An effort made by Mr. Kasson to have the period during which the immigration of the Chinese is to be suspended reduced from twenty years to ten received the support of one hundred members, 131 voting against it. The passage of the bill in its present shape has been somewhat of a surprise, as it was known that many members of Congress who ultimately voted for it were opposed on principle to some of its provisions. It is believed that many votes were cast in favor of the bill under pressure from the districts. Unequivocal intimations were sent in more than one case to the representatives, warning them that if they failed to make a record on this question their chances of re-election would be endangered. It is, however, undeniable that the bill is inconsistent in spirit with our recent treaty with China, and it is predicted that the President will veto it on that ground.

In the Debate in the Senate on the Tariff question on March 24th, personalities were unhappily the cause of a diversion of attention from the main business. This is unfortunate, because an apprehension already existed that the effort to procure the heavily taxed people some relief from their burdens had little chance of success. The taxes now levied are, as the President explained in his message, far in excess of the need of the government, and are used in producing a surplus for the benefit of men who do not need nor deserve to be supported by the people. The present year will, it appears, yield one hundred and fifty million dollars more than the government legitimately needs; or three dollars from every man, woman, and child, in the country more than it is necessary they should pay. The question is no longer one of party, for prominent men of both parties have urged Congress to attend to this urgent matter. The personalities arose out of an insinuation made by Senator Miller, of New York, that the Senators from the South did not represent the opinions of their constituents. This insinuation provoked Senator Morgan, of Alabama, to retort upon Mr. Miller with the reminder of his personal interest, at least so far as wood pulp is concerned, in the maintenance of the oppressive tariff.

The Worst of the Disasters from the Mississippi floods are, it is now hoped, at an end. A general subsidence of a very slow but yet uniform character was recorded in all the flooded districts last week. A correspondent writing from Helena, Ark., says: "The river is falling slowly, very slowly considering the amount of water still flowing over the top of where the river ought to be, and from the amount of water reported along the Ohio as coming down toward this country even the most sanguine people here look forward to some weeks more of suffering." The damage done in the country back of here and up through the St. Francois Valley is beyond computation, and will be still further beyond it if the water does not go down in season for planting. It is possible to take a canoe in one of the streets of the city and travel for forty or fifty miles almost in a straight line across country. From Vicksburg, Miss., intelligence is received that the Yazoo and Tallahatchie Rivers continue to decline at many places rapidly. The Assistant Quartermaster United States Army, of New Orleans, has arrived, having been ordered there by the Secretary of War to distribute government tents to houseless residents. The tents will be sent up the river where the people have been compelled to abandon their homes and are living on dry points of land. From New Orleans the news comes that at Grand Gulf, Miss., the river has fallen six inches from the highest point. Major Whitehead, by order of the Secretary of War, purchased during the week 575,000 pounds of bacon, 2000 barrels of flour, and 2500 barrels of corn meal. These supplies were turned over to the Louisiana Commissioners, who distributed them to the sufferers by the overflow. The river is there eight inches below the high water of 1874.

Senator Pendleton's Scheme of Civil Service Reform was introduced on March 21st, by his proposition of a joint resolution recommending an amendment to the Constitution. By this amendment it is proposed to remove from the President the power of appointing Postmasters, Marshals, District Attorneys of the United States, Clerks of Courts inferior to the Supreme Court, and all such other civil officers of the United States exercising executive or ministerial power within the several States or Territories, and to provide for their election by the people of the several districts, the electors in each district to have the qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of the State or Territory. By a second section Congress is invested with the power of suspension and removal of officers and of temporarily filling vacancies pending an election by the people.

Youthful Depravity Formed the Subject of some weighty remarks Judge Cowing, of New York, felt moved to make in open court a few days ago, after hearing many serious charges against juvenile delinquents. The judge's remarks have suggested a search through the city records of crime, and from them it has been found that during the month of February last, there were 34 arrests for larceny where the ages of the culprits ran from 8 to 19 years; 19 for burglary between 13 and 21 years; 8 for highway robbery between the same ages; for murder 1 lad of 19, 2 girls of 17, 1 boy of 14 and another boy of 12; for felonious assault 9 were arrested between 12 and 21; 1 boy of 16 for train-wrecking; 1 of 18 for passing counterfeit money and another for picking pockets. There were five suicides of girls between fourteen and eighteen, and four attempted suicides of boys between seventeen and nineteen. There were eight boys arrested as common drunkards whose ages ran from eight to nineteen years. The boy of eight died. Mr. Comstock, who has given much attention to the subject, assigns three causes for this appalling record of increasing criminality. The chief is that of vile reading; second the pool rooms and policy shops; and third the low theatres.

The Practice of Hazing, it is Gratifying to learn, is voluntarily abandoned by the students at Princeton. Dr. McCosh, the respected president of the college, in his report to the trustees says: "The freshmen class first, and then the other classes, have voluntarily signed a pledge that during their college course they will abstain from hazing and discourage it in every way. It is confidently expected that in consequence of the fines imposed by the criminal courts, and this pledge on the part of the whole of the students, the old and barbarous customs of horn spree and hazing will finally disappear from Princeton College."

A Warning to Girls Seeking Employment as domestic servants is published in the reports of persons missing from their homes. It appears that certain intelligence offices in New York have been for some time actively recruiting for the houses of ill-fame in the city. When a young and pretty girl applied there for a situation as a domestic servant, the proprietors have sent her to one of these dens, where her morals have been corrupted and she has been lost to her family. The discovery was made by a mother whose daughter had been so victimized.

Miss Jennie Smith, the Railroad Evangelist, and Miss Addie Sherman, of Boston, are conducting a successful work among railroad men and their families at Martinsburg, W. Va. Gospel meetings were commenced at that point March 4th; in a short time a deep conviction was manifested among the people, and in two weeks' time one hundred and sixty-five bright conversions have been reported. Noon-day and night meetings continue with increasing interest and power. Miss Smith is the author of the two well-known books, "The Valley of Baca," and "From Baca to Beulah." She still enjoys perfect health, though as the readers of her books will remember, she lay for sixteen years in invalid helplessness, but was fully restored through prayer. She has consecrated her life and efforts to the Lord's work among the railroad men and other neglected classes. Miss Smith and her co-laborers earnestly request the prayers of the Christian public for God's continued blessing upon their labors.

A House was Saved by a Dog from Destruction by fire at West Vincent on March 12th. On the morning of that day a girl belonging to one of the families in the town went downstairs early and built a fire in a stove, which blazed up so rapidly that the chimney into which the stove-pipe ran was set on fire and quickly endangered the house. The girl had gone out, leaving an intelligent sheep-dog lying near the chimney, and he, taking in the situation at once, ran upstairs to the room of his mistress and commenced barking loudly to attract her attention. She expecting something was wrong, went down promptly, and succeeded in extinguishing the flames in time to save the house from destruction. The warning given by the dog and the happy result of prompt attention to it are both suggestive facts. If Christians were as quick to warn sinners of their certain danger as was this faithful animal, we might see many more conversions than we do, especially if their general conduct was such as to impress the world with a conviction that their warnings were likely to be well founded (Ezek. 33 : 6).

A Mule Driver near Gonzales, Texas, was puzzled by the strange behavior of one of his team. The mule persisted in drawing as far away as possible from the one at its side. An examination followed, and it was found that the mule whose companionship appeared objectionable had a badly swollen jaw. No notice was taken of it for some time, but eventually the driver noticed a suspicious movement between the two animals and then made a closer inspection. To his surprise he found that in the straw collar of the mule with the swollen jaw there was coiled a rattlesnake, which, whenever the two animals approached each other, thrust out its head to attack the other mule, hence the poor brute's avoidance of its mate. How many enforced companionships there are in life, in which one person already suffering from the wounds of the venomous serpent of sin is the means of others being also wounded. In such cases there is need of constant watchfulness and prayer (2 Pet. 3 : 17).

A Grievous Disappointment has been Experienced in a city in Vermont by two aged Scotch ladies. They came to this country about three months ago, having friends here who sent them passage tickets. Their friends are poor, and have large families, but expected to give the old ladies homes, and that the latter in return would assist in taking care of the houses and children. When the old ladies came they were disappointed, homesick, and found things not at all as their fancy had pictured. They were unwilling to stay, too old to go out to work, and had no money to buy return tickets to Scotland. Their friends had exhausted their resources to bring them over, in one case the son-in-law having pledged his wages and bought a passage ticket on trust. Under these circumstances they are not able to send them back, and the State is the only resource. Doubtless the American friends of the ladies hoped to benefit them by their invitation, but it is probable that the terms of the arrangement were not understood, or the aged people would not have undertaken the long journey. Disappointment of a similar character is often felt by people who seem to be very near to the kingdom of God. When they learn that to be Christians they must bear the cross they turn back. But Jesus never deceives any one with the expectation that the Christian life is a life of ease and self-indulgence (Mark 10 : 22).

A Litigation about a False Face is Reported from Philadelphia. It appears that a gentleman residing in West Virginia was severely injured by burning last year. His face was so disfigured as to be absolutely frightful in its ugliness, and he thought that, as he travelled a great deal, he would be less unpleasantly conspicuous if he wore a mask such as is worn by actors and the officers of certain secret societies. He went to Philadelphia and gave his order to a surgical instrument maker. The false face was made and delivered, but the wearer found that it was so inconvenient and uncomfortable that he could not wear it, and so sued the maker for the return of its cost. It is said that no such case has ever before been tried in the courts, but it would not be difficult to find men who have succeeded in wearing false faces in a moral sense of the word. Both in the church and in the pulpit men have often imposed on God's children, and when at length they have been unmasked and stand revealed in their own ugliness, the church is reproached (1 John 2 : 19).

A Curious Coincidence is noted in the Death record of a Massachusetts town. A local journal says the longevity of the inhabitants of Princeton, Worcester County, Mass., is worthy of a little boasting. But seventeen persons died within its limits last year, and of these one was ninety-five years of age, five between eighty and ninety, and four between seventy and eighty. Such a showing is sufficient to induce some nervous people to fix their residence at Princeton, and many a watering-place has made a reputation on far less capital. The crowd of hypochondriacs is always ready to make an effort to find a healthy resort, yet how few strive to secure through the blood of Jesus an entrance into that land where death is unknown (Rev. 21 : 4).

A Little Boy's Kite was the Cause of a Fatal accident recently at Lafayette, N. J. A little fellow, only six years of age, was flying his kite, and, in the excitement of raising it, ran on the railroad track. His mother, who lives close by, heard a locomotive approaching, and ran out of the house to remove him beyond the reach of danger. He was almost within reach of her hands when the pilot of the engine struck him and hurled him a bleeding and lifeless mass of flesh at her feet. She had fortitude enough to lift him in her arms, and, with his life-blood streaming down over her clothing, she carried him into the house. Incidents of this kind are often used by shrewd and worldly men in attempting to explain the poverty of Christian men. They argue that the Christian's gaze being fixed on the things of eternity he is incapable of wisely conducting his worldly affairs. It is true that in business competition an unscrupulous man is frequently able to pass ahead of his conscientious rival, but religion does not necessarily involve failure in honest business. Jesus did not teach us to be so occupied in idle gazing into Heaven as to pay no heed to our footsteps (1 Timothy 4 : 8).

A Loving Couple Died Recently at Lincoln, Neb., within a few hours of each other. They had been married over half a century. The husband, an octogenarian, had been gradually failing for several months, and his death was not unexpected. About a week before he died his wife caught cold, which developed into bronchitis, and though it would have been quickly thrown off by a younger and more vigorous patient, she quietly sank under it and died. The daughter, who has faithfully ministered to the wants of the aged couple in their declining years, supposed her father would not be able to comprehend his loss, as he seemed to notice nothing that was going on around him. But she approached his bedside and told him that mother had gone before him. He understood the news. "Ah, dear! it is a pity she should go first. Kiss me, my child," and soon after he died. How many husbands and wives wish that they might continue in the enjoyment of each other's society to the end of their lives, but how seldom it is that their concern extends to that longer life beyond the grave (1 Cor. 7 : 16).

THE DREAM OF PILATE'S WIFE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him."—Matthew 27 : 19.

The Terrible Scene—The Dream Only once Mentioned—Pilate's Wickedness Leading him into Difficulty—A Warning from God—I. The Co-operation of Providence with the Work of God—In Sending the Dream—In Causing it to Produce Suffering—In Prompting Pilate's Wife to Send the Message—In its Arrival at a Peculiar Time—II. The Accessibility of Conscience to God—Dreams May be Used as Warnings—Tradition of Pilate's Wife—God's Ultimatum—The Ministry of the Family—Of Unbidden Thought—III. Frequent Failure of the Best Means—Reasons for this Failure—Pilate's Self-interest—His Cowardice—Presumption—Double Mindedness—IV. Overwhelming Condemnation—An Awful Way of Sinning.

I EARNESTLY wished to pursue the story of our Saviour's trials previous to His crucifixion, but when I sat down to study the subject I found myself altogether incapable of the exercise. "When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me." My emotions grew so strong, and my sense of our Lord's grief became so extremely vivid, that I felt I must waive the subject for a time. I could not watch with Him another hour, and yet I could not leave the hallowed scene. It was, therefore, a relief to meet with the episode of Pilate's wife and her dream; it enables me to continue the thread of my narrative, and yet to relax the extreme tension of the feelings caused by a near view of the Master's grief and shame.

My spirit failed before the terrible sight. I thought I saw Him brought back from Herod, where the men of war had set Him at nought. I followed Him through the streets again as the cruel priests pushed through the crowd and hastened Him back to Pilate's hall. I thought I heard them in the street electing Barabbas, the robber, to be set free instead of Jesus, the Saviour, and I detected the first rising of that awful cry, "Crucify, crucify," which they shrieked out from their bloodthirsty throats; and there He stood, who loved me and gave Himself for me, like a lamb in the midst of wolves, with none to pity and none to help Him.

We leave the Master awhile to look at this dream of Pilate's wife, which is only spoken of once in the Scriptures, and then by Matthew. I know not why that evangelist only should have been commissioned to record it; perhaps he alone heard of it; but the one record is sufficient for our faith, and long enough to furnish food for meditation. We receive the story as certified by the Holy Spirit.

Pilate throughout his term of office had grossly misbehaved himself. He had been an UNJUST AND UNSCRUPULOUS ruler of the Jews. The Galileans and the Samaritans both felt the terrors of his arms; for he did not hesitate to massacre them at the slightest sign of revolt; and among the Jews themselves he had sent men with daggers into the midst of the crowds at the great gatherings, and so had cut off those who were obnoxious to him. Gain was his object, and pride ruled his spirit. At the time when Jesus of Nazareth was brought before him a complaint against him was on the way to Tiberius the Emperor, and he feared lest he should be called to account for his oppressions, extortions, and murders. His sins at this moment were beginning to punish him; as Job would word it, "the iniquities of his heels compassed him about."

One terrible portion of the penalty of sin is its power to force a man to commit yet further iniquity. Pilate's transgressions were now howling around him like a pack of wolves; he could not face them, and he had not grace to flee to the one great refuge; but his fears drove him to flee before them, and there was no way apparently open for him but that which led him into yet deeper abominations. He knew that Jesus was without a single fault, and yet since the Jews clamored for His death he felt that he must yield to their demands, or else they would raise another accusation against himself, namely, that he was not loyal to the sovereignty of Cæsar, for he had allowed one to escape who had called himself a king. If he had behaved justly he would not have been afraid of the chief priests and scribes. Innocence is brave; but guilt is cowardly.

The manner and the words of Jesus had impressed Pilate. I say the manner of Jesus, for His matchless meekness must have struck the governor as being a very unusual thing in a prisoner. He had seen in captured Jews the fierce courage of fanaticism; but there was no fanaticism in Christ. He had also seen in many prisoners the meanness which will do or say anything to escape from death; but he saw nothing of that about our Lord. He saw in Him unusual gentleness and humility combined with majestic dignity. He beheld submission blended with innocence. This made Pilate feel how awful goodness is.

He was impressed—he could not help being impressed—with this unique sufferer. Besides, our Lord had before him witnessed a good confession—you remember how we considered it the other day—and though Pilate had huffed it off with the pert question, "What is truth?" and had gone back into the judgment-hall, yet there was an arrow fixed within him which he could not shake off. It may have been mainly superstition; but he felt an awe of one whom he half suspected to be an extraordinary personage. He felt that he himself was placed in a very extraordinary position, being asked to condemn one whom he knew to be perfectly innocent. His duty was clear enough, he could never have had a question about that; but duty was nothing to Pilate in comparison with his own interests. He would spare the Just One if he could do so without endangering himself; but his cowardly fears lashed him on to the shedding of innocent blood.

At the very moment when he was vacillating, when he had proffered to the Jews the choice of Barabbas, or Jesus of Nazareth—at that very moment, I say, when he had taken his seat upon the bench, and was waiting for their choice, there came from the hand of God a warning to him, a warning which would for ever make it clear that, if he condemned Jesus, it would be done voluntarily by his own guilty hands. Jesus must die by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, and yet it must be by wicked hands that He is crucified and slain; and hence Pilate must not sin in ignorance.

A warning to Pilate came from his own wife concerning her morning's dream, a vision of mystery and terror, warning him not to touch that just person; "for," said she, "I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him." There are times in most men's lives when, though they have been wrong, yet they have not quite been set on mischief, but have come to a pause and have deliberated as to their way; and then God in great mercy has sent them a caution, and has set up a danger-signal bidding them stop in their mad career ere they plunged themselves finally into irretrievable ruin. Somewhere in that direction lies the subject of our present discourse. O that the Spirit of God may make it useful to many.

I. And, first, I call your attention to

THE CO-OPERATION OF PROVIDENCE

with the work of God. I call it the work of God to warn men against sin, and I call your attention to Providence working with it to bring the preventives and cautions of divine mercy home to men's minds.

For, first, observe the providence of God in sending this dream. If anything beneath the moon may be thought to be exempt from law, and to be the creature of pure chance, surely it is a dream. True, there were in old time dreams in which God spake to men prophetically; but ordinarily they are the carnival of thought, a maze of mental states, a dance of disorder, and yet it seems that they are ordered of the Lord. I can well understand that every drop of spray which flashes from the wave when it dashes against the cliff has its appointed orbit as truly as the stars of heaven; but the thoughts of men appear to be utterly lawless, especially the thoughts of men when deep sleep falleth upon them. As well might one foretell the flight of a bird as the course of a dream.

Such wild fantasies seem to be ungoverned and ungovernable.

Many things operate naturally to fashion a dream. Dreams frequently depend upon the condition of the stomach, upon the meat and drink taken by the sleeper before going to rest. They often owe their shape to the state of the body or the agitation of the mind. Dreams may, no doubt, be caused by that which transpires in the chamber of the house; a little movement of the bed caused by passing wheels, or the tramp of a band of men, or the passing of a domestic across the floor, or even the running of a mouse behind the wainscot, may suggest and shape a dream. Any slight matter affecting the senses at such time may raise within the slumbering mind a mob of strange ideas.

Yet whatever may have operated in this lady's case, the hand of providence was in it all, and her mind, though fancy free, wandered nowhere but just according to the will of God, to effect the divine purpose.

Note, next, the providence of God in arranging that with this dream there should be great mental sufferings. "I have suffered many things in a dream concerning Him." I cannot tell what vision passed before her mind's eye, but it was one which caused her terrible agony. A modern artist has painted a picture of what he imagined the dream to be, but I shall not attempt to follow that great man in the exercise of fancy. Pilate's wife may have realized in her sleep the dreadful spectacle of the thorn-crown and the scourge, or even of the crucifixion and the death-agony; and truly I know of nothing more calculated to make the heart suffer many things concerning the Lord Jesus than a glance at His death. Around the cross there gathers grief enough to cause many a sleepless night, if the soul has any tenderness left in it.

Whatever it was, she had suffered repeated painful emotions in the dream, and she awoke startled and amazed.

THE TERROR OF THE NIGHT

was upon her, and it threatened to become a terror to her for all her days, and she therefore hastens to stay her husband's hand. Now, herein is the hand of God, and the simple story goes to prove that the wandering Zingari of dreamland are still under His control, and He can cause them to produce distress and anguish, if some grand end is to be served thereby.

Equally remarkable is it that she should have sent to her husband the message, "Have nothing to do with this just person." Most dreams we quite forget; a few we mention as remarkable, and only now and then one is impressed upon us so that we remember it for years. Mostly a dream may wait till business is over. But so deep was the impression upon this Roman lady's mind that she does not wait until her lord comes home, but sends to him at once. Her advice is urgent—"Have thou nothing to do with this Just One." She must warn him now, before he has laid a stroke on Him, much less imbrued his hands in His blood.

And yet, do you know, her message to my ears sounds rather authoritative for a woman to her husband, and he a judge! There is a tone about it that is not ordinarily in the address of wives to husbands. "Have thou nothing to do with that just man; for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him." It shows a wonderful providence of God that this lady was moved to send so strong a message to her self-willed husband, to beseech, to entreat, to implore, almost to demand of him, that he let this just man go. O Providence, how mightily canst thou work! O Lord, the seraphim obey Thee, but Thou findest an equally willing servitor in a wife who, at Thy bidding, stands between her husband and a crime.

Once more, about this providence I want you to notice the peculiar time in which her warning came. It was evidently a dream of the morning: "I have suffered many things in a dream this day." The day had not long broken—it was yet early in the morning. The Romans had a superstition that morning dreams are true. Pilate was gone, and she was told that he was in the judgment-hall. She asked her attendants why he was there so early, and they replied that there had been an unusual clamor in the courtyard, for the high priests and a mob of Jews had been there, and the governor had gone out to them. They might, perhaps, also tell her that Jesus of Nazareth was brought there a prisoner, and the priests were entreating Pilate to put Him to death, though they had heard the governor say that he found no fault in Him. "Go," she said to her maid, "call to one of the guards, and bid him go at once to my husband and say what I tell you."

Just at the moment, you see, when he had set down on the judgment-seat, the warning came to him. When there was a little lull, and he was anxious to acquit his prisoner, at that instant of time which was the most hopeful this weight was thrown into the right side of the scale, thrown in most wisely and mercifully to keep back Pilate from his grievous sin. The warning came at the nick of time, as we say, though, alas, it came in vain. Admire the punctuality of Providence. God never is before His time; He never is too late. It shall be seen concerning all that He doeth that on the selfsame day determined by the prophecy the fulfillment came. My soul stands trembling while she sings the glory of her God, whose providence is high, even like Ezekiel's wheels, but the wheels are full of eyes, and, as they turn, all the surroundings are observed and provided for, so that there are no slips, or oversights, or accidents, or delays. Prompt and effectual is the operation of the Lord.

Thus much concerning Providence, and I think you will all agree that my point is proven—the providence is always co-working with the grace of God. A great writer who knows but little about divine things, yet, nevertheless, tells us that he perceives a power in the world which works for righteousness. Exactly so! It is well spoken, for this is the chief of all powers. When you and I go out to warn men of sin, we are not alone, all Providence is at our back. When we preach Christ crucified, we are workers together with God; God is working with us as well as by us. Have comfort, then, in this. O workers for Jesus, suffering many things for Him, be of good courage, for the stars in their courses fight for the servants of the living God, and the stones of the field are in league with you.

II. Secondly, I gather from this story

THE ACCESSIBILITY OF CONSCIENCE

to God. How are we to reach Pilate? How are we to give him warning? He has rejected the voice of Jesus and the sight of Jesus—could not Peter be fetched to expostulate with him? Alas, he has denied his Master. Could not John be brought in? Even he has forsaken the Lord. Where shall messenger be found? It shall be found in a dream. God can get at men's hearts, however hardened they may be. Never give them up, never despair of arousing them. If my ministry, your ministry, and the ministry of the blessed Book should seem to be nothing, God can reach the conscience by a dream. If the sword cometh not at them in close quarters, yet what seems but a stray arrow from a bow drawn at a venture shall find out their joints in their harness.

We ought to believe in God about wicked men and never say of them, "It is impossible that they should be converted." The Lord can wound Leviathan, for His weapons are many, and they are suited to the foe. I do not think a dream would operate upon my mind to convince me; but certain minds lie open in that direction, and to them a dream may be a power. God may use even superstition to accomplish His beneficent purposes. Many besides Pilate have been warned by dreams.

Better still, Pilate was accessible through the dream of his wife. Henry Melvill has a very wonderful discourse upon this topic, in which he tries to show that probably if Pilate had dreamed the dream himself it would not have been so operative upon him as when his wife dreamed it. He takes it as a supposition, which nobody can deny, that Pilate had an affectionate and tender wife, who was very dear to him. The one brief narrative which we have of her certainly looks that way: it is evident that she loved her husband dearly, and would therefore prevent his acting unjustly to Jesus. To send a warning by her was to reach Pilate's conscience through his affections.

Tradition declares this lady to have been

Christian, and the Greek church have placed her in their calendar as a saint. For this we have no evidence; all that we know is that she was Pilate's wife, and used her wifely influence to stay him from this crime. How often has a tender, suffering, loving woman exercised great power over a coarse, rough man! The All-wise One knows this, and hence He often speaks to sinful men by this influential agency. He converts one in a family that she may be His missionary to the rest. Thus He speaks with something better than the tongues of men and of angels, for He uses love itself to be His orator. Affection has more might than eloquence.

To Pilate his wife's message was

GOD'S ULTIMATUM;

He warned him never again, and even Jesus stood silent before him. O my friend, to you it may be that your child, your mother, or your affectionate wife may be God's last messenger, the final effort of the warning angel to bring you to a better mind. A loving relative pleading with tears is often the forlorn hope of mercy. An attack so skillfully planned and wisely conducted may be regarded as the last assault of love upon a stubborn spirit, and after this it will be left to its own devices. The selection of the wife was no doubt made by infinite wisdom and tenderness, that if possible Pilate might be arrested in his career of crime and strengthened to the performance of an act of justice by which he would have avoided the most terrible of crimes.

Ay, and let me add that where God does not employ a dream, nor use a wife, yet He can get at men's conscience by no visible means but by thoughts which come unbidden and abide upon the soul. Truths long buried suddenly rise up, and when the man is in the very act of sin he is stopped in the way. Often does conscience pounce upon a man when the sweet morsel of sin has just been rolled under his tongue, and he is sitting down to enjoy it; the visitation of conscience turns the stolen honey into bitterness, and the forbidden joy into anguish. Conscience often lies like a lion in a thicket, and when the sinner comes along the broad road it leaps upon him, and for a while he is sorely put to it. The bad man is comparable to leviathan, of whom we read that his scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal; so that the sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold, the spear, the dart, nor the javelin; and yet the Lord hath a way of coming at him and of sore wounding him. Let us, therefore, both hope and pray for the very worst of men.

Brothers and sisters, use for the good of men anything which comes in your way. Use not only sober argument and sound doctrine, but even if a dream has touched your heart, do not hesitate to repeat it where it may have effect. Any weapon may be used in this war. But see to it that you do seek the souls of men, all of you. You who are wives should be especially stirred up to this sacred work. Remember Pilate's wife, and think of her as affectionately giving the warning to her husband, and go and do likewise. Never keep back from an ungodly husband the word which may convert him from the error of his ways. And you, dear children, you sisters, you of the gentler sort, do not hesitate, in your own quiet way, to be heralds for Jesus wherever your lot is cast.

III. Thirdly, we have now the lamentable task of observing the even of the best means. I have ventured to say that, humanly speaking, it was the best means of reaching Pilate's conscience for his wife to be led to expostulate with him. He would hear but few, but her he would hear; and yet even her warning was in vain. What was the reason?

FREQUENT FAILURE

First, self-interest was involved in the matter, and that is a powerful factor. Pilate was afraid of losing his governorship. The Jews would be angry if he did not obey their cruel bidding; they might complain to Tiberius, and he would lose his lucrative position. Alas, such things as these are holding some of you captives to sin at this moment. You cannot afford to be true and right, for it would cost too much. You know the will of the Lord; you know what is right; but you renounce Christ by putting Him off, and by abiding in the ways of sin that you may gain the wages thereof. You are afraid that to be a true Christian would involve the loss of a friend's goodwill, or the patronage of an ungodly person, or the smile of an influential worldling, and this you cannot afford. You count the cost, and reckon that it is too high. You resolve to gain the world, even though you lose your soul! What then? You will go to hell rich! A sorry result this! Do you see anything desirable in such an attainment? Oh that you would consider your ways and listen to the voice of wisdom!

The next reason why his wife's appeal was ineffectual was the fact that Pilate was a coward. A man with legions at his back, and yet afraid of a Jewish mob—afraid to let one poor prisoner go whom he knew to be innocent; afraid because he knew his conduct would not bear inspection! He was, morally, a coward! Multitudes of people go to hell because they have not the courage to fight their way to heaven. "The fearful and unbelieving shall have their portion in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death."

Yet while there was cowardice in Pilate, there was presumption too. He who was afraid of man and afraid to do right, yet dared to incur the guilt of innocent blood. Oh, the cowardice of Pilate to take water and wash his hands, as if he could wash off blood with water; and then to say, "I am innocent of His blood,"—which was a lie—"see ye to it." By those last words he brought the blood upon himself, for he consigned his prisoner to their tender mercies, and they could not have laid a hand upon Him unless he had given them leave. Oh, the daring of Pilate thus in the sight of God to commit murder and disclaim it. There is a strange mingling of cowardliness and courage about many men; they are afraid of a man, but not afraid of the eternal God who can destroy both body and soul in hell. This is why men are not saved, even when the best of means are used, because they are presumptuous, and dare defy the Lord.

Besides this, Pilate was double-minded; he had a heart and a heart. He had a heart after that which was right, for he sought to release Jesus; but he had another heart after that which was gainful, for he would not run the risk of losing his post by incurring the displeasure of the Jews. We have plenty around us who are double-minded. Such are here this morning; but where were they last night? You will be touched by to-day's sermon! How will you be affected to-morrow by a lewd speech or a lascivious song?

Many men run two ways; they seem earnest about their souls, but they are far more eager after gain or pleasure. Strange perversity of man that he should tear himself in two. We have heard of tyrants tying men to wild horses and dragging them asunder, but these people do this with themselves. They have too much conscience to neglect the Sabbath, and to forego attendance at the house of prayer; too much conscience to be utterly irreligious, to be honestly infidel; and yet at the same time they have not enough conscience to keep them from being hypocrites.

IV. Lastly, we have a point which is yet more terrible, the

OVERWHELMING CONDEMNATION

of those who thus transgress. This Pilate was guilty beyond all excuse. He deliberately and of his own free will condemned the just Son of God to die, being informed that He was the Son of God, and knowing both from his own examination and from his wife that he was a "just person."

Observe that the message which he received was most distinct. It was suggested by a dream; but there is nothing dreamy about it. It is as plain as words can be put: "Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him." He condemned the Lord with his eyes open, and that is an awful way of sinning. Oh, my dear friends, am I addressing any here who are purposing to do some very sinful thing, but have lately received a warning from God? I would add one more caution. I pray you by the blessed God, and by the bleeding Saviour, and as you love yourself, and as you love her from whom the warning may have come to you, do stop, and hold your hand! Do not this abominable thing!

It may be now or never with you, as it was with Pilate that day. He had the evil thing which he was about to do fully described to him, and therefore if he ventured on it, his presumption would be great. His wife had not said, "Have nothing to do with this man," but "with this just man," and that word rang in his ears, and again and again repeated itself till he repeated it too. Read the twenty-fourth verse. When he was washing his wicked hands he said, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person,"—the very name his wife had given to our Lord. The arrows stuck in him! He could not shake them off! Like a wild beast, he had the javelin sticking in his side, and though he rushed into the forest of his sin, it was evidently rankling in him still—"that just person" haunted him. Sometimes God makes a man see sin as sin, and makes him see the blackness of it; and if he then perseveres in it, he becomes doubly guilty, and pulls down upon himself a doom intolerable beyond that of Sodom of old.

Beside that, Pilate was sinning not only after distinct warning, and a warning which set out the blackness of the sin, but he was sinning after his conscience had been touched and moved through his affections. It is a dreadful thing to sin against

A MOTHER'S PRAYER.

She stands in your way; she stretches out her arms, with tears she declares that she will block your road to perdition. Will you force your way to ruin over her prostrate form? She kneels! She grasps your knees, she begs you not to be lost. Are you so brutal as to trample on her love?

Your little child entreats you; will you disregard her tears? Alas, she was yours, but death has removed her, and ere she departed she entreated you to follow her to heaven and she sang her little hymn—

"Yes, we'll gather at the river."

Will you fling your babe aside as though you were another Herod that would slay the innocents, and all in order that you may curse yourself forever and be your own destroyer? It is hard for me to talk to you thus. If it is coming home to any of you it will be very hard for you to hear it; indeed, I hope it will be so hard that you will end it by saying, "I will yield to love which assails me by such tender entreaties."

It will not be a piece of mere imagination if I conceive that at the last great day, when Jesus sits upon the judgment-seat, and Pilate stands there to be judged for the deeds done in the body, that his wife will be a swift witness against him to condemn him. I can imagine that at the last great day there will be many such scenes as that, wherein those who loved us best will bring the most weighty evidences against us, if we are still in our sins.

I know how it affected me as a lad when my mother, after setting before her children the way of salvation, said to us, "If you refuse Christ and perish, I cannot plead in your favor and say that you were ignorant. No, but I must say Amen to your condemnation." I could not bear that! Would my mother say "Amen" to my condemnation? And yet, Pilate's wife, what canst thou do otherwise? When all must speak the truth, what canst thou say but that thy husband was tenderly and earnestly warned by thee and yet consigned the Saviour to His enemies?

Oh, my ungodly hearers, my soul goes out after you. "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?" Why will ye sin against the Saviour? God grant you may not reject your own salvation, but may turn to Christ and find eternal redemption in Him. "Whosoever believeth in Him hath everlasting life."

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 200,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

Miss M. L. Whately.

The Christian Mission School in Cairo, Egypt.

MISS. M. L. WHATELY.

Founder of the Christian Mission in Cairo, Egypt.

Early Training in Religious Work—Commences the Mission in Cairo, in 1860—First Female Teacher—Original School-room—The Assistance of Mr. and Mrs. Shakoor—Growth and Blessings of the Work.

MARY LOUISA WHATELY, whose portrait we give this week, is the second daughter of the late Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, whose interest in everything connected with education and philanthropy was so great that every member of his family was early led to take some part in teaching the poor; while his unstinted liberality in giving aid to the sick and helpless, was an example by which his children could not fail to be greatly profited.

Miss Whately and her sisters commenced to teach classes in a village school at their father's residence when still very young; and subsequently took an important part in developing the Irish Church Mission in Dublin, by teaching in Scripture classes, district visiting, and other kindred work. When family affliction and bereavement resulted in seriously affecting Miss Whately's health, her father, the Archbishop, wished her to spend some time in Egypt, as she had previously passed a winter there with much benefit. Upon arriving in the land of the Pharaohs, about 1860, Miss Whately conceived the idea of establishing a school for the poorer class of girls; and though she was strongly dissuaded from attempting anything of the kind on the alleged ground of the inaccessibility of the Mohammedans, she was not daunted, but went forward in the strength of the Lord alone.

After much difficulty a teacher was found, and as hardly any Egyptian females knew even the alphabet, it may be judged how difficult the search was. A Syrian matron, from Beyrout, with but little education, but a sincere believer in Christ, was Miss Whately's first assistant; and together they went about very quietly in the lanes and bye-streets near the hired house which the English lady occupied; and at length some poor mothers were persuaded to send their children. A small troop of little dusky maidens, ragged and dirty, but full of life and spirits, were soon gathered in the simple school-room, as shown in our picture, which is from a sketch of Miss Whately's own taken at the time, the rude fittings and primitive style of arrangement being in the beginning of the enterprise most suitable.

The neat benches and large airy rooms of the present establishment, and the large numbers of clean children receiving tuition, are a striking and gratifying contrast to the first group of wild, untrained little ones, who were gathered together. But the essence of the teaching is the same now as it was more than twenty years ago—strictly and unvaryingly Scriptural. The first text taught the little scholars was, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth;" the second, "Jesus said, I am the way, the truth, and the life." The Bible was the foundation of everything from the first; but good secular teaching was added by degrees.

As the scholars increased in number, and more respectable children attended, it was found necessary to raise the style of teaching. For a long time Miss Whately was herself obliged to teach the Scriptures, as when her first assistant left through ill-health, she could not get a Christian woman as her successor, and had to employ one who could only teach the letter of the Word, but was ignorant of its spirit. But, happily, God sent to the aid of His heroic handmaiden the Syrian missionary, Mr. Shakoor, the members of whose family became devoted agents and teachers under her practised supervision.

Presently, a boys' school and a meeting for young men were added, and every year found the work increasing, and enjoying the undoubted blessing of God. Of course, the greatest discretion was needed in dealing with the adult Mohammedans, but their children freely attended the English lady's school, and instances have frequently occurred of the little ones carrying home to their parents words of Divine truth and salvation; but fear of death or persecution made many parents unwilling to admit how much they believed in the religion of Christ.

Two young girls, who died at an interval of about a year, gave unmistakable evidence of faith in an atoning Saviour. These had been Moslem girls. Miss Whately also visited during a short illness, which terminated fatally, a Mohammedan youth, who died rejoicing in Christ as his Saviour. Among the slaves there have also been many very cheering instances of good realized, one of them being that of a poor negro who found peace through Jesus' blood, by the simple reading, and still more simple explanations, of her master's little sons who attended the school. The work has steadily increased. At present the two schools have half being Mohammedans. There is associated with the mission, a lay missionary, a staff of native teachers, male and female, a Bible-woman, and last, but not least, a Medical Missionary. Besides this agency, Miss Whately's adopted daughter, the widow of the late Mr. Shakoor, who has been nineteen years with her, regularly visits among all classes, and is much looked up to by the native women. There are, also, a weekly mothers' meeting, and a Sunday evangelistic service for both sexes, which is well attended.

FIVE HUNDRED SCHOLARS,

The work among the patients who attend the Medical Mission is deeply interesting. Nothing seems to break down the bitter feelings of Mohammedans against Christians so much as this phase of practical love, and frequently the remark is heard, "None of our own people care like this for us; these love us because they love God." The doctor is a pre-eminently holy Christian, and very skilful in his profession. He is very useful, not only in Cairo, but in the numerous villages which are situated on the banks of the Nile, where he tells the "Old, old story, of Jesus and His love," with the best results.

"One evening," says Miss Whately, "when Mrs. Shakoor and I were talking to some very poor peasant women, whose habitation was only a wretched hovel of dry reeds (for they were of Bedouin race, who live partly in tents and partly in reed huts), one old crone, who gave more attention than the rest, wiped the tears from her dim eyes, and then threw her wrinkled arms round our necks one after the other, saying, 'God bless you for these sweet words, my daughters.'"

It is in lives like this that the Christian religion finds its truest expression. In self-forgetfulness, self-denial, self-sacrifice, for the good of others, Christ's spirit is best manifested to the world. Even the debased and degraded tribes of the desert, even the stupid and ignorant inhabitant of the Egyptian city is prompt to see in a life of service a motive his own superstition does not supply, and he believes that this lady, reared in an arch-episcopal palace, who voluntarily engages in the drudgery of teaching his child, possesses a spirit of love and tenderness. It is thus that the Christian is able to fulfil the Master's words, "As a city set on a hill which cannot be hid."

"HOW ARE YOUR WIFE AND CHILDREN?"

LET us take a good look at the man.

Faugh! How he smells! Just like an ale-house. No, he is not tipsy. He can walk straight enough. And he can speak pretty plainly too. But how he smells!

It is not a glass or even two glasses that have soaked his blood and pervaded his breath like that.

Peter, how are your wife and children?

Pretty comfortable, eh! In nice easy circumstances! Very happy and merry! With nice roses on the cheeks, and sparkles in the eyes! Perfectly contented with their lot! Full of praises of Peter Spooner, the good husband, the model father! Plenty to eat! Plenty to drink! Plenty to put on! Plenty of pocket money! Plenty of everything! Is it so?

I don't quite catch your words, Peter. But of course they are all right. They couldn't be anything else after what you said some years back.

What did you say?

Well, let me see. You said: "I, Peter, take thee, Jane, to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part."

These were the very words you said, down in that pretty little village church, which both you and she know so well. Don't you remember the day, the warm sunshine, the cawing rooks, the rustling trees, the rippling brook, the old white-haired clergyman, who afterward in the vestry congratulated you both so warmly? Surely you haven't forgotten all this. Surely it is stamped and burned into your memory in lines never to be effaced. And you have loved and cherished her, according to your word, like a right-down good husband, who has nothing whatever to be ashamed of?

Lift your head, Peter. What is it drooping like that for? You have nothing to be ashamed of, have you? Of course you haven't.

Peter, I have a fancy in my head, and it has such a strong hold there that I can't get rid of it. But it is such an innocent, harmless one, that, after all, it may as well be humored. And as you couldn't say anything against it, if you tried, I don't see why I shouldn't let it have its own way for once.

What's that, master?

Why, to see your wife and children. It is a long time since I saw Jane Tippet that was, Jane Spooner that is now. I should like to shake her by the hand again.

"Busy," did you say? "Rather an inconvenient time?"

No, no. It isn't as though I were going to stay an hour. Only just a look in, a "how d'ye do," and then off again. Away you go. I'll follow close.

I say, Peter, don't you find it rather close, cooped up in this little court? Don't you find it rather unhealthy?

This the house! It can't be! Why, the windows are nearly all gone! You're joking, surely. Besides, it is empty. There is scarcely any furniture in it. And the beds are on the floor. Nonsense, Peter, you must be joking.

That pale-faced creature, sitting beside the fire, nursing the sickly little baby, who may she be? She looks half starved, and why does she shrink away with such fear, as though she were going to be struck? And there's a mark under the eye, as though some heavy hand had fallen upon it. How came that about, Peter?

And those dirty little creatures, peeping through the doorway, with nothing on their feet, and very little on their bones, to whom do they belong? Such wretched little objects, nobody would care to own them, I should think. You wouldn't, I know.

Now, Peter, don't joke any more. I really want to see your wife and children. Point out in real earnest where you live, and then I will just shake hands and go.

What, not joking! This really your home! Those indeed your children! That really your wife!

God help them then! There's been bad work here. There's been brutal work here.

And who has done it?

Thomas Cooper Requested to Travel in Another Car.—(See page 195.)

Peter, are you the guilty man? I see you are, by your very look. Yes, it is your work, all of it. Oh, shame, shame upon you! And you call yourself a husband, a protector, a provider, a father! Shame, shame, shame upon you! The very brutes care more for their offspring than you do. They preserve and provide for them at the expense of their lives. But you, for the sake of drink, cruelly neglect yours and starve them. You may well hang your head, Peter Spooner, with such devil's work as this facing you.

And now, with that thin, pale-faced wife before you, and those wretched children, I ask what are you going to do? What about your future? You have done enough mischief in your day, and mischief which, God knows, can, some of it, never be remedied. Are you going on in the same path till your poor wife there sinks into an early grave, and your children become vagabonds on the face of the earth? Make your choice, Peter Spooner, and make it this very day.

"What can you do?" Why, give up this hellish drink, which has been at the root of the whole mischief. Let not a drop of it ever again touch your lips. Shun it as very poison.

But this is not all, for there is a record in heaven, right before the searching eye of God, of all that Peter Spooner has done in his bad, bad life, and against your name there is written, "Guilty—condemned—lost."

How can that record be erased? I know of but one way. There is a hand, a pierced hand, that can remove it entirely. The hand of Jesus, the Saviour of the lost, is willing at your faithful petition to cancel it all. He who has bled for you, loves you still.

Quick! Quick! Flee to Him. Tell Him all; and claim His promise—"Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

(Continued from page 174.)

Other People's Sins.

FELIX SEFTON left the meeting overwhelmed by the accusation the drunken man had brought against his father. He stood aghast at the thought that he, Felix Sefton, a minister of the Gospel, was said to have in his veins the blood of a man charged with fraud. The shame was almost unbearable; but worse than that, he realized that such a charge, true or untrue, would interfere with his power for good in the parish. But was it true? That question must be answered at once. He would go home and have an answer from those who knew.

"But, why go home?" Felix stopped as he asked himself this question. He could not face his mother with any inquiry about the mystery that surrounded his father's memory, that mystery which was slowly dissipating like the mists which vanish imperceptibly from a landscape. He was beginning to read his mother's life in a more intelligible light, and all along the clearer line new meanings were springing into sight. The solitude and sadness, the bitterness of spirit, which had separated her from the genial influences of a society that had courted her, was plain to him now at their fountain-head. She had known—if this terrible thing was true—that shame, not glory, was hers; confusion of face, not the bearing of the palm. His heart ached for her more than for himself.

In his heart of hearts, Felix had triumphed greatly in his mother's fame. From his very babyhood the first thought impressed upon his mind had been that his mother was different from other women; far above them. It had been his father who had given him that first impression, but it had grown with strong and vigorous growth from its deep root, through all the years which had passed since his father died. Even his love for Alice had not touched his passionate loyalty and devotion to his mother. He had rejoiced in thinking that she was known, not in England alone, but in other countries into whose languages her books had been translated. Her celebrity shone in his eyes with a very strong and brilliant splendor. How could he tell her that he had been thrust into the secret of his father's infamy!

There was only Phebe to whom he could just yet lay open the doubt and terror of his soul. If it was true that her father, old Marlowe, had died broken-hearted from the loss of his money, she would be sure to know of it. His preparations for his journey to-morrow morning were complete; and if he chose there was time enough for him to catch the night train, and start at once for Riversborough. There would be no sleep for him until some of these tormenting questions were answered.

It was a little after sunrise when he reached Riversborough, where with some difficulty he roused up a hostler and obtained a horse at one of the inns. Before six he was riding up the long, steep lanes, fresh and cool with dew, and overhung with tall hedgerows, which led up to the moor. He had not met a living soul since he left the sleeping town behind him, and it seemed to him as if he was in quite a different world from the close, crowded, and noisome streets he had traversed only a few hours ago. In the natural exhilaration of the sweet mountain air, and the silence, broken only by the signing of the birds, his fears fell from him. There must be some mistake which Phebe would clear up. It was nothing but the accusation of a besotted brain which had frightened him.

He shouted boyishly when the quaint little cottage came into sight, with a thin column of blue smoke floating upwards from its ivy-clad chimney. Phebe herself came to the door, and Hilda, with ruffled hair and a sleepy face, looked out of the little window in the thatched roof. There was nothing in his appearance a few hours earlier than he was expected to alarm them, and their surprise and pleasure were complete. Even to himself it seemed singular that he should sit down at the little breakfast-table with them, the almost level rays of the morning sun shining through the lattice window, instead of in the dingy parlor of his London lodgings.

"Come with me on to the moors, Phebe," he said as soon as breakfast was over.

She went out with him bareheaded, as she had been used to do when a girl at home, and led him to a little knoll covered with short heath and ferns, from which a broad landscape of many miles stretched under their eyes to a far-off horizon. The hollow of the earth curved upwards in perfect lines to meet the perfect curve of the blue dome of the sky bending over it. They were resting as some small bird might rest in the rounded shelter of two hands which held it safely. For a few minutes they sat silent, gazing over the wide sweep of sky and land, till Felix caught sight of a faint haze, through which two or three spires were dimly visible. It was where Riversborough was lying.

"Phebe," he said, "I want you to tell me the naked truth. Did my father defraud yours of some money?"

"Felix!" she cried in startled tones.

"Say only yes or no to me first," he continued; "explain it afterwards. Only say yes or no."

Through Phebe's brain came trooping the vivid memories of the past. She saw Roland again hurrying over the moors from his day's shooting to mount his horse, which she had saddled for him, and to ride off down the steep lanes, with a cheery shout of "Good night" to her when he reached the last point where she could catch sight of him; and she saw him as his dark form walked beside her pony that night when he was already crushed down beneath his weight of sin and shame, pouring out his burdened heart into her ears. If Felix had asked her this question in London it might have hurt her less poignantly; but here, where Roland and her father filled all the place with the memory of their presence, it wounded her like the thrust of a sword. She burst into a passion of tears.

"Yes or no?" urged Felix, setting his face like a flint, and striking out blindly and pitilessly.

"Yes!" she sobbed; "but, oh, your father was the dearest friend I ever had!"

The sharp, cruel sound of the yes smote him with a deadly force. He could not tell himself what he had expected to hear; but now, for a certainty, his father, whom he had been taught to regard as a hero and a saint, proved no other than a rogue.

It was a long time before he spoke again, or lifted up his head; so long that Phebe ceased weeping, and laid her hand tenderly on his to comfort him by her mute sympathy. But he took no notice of her silent fellowship in his suffering; it was too bitter for him to feel as yet that any one could share it.

"I must give up Alice!" he groaned at last.

"No, no!" said Phebe. "I told Canon Pascal all, and he does not say so. It is your mother who cannot give her consent, and she will do it some day."

"Does he know all?" cried Felix. "Is it possible he knows all, and will let me love Alice still? I think I could bear anything if that is true. But, oh! how could I offer to her a name stained like mine?"

"Nay, the name was saved by his death," answered Phebe sadly. "There are only three who knew he was guilty—Mr. Clifford, and your mother, and I. If he had lived he might have been brought to trial and sent to a convict prison; I suppose he would; but his death saved him and you. Down in Riversborough yonder some few uncharitable people might tell you there was some suspicion about him, but most of them speak of him still as the kindest and the best man they ever knew. It was covered up skilfully, Felix, and nobody knew the truth but we three."

"Alice is visiting my father's grave this very day," he said falteringly.

"Ah! how like that is to Canon Pascal," answered Phebe, "he will tell Alice, perhaps; and they will stand there by the grave, sorrowing over the sin which drove your father into exile, and brought him to his sorrowful death. And his heart will feel more tenderly than ever for you and your mother. He will be devising some means for overcoming your mother's scruples and making you and Alice happy."

"I never can be happy again," he exclaimed. "I never thought of such a sorrow as this."

"It was the sorrow that fell to Christ's lot," she answered; "the burden of other people's sins."

"Phebe," he said, "if I felt the misery of my fellow-man before, and I did feel it, how can I bear now to remember the horrible degradation of the man who told me of my father's sin? It was a drunkard—"

"John Nixey," she interrupted; "ay! but he caught at your father's sin as an excuse for his own. No man is forced into sin. Nothing can harm them who are the followers of God. Don't lay on your father's shoulders more than his own wrong-doing. Sin spreads misery around it only when there is ground ready for the bad seed. Your father's sin opened my soul to deeper influences from God; I did not love him less because he had fallen, but I learned to trust God more, and walk more closely with Him. You, too, will be drawn nearer to God by this sorrow."

"Phebe," he said, "can I speak to Mr. Clifford about it? It would be impossible to speak to my mother."

"Quite impossible," she answered emphatically. "Yes, go down to Riversborough, and hear what Mr. Clifford can tell you. Your father repented of his sin bitterly, and paid a heavy price for it; but he was forgiven. If my poor old father could not withhold his forgiveness, would our heavenly Father fall short of it? You, too, must forgive him, my Felix."

An Old Man's Pardon.

To forgive his father—that was a strange inversion of the attitude of Felix's mind in regard to his father's memory. He had been taught to think of him with reverence, and admiration, and deep filial love. As Felicita looked back on the long line of her distinguished ancestry with an exaltation of feeling which, if it was pride, was a legitimate pride, so had Felix looked back upon the line of good men from whom his own being had sprung. He had felt himself pledged to a Christian life by the eminently Christian lives of his forefathers.

Now, suddenly, with no warning, he was called upon to forgive his father for a crime which had made him amenable to the penal laws of his country; a mean, treacherous, cowardly crime. Like Judas, he had borne the bag, and his fellow-pilgrims had trusted him with their money; and, like Judas, he had been a thief. Felix could not understand how a Christian man could be tempted by money. To attempt to serve Mammon as well as God seemed utterly contemptible and incredible to him.

His heart was very heavy as he rode slowly down the lanes and along the highway to Riversborough which his father had so often traversed before him. When he had come this way in the freshness and stillness of the early morning there had been more hope in his soul than he had been aware of, that Phebe would be able to remove this load from him; but now he knew for a certainty that his father had left to him a heritage of dishonor. She had told him all the circumstances known to her, and he was going to learn more from Mr. Clifford.

He entered his old home with more bitterness of spirit than he had ever felt before in his young life. Here, of all places in the world, clustered memories of his father; memories which he had fondly cherished and graven as deeply as he could upon his mind. He could almost hear the joyous tones of his father's voice, and see the summer gladness of his face, as he remembered them. How was it possible that with such a hidden load of shame he could have been so happy?

Mr. Clifford, though a very old man, was still in full and clear possession of his faculties, and had not yet given up an occasional attention to the business of the bank. He was nearly eighty years of age, and his hair was white, and the cold, stern blue eyes were watery and sunken in their sockets. Some years ago, when Simon Nixey had given up his last hope of winning Phebe, and had married a farmer's daughter, his mother, Mrs. Nixey, had come to the Old Bank as housekeeper to Mr. Clifford, and looked well after his welfare. Felix found him sitting in the wainscoted parlor, a withered, bent, old man, seldom leaving the warm hearth, but keen in sight and memory, living over again in his solitude the many years that had passed over him from his childhood until now. He welcomed Felix with delight, holding his hands, and looking earnestly into his face, with the half childlike affection of old age.

"I've not seen you since you became a parson," he said, with a sigh; "ah, my lad, you ought to have come to me. You don't get half as much as my cashier, and not a tenth part of what I give my manager. But there! that's your mother's fault, who would never let you touch business. She would never hear of you taking your father's place."

"How could she?" said Felix indignantly. "Do you think my mother would let me come into the house my father had disgraced, and almost ruined?"

"So you've plucked that bitter apple at last!" he answered in a tone of regret. "I thought it was possible you might never have to taste it. Felix, my boy, your mother paid every farthing of the money your father had taken, with interest, and compound interest; even to me, who begged and entreated to bear the loss. Your mother is a noble woman."

A blessed ray of comfort shot across the gloom in Felix's heart, and lit up his dejected face with a momentary smile; and Mr. Clifford stretched out his thin old hand again, and clasped his feebly.

"Ay, my boy!" he said, "and your father was not a bad man. I know how you are sitting in judgment upon him, as young people do, who do not know what it is to be sorely tempted. I judged him, and my son before him, as harshly as man could do. Remember we judge hardest where we love the most; there's selfishness in it. Our children, our fathers, must be better than other folk's children and fathers. Don't begin to reckon up your father's sins before you are thirty, and don't pass sentence till you're fifty. Judges ought to be old men."

(To be continued.)

THE GREAT PYRAMID PROPHECY ABOUT 1882-3.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

(Continued from page 191.)

Professor Piazzi Smyth's Views—Pasteur G. A. Rosset's Explanation of the Trumpets—An Invasion of Fierce Soldiers—The Gothic Trumpet—The Third Woe Brief—Pyramidal Symbolism of Christ's Two Comings—The Low Exit Passage—The Monumental Pillar to be in Egypt—The Origin of the Pyramid—The Account of Herodotus.

FUTURE GREAT INVASION OF SOUTHERN EUROPE BY RUSSIAN AND NORTH GERMAN ARMIES.

YET what does a "trumpet" mean in the book of Revelation? It means, says Pasteur G. A. Rosset, an overwhelming invasion of fierce soldiers. The first trumpet of the Apocalypse was that of the Goths. And could the words of the beloved disciple have been better chosen, or more expressive, when they are now found so strikingly confirmed by our greatest though most sceptical historian of those times (Gibbon), seeing that he has written in his Vol. v., p. 311: "On the 24th of August of the year A.D. 410, at midnight the inhabitants of Rome were awakened by the tremendous sound of

THE GOTHIC TRUMPET;

1163 years after the foundation of Rome, the imperial city, which had subdued and civilized so considerable a part of mankind, was delivered to the licentious fury of the tribes of Germany and Scythia."

Then follow the second trumpet for the invasion by the Vandals, the third for the Huns, the fourth the Heruli, the fifth the Saracens, and the sixth the Turks. But whom does the seventh trumpet, so soon to sound, announce?

Pasteur Rosset replies: "The Russians; and when they are let loose, after the destruction of the Turkish Empire, and throw themselves on the more civilized surrounding nations, we shall know that the seventh trumpet has begun to sound, and the third 'woe' has commenced. But though both the first and second woes lasted many centuries, the third one is not to do so, for the Word of God tells us that the third woe shall be terminated in brief; that the Russians shall merely be as a passing, though for the time heavy hail (Rev. 11:19; 16:21), a term also used in Revelation 8:7 to express the short infliction of the first Gothic invasion of Rome, compared to the larger and severer ones which followed it.*

CHRIST'S TWO COMINGS SYMBOLIZED IN THE GREAT PYRAMID.

A most notable part of the object wherefore the Great Pyramid was built appears to be to show reality, and the settled, as well as long pre-destined times and seasons for each of the two comings of Christ, both for that coming which is already taken place more than eighteen centuries ago, and which is marked prophetically in the Great Pyramid by the beginning of the Grand Gallery (p. 461); and also for that other coming of Christ in kingly glory, power, and universal peace, which is yet to beam upon mankind.

Christ's First Coming was for the sake of inaugurating among men an opening whereby each of them might attain to personal, private, individual salvation; in which respect it was a "finished and complete work." His Second Coming, on the other hand, is for national, public, and governmental salvation; a something which men, even with the personal salvation of the First Coming to guide and assist them, have been wholly unable to bring about.

Exactly when that Second Coming is to take place—which (and not the First Coming, nor anything depending upon it) will put an end for ever to all wars and human authorizations for man to slaughter his fellow men, women, and children, to promote his own so-called interests—is a question towards which the Great Pyramid suggests in the Grand Gallery's terminating low exit passage at the end of its 1882 inches, both thenceforth and towards the Antechamber, that a beginning of the divine preparations for it may be in A.D. 1882-3 (p. 546-548).

Thus we are arrived early at "the End of the age or the close of the existing dispensation," as the Pyramid's Grand Gallery, with its impending south wall almost immediately over us, intimates it to be (pp. 462, 545), in our present symbolic position at the terminating south end of that Grand Gallery.

Meanwhile, a very great fact and serious difficulty which believers have to deal with is this, that building we have thus alluded to as sacred, and destined to be a miraculous witness to God in the latter day, especially in the mysteries of His appointed times and seasons, stands in the generally Bible-condemned and even hateful country of Egypt instead of Palestine. That is absolutely true. But does not Isaiah distinctly say that the monumental pillar which is to witness in the latter day to the Lord is to be in Egypt? (Isa. 19:19, 20; Jer. 32:20). And are there not of Egypt in the latter day many other incomprehensibly wonderful things recorded in the Scriptures of God? or it is apparently to be, notwithstanding its ages of baseness and deserved bitter punishments, the first of the latter-day chosen three—Egypt, Assyria, and Israel; and the Lord of Hosts shall bless it, saying, "Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance" (Isa. 19:24, 25).

HISTORY AND PECULIAR FEATURES OF THE GREAT PYRAMID.

The origin of the Great Pyramid is somewhat obscure owing to its antiquity, for it has been calculated on astronomical grounds by Sir John Herschel and others to have been built about the year 2170 before Christ, which was nearly seventy years before the birth of Abraham, and 570 years before the exodus of the Israelites out of Egypt under Moses' leadership. An Egyptian king, named Cheops, was its builder according to the Greek historian, Herodotus, who wrote B.C. 445, as stated in Rawlinson's translation of Herodotus, vol. ii., chapter 124, page 199, as follows:

"Cheops, according to the Egyptian priests, on ascending the throne, plunged into all manner of wickedness. He closed the temples, and forbade the Egyptians to offer sacrifices (to heathen deities), compelling them instead to labor one and all in his service: viz., in building the Great Pyramid. Cheops reigned fifty years, and was succeeded by his brother Chephren, who imitated the conduct of his predecessor, built a pyramid, but smaller than his brother's, and reigned fifty-six years. Thus, during 106 years, the temples were shut and never opened. After Chephren, Mycerinus, son of Cheops, ascended the throne. He re-opened the temples and allowed the people to resume the practice of sacrifice. He, too, built a pyramid, but much inferior in size to his father's.

"The Egyptians so detest the memory of those two kings, Cheops and Chephren, that they do not like even to mention their names. Hence, they commonly called the Great Pyramid after Philition (or Philitis), a shepherd who then fed his flocks about the place."

Thus it appears that the Egyptians, who were devoted to the worship of bulls, goats, beetles, cats, and other strange gods, hated Cheops and Chephren because those two monarchs under higher and better influence closed the idolatrous temples, and prohibited sacrifices to such heathenish deities. Sir G. Wilkinson and Mr. Rawlinson in their notes on this passage of Herodotus, as well as other Egyptologist writers, fully admit that this Philites, who was so distinguished in connection with the building of the Great Pyramid, was a shepherd prince probably from Palestine. He is supposed to have been one of the shepherd kings mentioned by Manetho, an Egyptian priest who wrote in 270 B.C. about the early history of Egypt, and whose statements are quoted in a book called "Fragments," written in A.D. 1832, by Isaac Cory, of Caius College, Cambridge, as follows:

"Formerly there came up from the East in a strange manner men of an ignoble race, who had the confidence to invade our country (Egypt), and easily subdued it by their efforts without a battle. All this invading nation was styled Hycsos, that is, Shepherd Kings; for the first syllable Hyc in the sacred dialect, denotes a king, and Sos signifies a shepherd, but this only according to the vulgar tongue; and of these is compounded the term Hycsos."

(To be concluded.)

THE PROPHECY OF OUR LORD.

Matthew 24:15, 16 and 21-27. By P. W. E.

NOTICE under what circumstances this prophecy was uttered. Jesus had just told the Jews, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate." Forever? No; but till they should say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Christ then foretells to His disciples the overthrow of the temple. "There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down."

After this, His disciples came to Him, as He sat upon the Mount of Olives, and asked Him, "When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the age?" This "end of the age" was a perfectly well understood phrase, signifying the termination of the existing age of Gentile rule; and therefore connected with the return of the Messiah; the period when the Jews would receive Him as coming "in the name of the Lord." Our Lord's prophecy was spoken in answer to this question, as reported in Matthew. In Luke, the prophecy is directed mostly to the siege of Jerusalem by Titus; but here in Matthew both the questions asked and the replies are different. Our Lord prophesied; and subsequently Luke was led by the Spirit to select those parts referring to the siege of Jerusalem, which was comparatively new, while Matthew was led by the same Spirit to record those portions which answered the disciples' questions about His own return and the end of the age.

The first part of the prophecy refers to "wars and rumors of wars," "famines and pestilences and earthquakes in divers places," also "persecutions," which "are the beginning of sorrows;" and which correspond with wars and famines, pestilences and persecutions, detailed under the opening of the six seals in the sixth chapter of the Revelation of Jesus Christ.

The second part of the prophecy begins with an event of which Daniel had prophesied, "the abomination of desolation," standing in the holy place. The passage in Daniel is as follows: "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, then shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." Daniel 12:11, 12. Daniel is here prophesying of the time of Isaiah's restoration and blessing, and is told that from the setting up of "the abomination that maketh desolate," to this period is 1290 or 1335 days. These times are just a little longer than the forty and two months, or 1260 days mentioned in the Revelation; showing there are three stages; one, three and a half years after this event, and the other two following at intervals of 30 and 75 days respectively, before the full work of Israel's redemption and blessing is accomplished.

This passage in Matthew, then, teaches that there will be an abomination, which in Scripture means an idol, set up in the holy place, the temple, at Jerusalem about three and a half years before Israel's final deliverance. It is called an "abomination of desolation," or an "abomination that maketh desolate;" because the return of the Jews to idolatry is visited with misery and desolation upon the city of Jerusalem. The Jews were taken into captivity because of their idolatry; and the judgments inflicted upon them at that time so effectually cured them of idol worship, that from that time up to the present, a period of nearly two thousand five hundred years, they have abhorred the least approaches to it, as predicted in Ezekiel 23:27, and Zech. 13:2. But after the church shall have been taken up to be with Christ, and the daily sacrifice is made to cease, and the abomination is set up in the temple, the masses of the Jews are going to become idolaters, worshippers of the beast and his image, which will call down these terrible judgments upon Jerusalem.

Let us now trace the correspondence between this prophecy of our Lord and the prophecies of the Revelation. In Matthew we have an idolatrous image set up in Jerusalem about three and a half years before the end of the Gentile rule. In the thirteenth chapter of the Revelation we have the same. In Matthew the faithful are warned, on the setting up of the image, to flee from Jerusalem to the mountains. In the Revelation they do flee (12:6). In Matthew, we are told there "shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." In the Revelation, those who survive the judgment are said to have "come out of the great tribulation" (7:14 Revision). In Matthew, for the elect's sake, the time is shortened. In the Revelation, Satan is enraged "because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." In Matthew there arise false Christs and false prophets, "and shall show great signs and wonders, inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." In the Revelation the false Christ "deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do." In Matthew, the Jews are seeking for a Christ, not to appear from heaven, but to be found on earth. In the Revelation, they find and follow a false Christ, who is altogether of the earth. This is as Christ foretold: "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive." John 5:43. Finally, in Matthew, the scene closes by "the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." In the Revelation, the scene closes by the heavens opening and Christ coming, "clothed with a vesture dipped in blood," as "KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS," accompanied "with the armies of heaven."

* The following observations are quoted from the 23d, 24th and 25th chapters of Professor Piazzi Smyth's book to which the figures to pages refer.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Emperor of Germany has Celebrated his eighty-fifth birthday. Thanksgiving services were held at the churches, which were numerously attended. The Emperor commenced receiving congratulations at ten o'clock in the morning, and he stood throughout the reception without manifesting a sign of fatigue. Great crowds of people assembled in the Unter den Linden and cheered his Majesty upon his appearance on the balcony. Emperor William, replying to a deputation who presented an address, said that every new period of life reminded him that it was the Almighty who, at certain times, chose His instruments. God had called upon him to carry out certain tasks. Neither in civil nor in military matters had he ever failed to find fit and capable men for his purposes. The times were serious. Considering that the Czar a year ago had fallen a victim to party anarchy, who could now deem himself safe? He laid great stress upon the importance of fervent religious feeling, which he had often exhorted the people to cultivate. He also referred with deep emotion to the preservation of the life of the Emperess.

In View of the Recent Apprehension of War between Russia and Germany not a little curiosity was shown as to the manner in which the Russian Court would observe the Emperor William's birthday. It was noticed with gratification as an encouraging sign that the utmost cordiality prevailed. Early in the day the Czar telegraphed the following congratulatory message to the Emperor William: "The Empress and myself are present with our whole heart and mind at your birthday, and take part in the demonstrations of affection and respect which surround you. May God preserve for many years to come, a life crowned with so much glory, for the welfare of Germany and the peace of Europe, and strengthening the ties of friendship between ourselves and our empires." A state banquet was also given by the Czar, at which he took the opportunity to express his strong wishes for the maintenance of peace between the two countries and his high esteem for the aged Emperor.

The Russian Czar is said to have Interfered for the protection of the Jews of his empire. The Jewish World has received a telegram from St. Petersburg stating that the Czar has refused to confirm the recommendations of the Commission on the Jewish Question in favor of compelling the Jews to quit the rural districts, on the ground that such expulsion would almost ruin agriculture, and that the recommendations are generally conceived in a vindictive spirit. The Herald, of St. Petersburg, says, nevertheless, that General Ignatieff has ordered all the Jewish chemists of St. Petersburg to sell their business. The fears the Czar is reported as entertaining as to the effect the expulsion of the Jews is likely to have on agriculture, are inconsistent with the charges made that Russian Jews engage in no occupations but those of money lending and peddling.

Mr. Laurence Oliphant, whose Disinterested labors for the promotion of the restoration of the Jews to Palestine have been untiring, is entrusted by the English committee formed to assist the Jewish refugees from Russia, with $50,000 for their benefit. He has personally proceeded to Austria, where many Jews have taken temporary refuge, and intends aiding such of them as are willing to settle in Palestine to remove thither.

An Important Change in the British Constitution has now assumed definite shape. It is that of the equalization of the county and borough franchise. At present the members of Parliament are of two kinds; those who represent boroughs and those who represent counties, and divisions of counties. To each of the cities and large towns one or more members are assigned, and every occupant of a house, and even some men who are only boarders, have the right to vote in the election of a member. But in the county elections, which cover the population not included in the cities and towns, only those men may vote whose houses are assessed at an annual rate of sixty dollars. It is now proposed to equalize the franchise and give the right of voting to the rural householder or lodger on the same qualification as would serve him if he lived in a city. A test vote was taken in the House of Commons on the question on March 22d, and it was noticed that Mr. Goschen, the most formidable opponent of the change, on that occasion voted for it.

The British Parliament has Agreed to Grant to Prince Leopold, the youngest son of Queen Victoria, who is about to be married, an annual allowance of $50,000 additional to the sum he is now receiving. An acrimonious discussion took place, led by the Radical members. Mr. Gladstone protested against the violence of the speeches, and when he asserted that the grant to Princess Louise was made without opposition he caused some confusion to his colleagues. One member contradicted the prime minister, stating that he had voted against the grant in the respectable company of Messrs. Chamberlain and Fawcett, who now, as cabinet ministers, occupied the government bench.

The Treatment of the Imprisoned Irish Suspects has been made the subject of debate in the British Parliament. The correspondent of the New York Tribune says: "The Home Rulers have made a persistent attempt to disseminate a belief that the prisoners are harshly treated. The attempt failed; every specific accusation of importance being successfully refuted. The government, in answer to Irish appeals, showed that there was, if anything, too great readiness to relax the existing restrictions. The general impression from the debate is that great consideration is shown the prisoners. The whole grievance was exploded on the appearance in the League organ of letters from two prisoners saying they had plenty of the best to eat and drink, lots of amusement and comfortable cells, and declaring that more would soon qualify for admission if they knew how grandly off the prisoners were."

The Irishmen who Hold Certificates of Naturalization as American citizens, but who are imprisoned as suspected persons in Ireland, have been made the subject of a question in the British House of Commons. The Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, said the government was now considering the representations of the government of the United States regarding the trial or the release of the Americans.

The Rev. George Muller, the Bristol Philanthropist and world-wide evangelist, has been spending several months in the Holy Land. He preached at Joppa, November 17th, in the chapel of the German colony, and also in private houses at Savona, a little way out of Joppa. He held his first meeting in Jerusalem December 1st, whither he and Mrs. Muller had travelled in an open wagon from Joppa.

Another European Theatre has been Destroyed by fire. On Saturday, March 18th, the Russian Theater Demidoff was utterly consumed. It was a wooden building, and the following morning not a trace of it was visible. There must have been about eight hundred persons in the theatre when the fire broke out. Thanks to the energy and presence of mind of the Commissaire of Police all were saved. Seeing the smoke he at once rose and called out to the audience: "Don't stir; let one row of stalls only be emptied at a time, and in five minutes the house can be cleared." His suggestion was followed. Meanwhile the police opened the doors, which were constructed after the panic caused by the destruction of the Ring Theatre at Vienna, and in five minutes, as he had told the people, the theatre was emptied. The fire had originated in one of the actresses' dressing rooms.

The Instructions Issued by Engineer Melville of the Jeannette expedition to those engaged in the search for the missing men, will be read with gloomy forebodings by the friends of De Long and his brave companions in this country. We have hitherto been impressed by the hopes entertained of finding them alive, but the arrangement ordered, imply that Engineer Melville has but little hope of that happy result of the search. The following is one of the paragraphs of his order: "The persons of the dead I wish to have carried to a central position most convenient of access to Bulun, all placed inside of a small house, arranged side by side for future recognition, the hut then securely closed and banked up with snow or earth and to remain so until a proper person arrives from America to make final disposition of the bodies. In banking up the hut have it done in such a manner that animals cannot get in to destroy the bodies."

The Czar of Russia has still Substantial Reason to fear the plots of the Nihilists. The Russian correspondent of the New York Herald cables as follows: "Apropos of the statement that the Nihilists have relinquished their intention of a further attempt against the Czar, I have heard on good authority that they will wait until after the coronation, when, if reforms are not introduced, he will be condemned by their revolutionary tribunal. A correspondent of the Daily News sends a pitiable account of the state of affairs in the prison palace at Gatchina. The Czar is said to be stupefied by captivity, music alone preventing his mind from becoming completely unhinged. He is afraid to accompany the Czarina for outdoor exercise. He spends hours daily with the children in the gymnasium, climbing rope ladders and turning somersaults."

The Sultan of Turkey has Applied to General Lew Wallace, the United States Minister, for information concerning America, especially in regard to the judicial system in the United States and the mode of collecting taxes. General Wallace states that the Sultan displayed a shrewd, penetrating intellect, and expressed the most friendly sentiments for America. The Sultan's difficulties consist in the fact that his collectors are corrupt and dishonest; he seems to be under the impression that such conduct does not prevail in America.

Vol. IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1881, with complete index. Price, $3 including postage: ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

PRICE, ONE DOLLAR. POST FREE.

FORTY COMING WONDERS:

With Fifty Full-Page Pictures, and Diagrams of Scenes in Daniel and Revelation, and Extracts from the Expositions of

Archbishop Cyprian, Duke of Manchester, Lord Cavan, Lord Congleton, Lord Farnham, Hon. Gerard Noel, Revs. Dr. Alex. Keith, Dr. Alex. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Gill, Dr. Grabe, Dr. Roos, Dr. Seiss, and Revs. Thomas Scott, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, R. Skeen, J. G. Gregory, A. Fausset, R. A. Purdon, R. Govett, R. Polwhele, Tilson Marsh, C. J. Goodhart, J. G. Zippel, B. W. Newton, C. Beale, D. N. Lord, Colonel Rowlandson, Major Trevilian, et

BY THE REV. M. BAXTER, EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

OBTAINABLE THROUGH THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, ALL BOOKSELLERS, AND AT THE OFFICE OF "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London.

Single Copies, Three Cents.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, 1882.

16th Year. No. 14.—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF MR. E. P. WESTON AND MR. JOSEPH LIVESEY, two Eminent Temperance Workers, and Picture of a Temperance Demonstration in a London Theatre.
ANXIETY. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.
A Timely Deliverance—My Uncle: A Temperance Appeal.
SYLPH SOMERS. A New Serial Story. By Henry Martin, author of "Felicia Cuffe" (Continued).
The Five Thousand Fed. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
PICTURE OF JUMBO, THE ELEPHANT.
CURRENT EVENTS: The Tariff Commission Debate—Longfellow's Funeral—A Steamer Burned—Prohibition Lost in Massachusetts—Moonlight Photographs—An Adder at Church, etc.
PICTURES ILLUSTRATING STORIES: Mrs. Parker and Madeline—Captain Somerville's Scheme Thwarted.
FRESHNESS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
COBWEBS AND CABLES. By Hesba Stretton (Continued).
THE GREAT PYRAMID PROPHECY ABOUT 1882-3.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Nihilists at Work—The Lamson Case—Moody and Sankey Invited to London, etc.

Mr. EDWARD P. WESTON and Mr. JOSEPH LIVESEY.—A Temperance Demonstration in a Theatre.

A GREAT TOTAL ABSTINENCE MEETING.

ON March 1st a mighty demonstration was made in London by the noble army of temperance men. It was a mass meeting convened by Mr. William Noble, the founder of the blue-ribbon army. He foresaw how large an assembly would respond to his call and the consequent necessity of engaging a building capable of comfortably seating those who attended. He was facilitated in his attempt by the provisions of the English law, by which it is enacted that no theatrical representations shall be given in London on Ash Wednesday. Mr. Noble therefore engaged the largest theatre in London, the Standard, and many people who had never been inside a theatre before, found themselves gazing at the stage. Both before and behind the footlights the scene was uncommon within those walls. For while the audience differed widely enough from that usually gathered there, the occupants of the stage were no actors simulating sentiment and passion, but men in earnest for the reformation of the degraded and the fallen. The picture on our frontispiece represents the scene. With this we give the portraits of two eminent temperance men, one of American birth and reputation, the other a veteran English abstainer.

MR. EDWARD PAYSON WESTON, Pedestrian and Temperance Advocate in Connection with the Episcopal Church Temperance Society.

Born in 1839—Parentage and Early Childhood—Reverence for the Lord's Day—Juvenile Athletic Conquests—Becomes a Journalist—Remarkable Pedestrian Performances—His Lectures on Diet and Hygiene—Arrival in England in 1875—His Walk of 2000 Miles in 1000 Hours—Begins to Lecture for the Episcopal Church Temperance Society.

MR. E. P. WESTON, whose portrait accompanies that of Mr. Livesey on our frontispiece this week, is forty-three years of age, having been born in Providence, R. I., on March 15th, 1839. Mr. Weston's father was a man of energy, who held an influential position in that city from his intellectual ability, and was in very comfortable circumstances. His mother was a woman of brilliant accomplishments, an able musician, poetess, and authoress, and a large contributor to some of the leading magazines and journals of the Union. The childhood of the future pedestrian was nurtured by his parents under the most favorable auspices. He early took a liking to the Sunday-School and other kindred institutions which foster the growth of religion, education, and morality. As the tree grew so the fruit was brought forth, for in one of Mr. Weston's letters dated in 1876 we read that he "had never issued or accepted a challenge in his life, nor been party to a wager in any form," and it is a praiseworthy trait in his character, and worthy of recording to his credit, that he always made it a condition of his feats and contests that Sunday should be regarded as a day of rest, and that no professional walking should be done on that day.

When quite a youth he won many prizes, both for his educational attainments as well as for his ability in running, jumping, swimming, and other athletic exploits, and amid all the temptations that beset the path of a young athlete he never once yielded to the so-called pleasures of the intoxicating cup.

On his marriage, which took place in his early manhood, he removed from the home of his youth and settled on the banks of the Hudson, about eight miles from New York, connecting himself as a reporter and journalist with the New York press. He was in the habit of walking between his residence and his office day by day. He was, while occupying this position, often held up as an example of temperance, industry, and morality.

At this time he began to be celebrated for his marvellous pedestrian performances, and his services were in great requisition at the athletic sports. In the year 1867 he performed one of his greatest feats by walking from Portland, Me., to Chicago, a distance of 1326 miles, which he accomplished in twenty-five days less one hour and twenty minutes, being at the rate of fifty-three miles a day. The time in which he had undertaken to execute this hitherto unparalleled undertaking was thirty days. Again, in the year 1869 he walked from Bangor, Me., to Buffalo, N. Y., a distance of 1058 miles (1050 of which were over snow) in thirty days. His fame as a pedestrian spread through the Union, his pedestrian feats having been witnessed by thousands in the States of New York, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Indiana, Missouri, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. In Newark, in the last named State, he walked 500 miles in five days twenty-three hours and thirty-eight minutes.

He was also renowned as a lecturer upon personal diet and hygiene, and in this capacity he lectured before audiences which included some of the first men of position and ability in America. He was fortunate in winning the esteem and friendship of President Fillmore, Horace Greeley, of the New York Tribune, and President Lincoln. On one occasion when he was lecturing in Steinway Hall, New York, Horace Greeley presided and introduced the lecturer in a glowing and eulogistic speech to a brilliant audience, composed of judges, divines, physicians, and editors, and other literary men, who listened with attention and interest to the lecture.

It was not an unusual thing for Mr. Weston at this time to walk fifty or sixty miles in a day, and deliver a lecture to a large audience the same evening. In his personal appearance Mr. Weston is a slim, lithe, wiry man, of medium size, with small head, hands, and feet; his limbs are spare, but shapely and well-knit; he seems to have no superfluous flesh about him, but appears to be all muscle, bone, and sinew. His face is pleasant looking, and betokens an agreeable, good-natured manner; his thin and compressed lips indicate a strong determination and an indomitable will. He is a man of modest demeanor, and states that he never trained for his great walking feats, but simply relied on his strong constitution and the simplicity of his living and diet and his personal habits of cleanliness and sobriety.

He went to England at the latter end of the year 1875. He had not been in England long before he was invited to give an exhibition of his pedestrian powers. He received an invitation signed by some of the most influential American representatives in London, and since that time has been lionized there more than any athlete in modern times. He continued to add to his popularity and prowess as a pedestrian, until he assumed the honorable and responsible position which he now occupies.

Among the wonderful and unprecedented feats of power and endurance which he has performed in England and America, and in which he has succeeded by his pluck and perseverance, the greatest was his undertaking to walk 2000 miles in 1000 hours (resting on the intervening Sundays), which really reduced the time to only 856 hours, or 35 days and 16 hours, along the turnpike roads of England, and lecturing on the way in 50 of the principal cities and towns. He commenced this journey at the instance of Sir J. Dugdale Astley, M.P., and was accompanied by three selected judges, who rode in an omnibus provided for them by Mr. Weston. During this tour he passed through 35 counties and 190 cities and towns of England, amid the admiration of thousands of spectators who thronged the route a great part of the distance, and who vociferously applauded the wonderful feat.

To give some idea of the gigantic task he accomplished, it is estimated that the distance he traversed on foot would be equivalent to a man starting from Calais and walking through France, Belgium, and Prussia, and across Russia to the shores of the Caspian Sea, which would be equivalent to walking across the whole Continent of Europe at its widest part; or to give another comparison, it would be nearly equal (if he could walk as the crow flies) to walking from London to the Holy Land. It has been computed that Mr. Weston has, in England and America, walked as a pedestrian as much as 56,000 miles, a little more than twice round the globe.

He has always shown warm sympathy with philanthropic and religious institutions, and when living in America, most of his performances were for the benefit of some charity or benevolent institution. He is, however, more at home in lecturing for the temperance cause than in any other capacity, as he is not only personally an abstainer, but he can speak with authority of the benefits to be derived from the practice of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks under great exertion and fatigue.

Mr. Weston has attached himself to the Church of England Temperance Society, as an advocate, and has already lectured under their auspices to many large and enthusiastic audiences in the British Metropolis, and in many of the large cities and towns of England. When in America, he advocated in his lectures the closing of the saloons on Saturday afternoons, with the view of preventing the scenes of riot and degradation that often follow the receipt of the weekly wages. He states that he discovered by his personal experience, that to abstain from ale, wine, brandy, and whiskey, and other intoxicating drink, is absolutely necessary to any prolonged exertion. He also strongly opposed the use of tobacco in all its forms, and whenever possible, he has forbidden its use in any of the buildings in which his pedestrian performances were given.

Mr. Weston is as intellectual as he is muscular and enduring. He is a good talker—as a lecturer he has been listened to with pleasure by people in all stations of life. He is no walking machine, but well-bred, of genial and cheerful manners and gentlemanly bearing, a man of education and intelligence. He is from conviction an ardent advocate of the temperance cause, a shrewd observer and a fluent speaker. His lectures and addresses are, while witty and humorous, free from all coarseness or vulgarity, they are generally illustrated and enlivened by personal anecdotes and interesting incidents in his career, and are delivered with telling force and dramatic ability.

Mr. Weston says in one of his papers on the temperance cause: "It has been said that I have abandoned pedestrianism because I was physically disabled, had been beaten and was 'broken down.' This is an error, for I accomplished my purpose, which was to demonstrate to the professional that he could accomplish a greater effort by abstaining from alcoholic stimulants than he could by using them. Having done this and learning that I could be of benefit to others as well as myself by demonstrating to the world the effect of temperance upon health, by the advice of friends I have identified myself with the temperance cause, and shall use the same energy to impress upon the people the advantage of temperance that I have to convince them that walking is the most health-giving exercise known to man." Mr. Weston is a most reverent believer in the Word of God, and in full sympathy with all philanthropic and Christian enterprises.

MR. JOSEPH LIVESSEY, The Patriarch of Total Abstinence.

Born in 1794—Orphaned at Seven Years of Age—Early Struggles with Poverty—Becomes a Weaver's Boy—His Pursuit of Knowledge—Drinking Customs of the Time—A Beneficial Acquaintance—Courtship and Marriage—The Doctor's Orders—Livesey becomes a Cheese-monger—His Place as a Public Man—Birth of the Total Abstinence Movement—Origin of the Word "Teetotal."

JOSEPH LIVESSEY, one of the patriarchs of temperance reform, and one of the best-known pioneers of the movement, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece this week, is in many senses a remarkable man. His rise from poverty to affluence and his disinterested labors for the benefit of others render a sketch of his life especially interesting. He was born at Walton, England, on March 5th, 1794, so that he is now eighty-eight years of age. His father, John Livesey, was a hand-loom cloth-weaver, and his mother, Janet Ainsworth, was a farmer's daughter. He had a brother and sister who died early, and his parents both died of consumption within ten weeks of each other in 1801. Thus, at the age of seven, Joseph was without father, mother, brother, or sister.

The orphan boy used to reside with his grandfather Livesey, who shortly afterwards relinquished farming and embarked in the cotton manufacture, which, however, did not succeed, and the state of the family was one of poverty. As soon as he was able the youthful Joseph had to take his place at a weaver's loom, and for seven years he toiled away in the corner of the damp cellar, which was their only workshop. He had had little schooling, only about enough to enable him to read the New Testament and write and cipher indifferently. Like that other weaver boy, David Livingstone, he determined to cultivate his mind as the best means of self-advancement; and, like Livingstone, he planted his open book on the weaving-beam, so that he could read and work at the same time.

Among the first books which he purchased with his carefully hoarded pocket-money, were a grammar and a Reference Bible, and so great was his love of study that he would often sit up late at night, after his grandfather and uncle had retired to rest. He was not allowed any candle; but, with his head close to the bars of the open fireplace, he earnestly pored over his much-loved books in the glare of the embers left in the fire-grate.

THE DRINKING CUSTOMS OF THE TIME.

The weavers of the town were in the habit of celebrating weekly revels, in which spiced ale and wine played a conspicuous part. In Livesey's time the hospitalities of the table always included a bottle, and all the leading men in the neighborhood were more or less addicted to intemperance. When the church clock was at a standstill for want of winding up on a morning, as was often the case, the common remark was, "Clerk was droonk last night!" The ringers and singers, too, were not without reproach.

When Livesey was about seventeen, he became acquainted with a Christian family of the name of Portlock. The example of the Portlocks exercised an important influence upon his impressionable nature. He began to attend public worship in Preston, and used to tramp in his clogs from Walton to the town to a week evening prayer-meeting.

HIS COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

Livesey's love-making, if not romantic, was certainly a little singular. Having heard of a Miss Williams, the daughter of a Welshman at Liverpool, as being an amiable, religious girl, even before he had seen her, he determined to make her an offer of marriage. Miss Williams was at the time in Manchester. There was thirty miles between them; and with the exception of three visits, which he performed on foot, the courtship was carried on by correspondence. The marriage took place in St. Peter's Church (now the Pro-Cathedral), Liverpool, on May 30th, 1815. "I remember," says Mr. Livesey, "paying the parson with five-shilling piece ($1.25), and afterwards remarking what a cheap wife I had got."

The young couple bravely faced the stern practical realities of life, and cheerfully endeavored to look at the bright side of the trials which beset them in their early housekeeping experiences. Living in Walton was found to be inconvenient, so in 1815 they removed to Preston. Their first house was in Park Street, the rent of which was equivalent to sixty cents a week, and here their twin children were born. Other children followed, and the family expenses increased the wages Mr. Livesey earned became too small to maintain them as he wished. To make matters worse his health failed and then dire poverty fell on the household. As often happens, the misfortune of illness led in Mr. Livesey's case to a blessing. His physician ordered him more generous diet, and among other remedies he suggested as a useful remedy for Mr. Livesey's sickness that he should eat a piece of cheese after each meal. He went out to purchase a small quantity of the article, but found the price asked beyond his means. Just at that time was the Lancaster cheese fair, and he heard some people stating that prices had declined. On making inquiries he found that by purchasing a whole cheese the price per pound would be much less than the price he had been asked. He induced some of his neighbors to join in the purchase, and bought two cheeses, and not only made a satisfactory profit upon the sale of them, but found himself visited again at the end of the week by people who were desirous of purchasing more at the same price.

BECOMES A CHEESEMONGER.

Livesey was now fairly started in business as a cheesemonger, and every Saturday took up his stand in Preston market-place, and soon succeeded in selling as much as three hundredweight in a day. He then began to attend the markets, entirely relinquished the loom, and soon built up for himself a business as cheesemonger unrivalled by any similar establishment in North Lancashire, and realized a considerable fortune.

HIS PLACE AS A PUBLIC MAN.

It is as a temperance reformer that the world best knows the now patriarchal Joseph Livesey. For more than half a century his voice and pen and purse have been cheerfully and self-denyingly employed to further the movement. For many years past it has been his custom to issue an Annual Temperance Address on New Year's Day, and that for 1881 opens with the following autobiographical statement: "It is now fifty years since I took my last glass. It was early in 1831, at Mr. McKie's, Lune Street, Preston. It was only one glass of whiskey and water. I often say it was the best I ever drank, the best because it was the last; and if I remain in my senses I shall never take another."

Having tested the principle of total abstinence for himself, Mr. Livesey was not long in finding a means of employing his experience for the benefit of others. On January 1st, 1832, the young men in the Adult Sunday School, which he then conducted, formed themselves into a temperance society. At the time referred to, the pledge was simply one of abstinence from ardent spirits and great moderation in fermented liquors. It was, however, soon discovered that the permission to take wine and ale in moderation proved a fatal snare to many of the recruits, hence arose an angry controversy which lasted for some time. Some contended that the pledge should exclude the use of all alcoholic liquors; others considered this a dangerous doctrine, and said that to forbid wine and beer was an innovation upon temperance orthodoxy.

THE FIRST PLEDGE.

But Joseph Livesey and many others were determined by all moral means to make the pledge one of total abstinence. He himself says: "On Thursday, August 23d, 1832, John King was passing my shop in Church Street, and I invited him in. After discussing this question, upon which we were both agreed, I asked him if he would sign a pledge of total abstinence, to which he consented. I then went to the desk and wrote one out, the precise words of which I don't remember. He came up to the desk, and I said 'Thee sign it first.' He did so, and I signed it after him."

From these two signatures sprang the total abstinence movement in England. In the course of a few days a special meeting was convened to consider the question, and on Saturday, September 1st, 1832, the meeting took place. It was held in the "Cock-pit," owned by the Earl of Derby, a building erected for the purposes of cock-fighting in the days of that degrading pastime, and capable of accommodating seven hundred persons. The result of this meeting was that seven men signed the new pledge, which was in the following terms: "We agree to abstain from all liquors of an intoxicating quality, whether ale, porter, wine, or ardent spirits, except as medicines." The seven men who signed this, the first total abstinence pledge known in England, were John Grattan, Edward Dickinson, John Broadbelt, John Smith, Joseph Livesey, David Anderton, and John King.

In 1862 Mr. Livesey visited Glasgow to attend the anniversary meetings of the Scottish Temperance League, and in one of his speeches referred as follows to "Dickie Turner,"

AND THE ORIGIN OF THE WORD "TEETOTAL."

"I have been asked several times," said Mr. Livesey, "if I could give any explanation of the word 'teetotal.' Now I can assure you, if any authority be required as to the origin of that word, none higher can be given than myself, for I was present when the word originated. It was first pronounced by a man named Dickie Turner. At that time (1832) there were temperance societies, based upon the principle of abstinence from all spirits and great moderation in all fermented liquors. Dickie attempted at a meeting to show the difference. He deprecated the practice of drinking fermented liquors in moderation, and enjoined that of abstinence. He then used the expression that gave rise to that notable term, Teetotal, which has since gone throughout the world. He said that we should be 'te-te-tee-total.' We all took up the word at that moment, and were glad of it, for the designation, 'abstinence from all intoxicating liquors' was cumbersome. We said that was the thing; and from that moment till now the word Teetotal denotes abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, in opposition to moderation in their use."

From the year 1831, until the present time, Mr. Livesey has been unceasingly prosecuting the great campaign; indeed, the whole story of the progress of temperance in England is inseparably associated with his name. Conferences and public meetings have again and again been stirred by his enthusiastic and patriotic utterances; and although during the past few years his appearances on the platform have been less frequent, his pen is still actively employed in enlightening the people as to the advantages which total abstinence confers.

TIMELY DELIVERANCE.

THE narrative of the experience of Mr. Müller, the director of the Orphanages, is full of deliverances granted in answer to prayer. The following notes of his early experience show how in his early days God strengthened his faith and encouraged him to trust in Him.

"In November, 1830," says Mr. Müller, "our money was reduced to about two dollars. When I was praying with my wife in the morning, the Lord brought to my mind the state of our purse, and I was led to ask Him for some money. About four hours after, a sister said to me, 'Do you want any money?' 'I told the brethren,' said I, 'dear sister, when I gave up my salary, that I would for the future tell the Lord only about my wants.' She replied, 'But He has told me to give you some money.' About two weeks ago I asked Him what I should do for Him, and He told me to give you some money; and last Saturday it came again powerfully to my mind, and has not left me since, and I felt it so forcibly last night that I could not help speaking of it to Brother P.' My heart rejoiced, seeing the Lord's faithfulness, but I thought it better not to tell her about our circumstances, lest she should be influenced to give accordingly; and I also was assured that, if it were of the Lord, she could not but give. I therefore turned the conversation to other subjects, but when I left she gave me two guineas ($11). We were full of joy on account of the goodness of the Lord. I would call upon the reader to admire the gentleness of the Lord, that He did not try our faith much at the commencement, but allowed us to see His willingness to help us, before He was pleased to try it more fully."

Another crisis came "on Jan. 28, 1831," he says; "we had again but little money, though I had seen the brethren open the box (in the chapel) and take out the money. I would not ask the brother in whose hands it was, to let me have it; but standing in need of it, as our coals were almost gone, I asked the Lord to incline his heart to bring it; and but a little time afterward it was given to us, one pound seven shillings and sixpence ($7)."

"On February 14, we had again very little money, and while praying, I was led to ask the Lord graciously to supply our wants; and the instant that I got up from my knees a brother gave me the money which had been taken out of the box."

"On March 7th, I was again tempted to disbelieve the faithfulness of the Lord, and, though I was not miserable, still I was not so fully resting upon the Lord that I could triumph and rejoice. It was but one hour after, when the Lord gave me another proof of His faithful love. A Christian lady brought five sovereigns for us, with these words written on the paper. 'I was an hungred and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty and ye gave me drink,' etc."

ANXIETY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
April 2, 1882.

"Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"—ACTS 16: 30.

A. Lecturer and his Audience—The same Query in Different Circumstances—Night in the Prison—The Jailer's Query To-day—A Message from Heaven—I. A Courteous Question—II. A Practical Question—III. A Personal Question—Too much Concern with Other People's Sins—The Coming Earthquake—IV. An Important Question—V. An Agonized Question—The Earthquake of Domestic Misfortune—VI. An Urgent Question—A Warning Word from Hell—A Case Adjourned until the Costs Ate it—The Most Unfavorable Hour—Necessity for an Answer—A Marginal Note on a Friend's Bible—Sir John Cochrane and the Disguised Wayfarer—A more Thrilling Story.

LAST week the board fences, the stone walls and the city car windows were covered with the advertisement of an infidel lecture on the subject of "What must we do to be saved?" Of course the allusion was to the scene of the text. I warrant you that the facetious lecturer on Tuesday and Wednesday nights in Steinway Hall and Academy of Music, asked the question in a different mood from that in which it was asked when it was originally propounded. I warrant you also that the audience who heard the question were in a different condition from the audience that originally heard it.

The audience that gathered last week to hear the question of the text discussed, entered a beautiful auditorium, having paid fifty or seventy-five cents to hear the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ ridiculed. I would rather pay fifty cents for almost anything than to hear the Lord Jesus Christ dishonored. I would rather pay fifty cents to hear my dead father, or dead mother, or dead brother, or dead sister derided and ridiculed than to pay fifty cents to hear the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ defamed. Fifty cents are not much, but he who hears Christ caricatured, or His religion defamed has an entertainment costly at any price.

The difference was incomparable between the scene last Tuesday and Wednesday evenings when the question was discussed, and the scene when the text was originally propounded. Incarcerated in a Philippian penitentiary, a place cold, and dark, and damp, and loathsome, and hideous, unilluminated save by the torch of the official who comes to see if they are alive yet, are two ministers of Christ, their feet fast in instruments of torture, their shoulders dripping from the stroke of leathern thongs, their mouths hot with inflammation of thirst, their heads faint because they may not lie down. In a comfortable room of that same building, and amid pleasant surroundings, is a paid officer of the government whose business it is to supervise the prison.

It is night and all is still in the corridors of the dungeon save as some murderer struggles with a horrid dream, or a ruffian turns over in his chains, or there is the cough of a dying consumptive amid the dampness; but suddenly, crash! go the walls. The two clergymen pass out free. The jail-keeper, although familiar with the darkness and the horrors hovering around the dungeon, is startled beyond all bounds, and flambeau in hand he rushes through amid the falling walls, shouting at the top of his voice: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?"

I stand to-day before hundreds, and perhaps thousands, who are asking the same question with more or less earnestness, and I accost you in this crisis of your soul with

A MESSAGE FROM HEAVEN.

There are those in this audience who might be more skilful in argument than I am; there are those here who can dive into deeper depths of science, or have larger knowledge; there are in this audience those before whom I would willingly bow as the inferior to the superior; but I yield to no one in this assemblage in a desire to have all the people saved by the power of an omnipotent Gospel, and with an all-consuming desire that sometimes almost impedes my utterance, I beg you to accept immortal life.

I. I shall proceed this morning to characterize the question of the agitated jail-keeper. And, first, I characterize that question as courteous. He might have rushed in and said: "Paul and Silas, you vagabonds, are you tearing down this prison? Aren't you satisfied with disturbing the peace of the city by your infamous doctrines? and are you now going to destroy public property? Back with you to your places, you vagabonds!" He said no such thing. The word of four letters, "Sirs!" equivalent to "lords," recognized the majesty and the honor of their mission. Sirs!

If a man with a captious spirit tries to find the way to heaven, he will miss it. If a man comes out and pronounces all Christians as hypocrites and the religion of Jesus Christ as a fraud, and asks irritating questions about the mysterious and the inscrutable, saying, "Come, my wise man, explain this and explain that; if this be true how can that be true,"—no such man finds the way to heaven. The question of the text was decent, courteous, gentlemanly, deferential. Sirs!

II. Again, I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper by saying that it was

A PRACTICAL QUESTION.

He did not ask why God let sin come into the world, he did not ask how Christ could be God and man in the same person, he did not ask the doctrine of the decrees explained or want to know whom Cain married, or what was the cause of the earthquake. His present and everlasting welfare was involved in the question, and was not that practical? But I know multitudes of people who are bothering themselves about the non-essentials of religion.

What would you think of a man who should, while discussing the question of the light and heat of the sun, spend his time down in a coal cellar, when he might come out and see the one and feel the other? Yet there are multitudes of men who in discussing the chemistry of the gospel, spend their time down in the dungeon of their unbelief, when God all the while stands telling them to come out into the noonday light and warmth of the Sun of righteousness. The question for you, my brother, to discuss is not whether Calvin or Arminius was right, not whether a handful of water in holy baptism or a baptism is the better, not whether foreordination and free agency can be harmonized. The practical question for you to discuss, and for me to discuss, is, "Where will I spend eternity?"

A PERSONAL QUESTION.

III. Again, I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as one personal to himself. I have no doubt he had many friends, and he was interested in their welfare. I have no doubt he found that there were persons in that prison who, if the earthquake had destroyed them, would have found their case desperate. He is not questioning about them. The whole weight of his question turns on the pronoun "I." "What shall I do?" Of course, when a man becomes a Christian, he immediately becomes anxious for the salvation of other people; but until that point is reached the most important question is about your own salvation. "What is to be my destiny?" "What are my prospects for the future?" "Where am I going?" "What shall I do?"

The trouble is we shuffle the responsibility off upon others. We prophesy a bad end to that inebriate and terrific exposure to that defaulter, and awful catastrophe to that profligate. We are so busy in weighing other people we forget ourselves to get into the scales. We are so busy watching the poor gardens of other people that we let our own dooryard go to weeds. We are so busy sending off other people into the life-boat we sink in the wave. We cry "fire!" because our neighbor's house is burning down and seem to be uninterested although our own house is in the conflagration. O! wandering thoughts, disappear to-day. Blot out this entire audience except yourself. Your sin, is it pardoned? Your death, is it provided for? Your Heaven, is it secured?

A mightier earthquake than that which demolished the Philippian penitentiary will rumble about your ears. The foundations of the earth will give way. The earth by one tremor will fling all the American cities into the dust. Cathedrals and palaces and prisons which have stood for thousands of years will topple like a child's blockhouse. The surges of the sea will submerge the land, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans above the Alps and the Andes clap their hands. What then will become of me? What then will become of you? I do not wonder at the anxiety of this man of my text, for he was not only anxious about the falling of the prison, but the falling of a world.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

IV. Again I remark: I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as one of incomparable importance. Men are alike, and I suppose he had scores of questions on his mind, but all questions for this world are hushed up, forgotten, annihilated in this one question of the text: "What must I do to be saved?"

And have you, my brother, any question of importance compared with that question? Is it a question of business? Your common sense tells you that you will soon cease worldly business. You know very well that you will soon pass out of that partnership. You know that beyond a certain point, of all the millions of dollars of goods sold in New York and Brooklyn, you will not handle a yard of cloth, or a pound of sugar, or a penny's worth. After that, if a conflagration should start at Central Park and sweep clear to the Battery, it would not touch you, and would not damage you. If every cashier should abscond and every bank suspend payment, and every insurance company fail, it would not affect you. O! how insignificant is business this side the grave with business on the other side the grave. Have you made any

PURCHASES FOR ETERNITY?

Have you any securities that will last forever? are you jobbing for time when you might be wholesaling for eternity? Is there any question so broad at the base, so altitudinous, so overshadowing as the question: "What must I do to be saved?"

Or, is it a domestic question, is it something about father, or mother, or husband, or wife, or son, or daughter that is the more important question? You know by universal and inexorable law that relation will soon be broken up. Father will be gone, mother will be gone, children will be gone, you will be gone; but after that, the question of the text will begin to harvest its chief gains, or deplore its worst losses, or roll up its mightiest magnitudes, or sweep its vaster circles—the question whether you will take wing and soar, or chain and drop, whether you shall be built up or pulled down, whether God will be your Father or your Foe, whether in eternity you will be praising or blaspheming, chanting or groaning, in a land of light and purity and joy, or in a death that never dies.

O! what a question, what an important question. Is there any question that compares with it in importance? What is it now to Napoleon III. whether he triumphed or surrendered at Sedan, whether he died at the Tuileries or Chiselhurst, whether he was emperor or exile? Because he was laid out in the coffin in the dress of a field marshal, did that give him any better chance for the future than if he had been laid out in a plain shroud? What difference will it soon make to you or to me whether in this world we walked or rode, whether we were bowed to or maltreated, whether we were applauded or hissed at, welcomed in, or kicked out? while laying hold of every moment of the future, and burning in every splendor or every grief, and overarching or undergirding all time and all eternity will be the plain, startling, infinite, stupendous question of the text: "What must I do to be saved?"

V. Again, I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as one crushed out by his misfortunes, pressed out by his misfortunes. The falling of the penitentiary, his occupation was gone. Besides that the flight of a prisoner was ordinarily the death of the jailer. He was held responsible. If all had gone well, if the prison walls had not been shaken of the earthquake, if the prisoners had all stayed quiet in the stocks, if the morning sunlight had calmly dropped on the jailer's pillow, do you think he would have hurled this red-hot question from his soul into the ear of his apostolic prisoners?

Ah! no; you know as well as I do it was the earthquake that roused him up. And it is trouble that starts a great many people to asking the same question. It has been so with a vast multitude of you. Your apparel is not as bright as once it was. Why have you changed the garb? Do you like solferino and crimson, and purple, as well as once? Yes. But you say: "While I was prospered and happy those colors were accordant with my feelings; now they would be discord to my soul." And so you have plaited up the shadows into your apparel. O! the world is a very different place from what it was once for you. Once you said: "O! if I could only have it quiet a little while." It is too quiet. Some people say that they would not bring back their departed friends from heaven even if they had the opportunity; but if you had the opportunity you would bring back your loved ones and soon their feet would be sounding in the hall, soon their voices would be heard in the family and the old times would come back just as the festal days of Christmas and Thanksgiving—days gone forever. O! it is the earthquake that startled you to asking this question—the earthquake of domestic misfortune.

Death is so cruel, so devouring, so relentless, that when it swallows up our loved ones we must have some one to whom we can carry our torn and bleeding hearts. We need a balsam better than anything that ever exuded from earthly tree to heal the pang of the soul. It is pleasant to have our friends gather around us and tell us how sorry they are, and try to break up the loneliness; but nothing but the hand of Jesus Christ can take the bruised soul and put it in His bosom, hushing it with the lullaby of heaven. O! brother, O! sister, the gravestone will never be lifted from your heart until Christ lifts it. Was it not the loss of your friends or the persecution of your enemies, or the overthrow of your worldly estate—was it not an earthquake that started you out to ask this stupendous question of my text?

VI. But I remark again: I characterize this question of the agitated jail-keeper as

HASTY, URGENT, AND IMMEDIATE.

He put it on the run. By the light of his torch as he goes to look for the apostles, behold his face, see the startled look and see the earnestness. No one can doubt by that look that the man is in earnest. He must have that question answered before the earth stops rocking, or perhaps he will never have it answered at all. Is that the way, my brother, my sister, you are putting this question? Is it on the run? Is it hasty? Is it urgent? Is it immediate? If it is not, it will not be answered. That is the only kind of question that is answered. It is the urgent and the immediate question of the Gospel Christ answers.

A great many are asking this question, but they draw it out, and there is indifference in their manner as if they do not mean it. Make it an urgent question and then you will have it answered before an hour passes, before a minute passes. When a man with all the earnestness of his soul cries out for God he finds him, and finds Him right away. I swing back the door of the lost world, and if one word might come up, only one word of warning, what do you think that word would be? I can imagine what it would be. Only one word. It would come up like the howling of the everlasting storm, that one word: "Now! now!"

How did those young men miss Heaven? "O!" they said, "we'll wait until we get to mid-life or old age; time enough yet." But the railroad rushed from the track and their life was dashed out, or their foot slipped on the icy pavement and their skull was fractured, or typhoid fever came down and rushed them out of life in delirium. They never saw mid-life.

How did those men in mid-life lose their soul? O! they were waiting until their business matters were fixed up. They never had an opportunity, a better opportunity, than that which was offered to them then, but they procrastinated, they adjourned, they adjourned the case until the bill of costs destroyed the case. Adjourned, and adjourned, and adjourned. Bonds, mortgages, certificates of stock, safety deposits, government securities, are of no use where they are now.

How did those old men miss Heaven? "O!" they said, "we'll put it off until the very last."

They put it off. Their hearts were hardened. They tried to pray, but they could not pray. They tried to believe, but they could not believe. They tried to repent, but they could not repent. And the old man leaned heavier and heavier on the staff of old age, heavier and heavier until the staff broke and he fell headlong.

O! are there not in this house to-day those who are postponing until the last hour of living the attending to the things of the soul? I give it as my opinion that ninety-nine out of the one hundred death-bed repentances amount to nothing. Of all the scores of persons mentioned as dying in the Bible, of how many do you read that they successfully repented in the last hour? Of fifty? No. Of forty? No. Of thirty? No. Of twenty? No. Of ten? No. Of five? No. Of one—only one, barely one, as if to demonstrate the fact that there is a bare possibility of repenting in the last hour. But that is improbable, awfully improbable, terrifically improbable. One hundred to one against the man.

If, my brother, my sister, you have ever seen a man try to repent in the last hour, you have seen something very sad. I do not know anything on earth so sad as to see a man try to repent on a deathbed. There is not from the moment that life begins to breathe in infancy, to the last gasp, such an unfavorable, completely unfavorable, hour for repentance as the death hour, the last hour. There are the doctors standing with the medicines. There is the lawyer standing with the half-written will. There is the family in consternation as to what is to become of them. All the bells of eternity ringing the soul out of the body. All the past rising before us and all the future. Angels flying through the room. Devils plotting for the overthrow. O! that man is an infinite fool, an infinite fool, who procrastinates to the deathbed his repentance!

My text does not

ANSWER THE QUESTION.

It only asks it, with deep and importunate earnestness asks it, and according to the rules of sermonizing you would say, "adjourn that to some other time;" but I dare not. What are the rules of sermonizing to me when I am after souls? What other time could I have when perhaps this is the only time? This might be my last time for preaching; this might be your last time for hearing.

After my friend in Philadelphia died, his children gave his church Bible to me and I read it, looked over it with much interest. I saw in the margin, written in lead pencil: "Mr. Talmage said this morning that the most useless thing in all God's universe is that any sinner should perish." I did not remember saying it, but it is true, and I say it now whether I said it then or not; the most useless thing in all God's universe is that any sinner should perish. Twelve gates wide open. Have you not heard how Christ bore our sorrows, and how sympathetic He is with all our woes? Have you not heard how that with all the sorrows of heart and all the agonies of hell upon Him He cried: "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do?"

By His feet blistered of the mountain way—by His back whipped until the skin came off, by His death couch of four spikes, two for the hands and two for the feet—by His sepulchre, in which for the first time for thirty-three years the cruel world let Him alone—and by the heavens from which He this morning bends in compassion, offering pardon and peace, and life eternal to all your souls, I beg of you put down your all at His feet.

"I saw one hanging on a tree

In agony and blood,

Who put His languid eyes on me

As near His cross I stood.

"O never till my latest breath,

Will I forget that look;

It seemed to charge me with His death,

Though not a word He spoke."

In the troubled times of Scotland,

SIR JOHN COCHRANE

was condemned to death by the king. The death warrant was on the way. Sir John Cochrane was bidding farewell to his daughter Grizelle, at the prison door. He said: "Farewell, my darling child! I must die." His daughter said: "No, father, you shall not die." "But," he said, "the king is against me, and the law is after me and the death warrant is on its way, and I must die; do not deceive yourself, my dear child." The daughter said: "Father, you shall not die," as she left the prison gate.

